

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Register of Debates in Congress.

TWENTIETH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION :

COMMENCING DEC. 3, 1827, AND ENDING MAY 26, 1828.

SENATE.] First Proceedings in Senate.—Imprisonment for Debt.—Printer to the Senate. [DEC. 3, 4, 5, 1827.]

DEBATES IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1827.

THE hour of twelve having arrived, the Honorable JOHN C. CALHOUN, Vice President of the United States, took the Chair. The roll of Senators having been called over by Mr. LOWRIE, the Secretary, it appeared that every member was in attendance, except Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

The oath of office was then administered to such members as, having been elected since the last session, now take their seats for six years from the present time.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the Secretary was ordered to wait upon the House of Representatives, and inform them that a quorum of the Senate was present, and ready to proceed to business. He returned, and reported that the House had not yet elected their Speaker.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, then rose to give notice that, on Wednesday next, he should ask leave to introduce a bill "to abolish Imprisonment for Debt." Mr. J. accompanied this notice with a few remarks, stating his desire that this subject might receive the early attention of the Senate, so that its fate might, without farther delay, be made known to the nation. He considered it his duty to press the subject at the present session, and should have done so at the last, but he had forborne, in consideration of its being the short session of Congress, and a crowd of other business demanding the attention of the Senate.

A message was then received from the House of Representatives by their Clerk, announcing that a quorum of that House had assembled; that ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, had been elected their Speaker, and that they were ready to proceed to business.

Soon after, a second message informed the Senate that the House had passed a joint resolution, that a Committee be appointed by each House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that they were ready to receive any communication he might have to make.

The resolution was concurred in, and Messrs. MACON, and SMITH, of Maryland, were appointed a Committee on the part of the Senate.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1827.

Mr. MACON, from the Joint Committee of both Houses, appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, reported that they had done so, and had received for answer that the President would make a communication, in writing, to both Houses, at twelve o'clock this day.

VOL. IV.—1

The Message, (which will be found in the Appendix,) was shortly after received from the President of the United States, by Mr. John Adams, his Private Secretary: and, on motion of Mr. BALL, it was ordered that three thousand copies of the Message, and one thousand five hundred copies of the documents accompanying it, be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the hour to which the Senate shall stand adjourned, was fixed at 12 o'clock, until further ordered.

PRINTER TO THE SENATE.

Mr. EATON, after some prefatory remarks in relation to the embarrassing situation of the Secretary of the Senate, who was at a loss to know who was to be considered as the Senate Printer, offered the following Preamble and Resolution:

In pursuance of a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, passed in 1819, regulating the subject of printing for the two Houses, respectively, an election having been had by the Senate during the last session, for a printer to the Senate, and Duff Green having, according to the provisions of the said Resolution, received the greatest number of votes: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the said Duff Green is duly elected printer to the Senate.

After a debate of some animation, in which Messrs. EATON, HAYNE, BENTON, BERRIEN, and WOODBURY, advocated, and Messrs. MACON, HARRISON, CHAMBERS, and ROBBINS, opposed the Resolution, (ineffectual attempts having been made to lay it on the table and to postpone its consideration until to-morrow,) it was carried by Yeas and Nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Hayne, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Ridgely, Rowan, Sanford, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Williams, Woodbury—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Macon, Marks, Noble, Parris, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Willey—19.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1827.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, agreeably to leave, introduced a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt; which was read the first time, and passed to a second reading.

SENATE.]

• Duty on Imported Salt.—Western Arsenal.

[DEC. 6—13, 1827.]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1827.

Mr. NOBLE, of Indiana, according to notice given yesterday, and leave obtained to-day, introduced a bill "to authorize the Legislature of the State of Indiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that State;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion, Monday next was assigned for the appointment of the Standing Committees of the Senate, to which day it adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1827.

The Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury was communicated by the Vice President, and 1500 copies thereof ordered to be printed. [See Appendix for the Report.]

Mr. KING obtained leave to introduce a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Alabama, for the incorporation of the Cahawba Navigation Company; which was read the first time.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of its officers for the present Congress, when the following individuals were declared to be elected, and took the oaths of their respective offices:

WALTER LOWRIE, Secretary.

MOUNTJOY BAYLY, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper.

HENRY TINS, Assistant Doorkeeper.

This being the day appointed for the election of the Standing Committees, the Senate proceeded to ballot for the Chairman and members of each in rotation, and elected eight Committees.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1827.

Mr. EATON remarked, that, on inquiry of the Secretary, he had found that no rule existed as to the number of copies required by the Senate of such documents as were ordered to be printed. He therefore offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That, unless when otherwise ordered, the usual number of copies of any document ordered by the Senate to be printed, shall be 687, except bills and amendments, the number of which shall not exceed four hundred, to be distributed as heretofore.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for the remainder of the Standing Committees, and made the appointments required.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1827.

DUTY ON IMPORTED SALT.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill repealing, in part, the duty on imported salt, which he prefaced by a few remarks. He said that a similar measure having been before the Senate last year, upon which his conduct had been somewhat misunderstood, he wished to explain his motives in now offering this bill. It would be recollected that he had given his feeble efforts, last year, to sustain the bill, which underwent a full discussion. He had then supported it more from his convictions that the measure was calculated to be generally beneficial to the country, than from any knowledge that it was peculiarly desirable to his own State, although he believed Ohio would share in the benefit. The reason of his bringing forward this bill, and aiding it with his voice, was, that he was now perfectly convinced that it was as loudly called for in his own State as in any other section of the country. Not long since, there was a rise in the price of salt which had been felt severely in Ohio. This advance was produced by a combination among the capitalists engaged in the domestic manufacture, by which the article was brought up to 50 cents. The inhabitants of Ohio were, in fact, at the mercy of a few capitalists, who, at certain seasons, were able to raise the prices by a combination, whereby a heavy tax was put upon the People, and thousands of dollars realized by these speculators. It had been formerly argued, that the reduction of the duty on imported salt would injure the sale of the domestic article. This he did not think could, in any respect, be the case. The bill which he now proposed was the same as that offered last year, and contemplated a reduction, at the expiration of one year, of the present duty, from 20 to 15 cents, and the next year to 10 cents. So far as the result would affect his own State, it would be beneficial; because the salted provisions which were put down with imported salt would bear a competition with those of any country; and, therefore, for the prosperity of that branch of trade, it was requisite to obtain the imported article. It now came up the Ohio in steamboats, and was procured, although at a high rate. To lower the duty would not injure the manufacture, while it would protect the People from those combinations by which capitalists were able to raise the prices to an exorbitant height. The bill was then read the first time.

Various portions of the message communicated by the President of the United States at the commencement of the session, were referred to their respective committees.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1827.

WESTERN ARSENAL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, under the control of the President of the United States, be authorized and requested to instruct one or more officers of the Corps of Engineers to examine the Horse Shoe Bend, on Licking river, in the State of Kentucky, and report the practicability of establishing an armory of the United States at that place, similar to the one at Harper's Ferry or Springfield.

Mr. JOHNSON remarked, in relation to the resolution which he now offered, that he had, for fifteen years, from time to time, submitted propositions of a similar nature to Congress; and he believed no member had ever opposed the proposition, either on the score of economy or propriety, and yet it seemed as far from being obtained now as when it was at first introduced into Congress. A bill was proposed by him in Congress some years since, in which the President was authorized to survey and locate an armory on the Western waters, but the jealousy of the members of this and the other House, and the difference of opinion as to which State it should be located in, had left the subject, up to this time, entirely afloat. It was true that he should prefer its location in the State of Kentucky. But it was not his intention to discuss that question now. If it could not be established in Kentucky, he was desirous that it should be elsewhere. In the surveys that had been made, the Licking Summit had been overlooked. This point was situated in the district which he formerly represented, and on that ground he was the more anxious that it should be examined and its advantages decided upon. His resolution, therefore, went to authorize the survey. And, in advancing this wish, he was convinced that—apart from his wish to serve a People, who, of all others, had honored him with their confidence—he was advocating a plan from which public benefit and an economy of the country's resources was to result. All he wished, was, to have it settled whether or not the Licking Summit was the most eligible situation for an armory. If it should prove to be otherwise, as about thirty places had already been named, he did not doubt an advantageous site would be found. This resolution, however, he hoped, in the mean time, would be allowed to stand on its own bottom.

DEC. 14, 1827.]

Indemnification to Foreigners.—Amendment to the Rules.

[SENATE.]

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1827.

INDEMNIFICATION TO FOREIGNERS.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented the petition of Robert Hall, a subject of Great Britain, praying for further indemnification for the destruction of the ship Union; which was read, and, on the question, Whether it should be referred to the Committee on Claims—

Mr. EATON said, that he was opposed to the reference of a petition of this description, on the ground that the question involved in it, could be settled otherwise; and that Congress was assembled to transact the business of the citizens of this country, and not that of foreigners. If the Secretary of State could not settle the question, he did not see how Congress could do it, consistently with the principles by which it was generally governed. He therefore hoped the reference would not be made.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarked, that this was a case out of the scope of the general rule to which the gentleman from Tennessee alluded. The petition and papers had been received and referred by the other House. The vessel mentioned in the petition had been seized, and the cargo forfeited, on the day after the peace. And in awarding the indemnification at a former period, instead of obtaining the invoice of the cargo taken in at Sumatra, after leaving Calcutta, the invoice of the cargo taken in at Calcutta had been resorted to. The consequence was, that an indemnification was awarded to the petitioner for less in value than the loss which he really sustained. Congress was now asked to rectify this injury, growing entirely out of a mistake, and he hoped no obstruction would be thrown in the way of such an object.

Mr. EATON said, there was, of course, nothing personal in his remarks—he only alluded to the subject, as related to the policy which ought to govern Congress in all such applications. He would ask the gentleman from Maryland, whether our citizens, going to France, and applying for any redress of wrongs, would be allowed to approach the Legislature of the country? Would our citizens be permitted to petition the French Chamber for redress for any of the numerous spoliations made upon our commerce? Every one knew that they would not. Or, would they be allowed to present their petitions to the British Parliament? It was well known, that the proper channel for such applications was through the Secretary of State. In this case, a foreigner comes forward and asks Congress to take his case into consideration. If it was considered; if Congress did not in this instance show that such applications were not to be looked upon as regular or proper, the consequence would be, that much of their time would be taken up, to what extent could not be known, in the adjustment of the affairs of foreigners, while the concerns of our own citizens would be neglected. Let this business be done as it ought to be. Let it go to the Secretary of State, and if he could not settle it, let it be sent to the President; then, if it was necessary, from its nature, that it should be referred to Congress, the proper method would be taken: but let it not be brought here without having first been officially examined.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that this was not a case to which the remarks of the gentleman would apply. It appeared that it had been formerly before Congress, and being guided by incorrect documents, they had made an erroneous award. To rectify that mistake was the object of bringing it now before Congress again. This, therefore, was a different case from those to which the principle advanced by the gentleman from Tennessee would generally apply. He did not know what was the general rule in England; but he recollected one instance in which an individual who had done some service under the British Government, after having returned to this country, and become again an American citizen, applied to the British Parliament, and received a compensation for these services. He hoped the petition would have a reference, as justice required that some inquiry should be made into the claim of the petitioner.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that he saw some force in the objections made by the gentleman from Tennessee. The petition was presented by a British subject. That was not denied. And to him it appeared clear, that it ought to be presented officially to Congress: therefore, it seemed out of order for him to petition this body. The gentleman from Maryland had said, that this was a case peculiarly fitted to be laid before the Senate, because it had once before been passed upon by Congress: hence he argued that it ought to be considered again. If, as was stated, justice required that this matter should be investigated, there was, no doubt, a way in which it might be done. For instance, any member might present a resolution to that effect; and if the gentleman from Maryland was acquainted with the merits of the case—as he, Mr. H., could not possibly be—a resolution from him, that the Committee of Finance inquire into the merits of the claim, would, as he apprehended, arrive at the desired result. There were but two ways in which the matter could be properly settled—either that the claim should come through the British Minister, or should be settled by a resolution authorizing its investigation by the proper committee.

Mr. BENTON was convinced that the citizens of other countries had no right to petition Congress for the adjustment of their claims. For, he contended, that while our citizens had not the same right in England, it was a privilege Englishmen had no right to claim in this country. It was partial and unequal. The right was secured in the Constitution, to our citizens, to petition Congress, and it was an infringement upon that right to permit foreigners to do so. If such a privilege were once accorded, there would be no possibility of measuring the inconveniences which would arise from it. The abuse of such a privilege would seriously interfere with the rights of our own citizens. He was aware of an instance in which a Frenchman had introduced a petition in the other House, which no American citizen would have introduced—and he, Mr. B. having then reflected much upon the effect of such a practice, came to the conclusion, that no foreigner ought to be allowed to petition Congress; that they had no right to do it, and that it was an encroachment upon the privileges of our own citizens. He hoped, therefore, that the rule would now be established; and that, hereafter, foreigners would be restricted to applications made through their respective Ministers. On these grounds, he was opposed to the reference of the petition.

Mr. MACON said, that, as it appeared desirable that the petition should be examined into, in order to decide whether it was or not an improper petition, he should move that it lie on the table. He did not intend by this course to kill it, as the gentleman from Maryland could call it up at any time.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. RUGLES, yesterday, was then considered:

Resolved, That the following be added to the Rules of the Senate:

Rule 2d. As soon as the Journal is read, the business of the Senate shall be taken up as follows:

1. Resolutions of State Legislatures, petitions, and memorials, shall be presented, and disposed of.
2. Reports of Committees, and bills introduced on leave.
3. Motions or resolutions of individual Senators.
4. Orders of the day."

SENATE.]

Western Armory.—Reporters to the Senate.—Indiana School Lands.

[DEC. 17, 1827.]

After some conversation between Messrs. RUGGLES, FOOT, and KING, on the expediency of the Rules proposed, the resolution was, on motion of Mr. R., laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WESTERN ARMORY.

The resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, authorizing the survey of a site for the location of an Armory at the Horse Shoe Bend, on Licking River, was then taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that he should neglect his duty were he to allow this resolution to pass without offering an amendment. As the object proposed in this examination was to choose the best site for a Western Armory, it could not be objected to that any point which was considered likely to present the advantages required, should also be surveyed, as well as the one proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky. When the surveys were formerly made in relation to this object, a site on Blue river, in Indiana, was pointed out to the surveyors; but it was not surveyed. His amendment went to propose the survey of that site, of one near Lawrenceburg, and of a site on the Wabash, near the mouth of Eel river.

Mr. NOBLE said that there were other sites, as well as those already named, which, when the matter was fairly before the Senate, he should propose for examination. He hoped the gentleman would agree with him that the subject ought to be examined thoroughly; and, in order that it might be, he should move to lay the resolution and the amendment on the table, and print them; but waived his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. KING said, he did not see the object of proposing to print the resolution and amendment. If the resolution was to be considered, he should be under the necessity of offering another amendment, to examine a site on Cypress and Shoal Creeks in Alabama. This situation comprised manifold advantages. It afforded the most perfect water communication with the whole Western Country, and would afford the greatest facility to any defence the country might hereafter be called upon to make against attacks along the Gulf country. Among the various advantages of this position might also be enumerated an abundance of iron ore in its vicinity, of the very best quality.

Mr. RUGGLES rose, with the remark, that he should not represent the true interests of his constituents, did he neglect to bring forward as an amendment to the resolution, a proposition to add to the sites to be examined, that of Zanesville. This place had, on a former occasion, been surveyed, and favorably reported upon; but the difficulty of transporting to it the materials for the erection of the armory, was then objected to. This objection, however, was now removed, as the Ohio Canal, constructed within two years, had obviated that difficulty, rendering Zanesville accessible by navigation of the safest description. He thought that, these being the facts, Zanesville was fully entitled to a re-examination. It would be also recollected, that it was within 100 miles of the Lakes, and the communication was free and direct with Lake Erie, through which this country was most likely to be attacked in case of war.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that, to save time and trouble, he would offer another resolution, (as we understood him,) similar to that offered and amended last year, and comprising all the sites then proposed.

[He was informed by the Chair, that it was out of order to offer any other, until that now before the Senate should be disposed of.]

He then moved to withdraw the resolution under consideration; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn until Monday next.

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1827.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Finance, reported a bill to reduce, in part, the duty on imported salt, without amendment.

REPORTERS TO THE SENATE.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. HARRISON, on Friday, was taken up.

Resolved, That the Secretary, under the direction of the President of the Senate, cause seats to be prepared upon the floor of the Senate Chamber, for the accommodation of the Reporters of the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON remarked, that, for introducing this proposition, he had but one reason. It was, that the seats, now occupied by the Reporters, were so situated, that it was impossible for them to hear those Senators who were out of their view. He knew that the difficulties they now labored under were very great: for he himself had been made to say things that he had never conceived, which he readily believed arose from the impossibility that the Reporters could catch distinctly what passed in the body of the Senate. It must be perfectly obvious to all, that, as the seats of the Senators were now arranged, this difficulty must exist. For his own part, he had never experienced any inconvenience from the manner in which the seats were formerly arranged, but this was a serious evil, arising out of the recent change, which he wished to see removed. If the People were interested in knowing what passed in the Senate, and, if it was proper that it should be reported, it was highly desirable that it should be correctly reported. This could not be done in the present location of the Reporters. For this reason he had introduced this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, remarked, that he was in favor of the arrangement proposed; and was sensible of the inconveniences now experienced by the Reporters. He had seen some of the effects of the difficulty they had in hearing—as his friend from Missouri had been reported, in one of the papers, to have introduced a bill for a still further reduction of our little army of 6,000 men, when, in reality, he had only brought in a bill to explain a previous act, making that reduction; which had produced great anxiety among those whose interests seemed likely to be affected. It was impossible for the Reporters, under present circumstances, to give the proceedings more correctly than they did; and he hoped they would be so placed as to be enabled to perform their duties more satisfactorily. It was unnecessary to say how much the public was interested in having the reports correctly made.

Mr. CHANDLER expressed himself in favor of the object of the resolution; but suggested that it would be better to modify it in such a manner as to give the Reporters a wider range. It might be found that the floor would not be the most eligible situation.

The CHAIR observed, that the object of the gentleman from Maine would be answered by striking out the words "on the floor of the Senate Chamber," which would leave the location of the seats at the discretion of the President and Secretary.

Mr. HARRISON expressed his acquiescence in the suggestion, and moved the striking out; which was agreed to. The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

SCHOOL LANDS IN INDIANA.

The bill to authorize the State of Indiana to sell the lands hitherto appropriated to the use of Schools in that State, was read a second time.

Mr. BENTON said, that he hoped no sale of lands by the Legislature of that State would be made suddenly. He thought it would be better if a precaution were taken, in relation to the disposal of these lands, by inserting a clause, deferring the sale until another election should have taken place, and another stated session of the Legislature have been convened. The proposition would then be fairly before the People, and no act would take place in which they were not disposed to acquiesce. He suggested this to the gentleman from Indiana, as a prudent modification of this bill. Were the quantity of land greater, he would have proposed it himself; but, the amount being small, he only threw out this suggestion.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that he did not distinctly hear the gentleman's remarks; but, in relation to the suggestion, he, [Mr. H.] did not feel prepared to offer any amendment to the bill. He should wish the bill to pass in its present form. But, if the gentleman desired to examine its merits, or to offer any amendment, he had no objection to laying it on the table, the more especially as his colleague was not now in his seat. He therefore moved to lay it on the table; which was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. HAYNE said, he had received a communication, conveying a memorial, which he was requested to present, and to which he would call the particular attention of the Senate. It related to a subject of great importance, and advocated those principles of free trade in defence of which we had already waged two wars, and on the preservation of which, he was persuaded, the prosperity and permanence of the Union depended. The memorial was signed by no less than fifteen hundred and sixty-two inhabitants of Boston and its vicinity; and he was assured, that there were among the names of the memorialists, many of the most enlightened, learned, and disinterested citizens of that metropolis, and not a few of the most intelligent and reflecting of her manufacturers, all of whom had here united in a decided remonstrance "against any increase of duties on imports, and especially "on the important and essential article of woollen manufactured goods." The memorial was written with great ability, and contained facts and arguments, which Mr. H. could not bring himself to believe, would be disregarded by any enlightened Legislature. There was displayed, throughout, a pervading good sense, and a practical knowledge, which, added to a tone of candor and moderation, could not fail to secure for the memorial the most respectful consideration of the Senate. Mr. H. said, he wished that it might be now read, in order that the attention of the Senate might be seriously called to a subject, certainly second in importance to none that could come before them during the present Session. Mr. HAYNE said, he could not take his seat without expressing the satisfaction he felt in receiving the unequivocal evidence afforded by this memorial, that the cause of "free trade and unrestricted industry" was not yet lost in the East. His colleague [Mr. SUMNER] and himself would, in a few days, submit to the Senate the memorials from South Carolina, on the same subject, and he could not but hope that the united efforts of the agriculturists, merchants, and "judicious manufacturers," might yet save the country from the evils of the "prohibitory system." Mr. H. then submitted the following letter, which was read:

"Boston, Dec. 12th, 1827.

Sir: The Committee of the citizens of Boston, and the vicinity, opposed to an increase of duties on imports, have the honor, herewith, to forward to your care a memorial on this important subject, of which they request an early presentation to the Senate, and such an advocacy of its principles as shall seem to you called for, by the arguments therein contained, as applied to the interests of the whole Nation. There are, Sir, among the names of the memorialists, those of many of our most enlightened, learned, disinterested citizens, and not a few of the most intelligent, judicious, and reflecting, of our Manufacturers both of Cotton and Woollens. The Committee have the most entire conviction that the best interests of the country are involved in this question, and will be promoted by the abandonment of any further prosecution of this system of high duties. The Committee have the honor to be, Sir, with great respect, your very humble servants, Nath. Goddard, Lemuel Shaw, Isaac Winslow, William Goddard, Enoch Shibly, Thomas W. Ward, Edward Croft, Lot Wheelwright, Henry Lee, R. D. Shepherd, Samuel Street, William Foster, Daniel S. Parker, Joseph Baker, Samuel C. Gray, Committee.
To the Hon. Robert T. Hayne, Washington."

Mr. HAYNE then submitted the memorial of the citizens of Boston and its vicinity, against an increase of duties on importations; which was read, ordered to be printed, and on motion of Mr. H. referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1827.

SCHOOL LANDS IN INDIANA.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated to the use of Schools in that State, was taken up.

Mr. BARTON said, it was not his intention to oppose this bill, or say much upon it. He, however, disapproved of the practice, which seemed to be gradually becoming general, for States to sell out the lands appropriated for specific objects, although he allowed that, in the present case, the quantity of land was small. The practice, he believed, had been commenced by Ohio; but Ohio was differently situated from the other Western States. In the year 1802, when Ohio was admitted into the Union, she declined acceding to that clause in the compact, in relation to reserves of land for schools, which vested the 36th section in the several towns. In 1804, a law passed in Congress, which vested those lands in Ohio in the Legislature, and, consequently, gave it a right to sell them. He supposed that Ohio might have sold these lands without applying to the United States. But it was not so with the other States. They had not objected to the manner in which the lands had been appropriated.

His view of the matter was, that the inhabitants of all the townships must be consulted, and give their consent, before the lands could be disposed of. A glance at the geographical map of those States would convince the Senate that no satisfactory measure could be taken on that head. A great number of the townships, it would be perceived, were not now inhabited at all. His objection, therefore, was, that it was impossible for the sale to be made fairly in relation to most of those townships, which were at present merely nominal. If the Legislature would provide against any future difficulties arising out of the sale, there might be no impropriety in passing the bill; and if the Senate was willing to trust the Legislature, so be it. He had, however, been informed by the member from Alabama, that when a bill was formerly passed in Congress, for the same purpose, in relation to that State, all the townships had not been willing to accede to the disposal of the lands.

Mr. NOBLE said, that he should regret if the Senate withheld from the State of Indiana that which they had granted to the States of Ohio and Alabama. That the Legislature of Indiana had, by their resolution, instructed him, with others, to ask for the passage of a bill similar to the one now before the Senate. If gentlemen will turn their attention to the act of Congress, of April 19, 1816, in relation to the School Lands in question, they will find that the section numbered sixteen, in every Township, and, when such section had been sold, other lands, were to be granted to the inhabitants of the Township or District for the use of Schools. The fact of the Legislature applying to Congress for permission to sell the lands, is an evidence that they are not productive, and the information is derived from the members of the Legislature. The bill is sufficiently guarded. The power to sell the lands, and to invest the money in some productive fund, which is to be applied for the use of Schools in the Townships, solely, and for no other purpose, can never be done without the consent of the inhabitants of the Township. Mr. N. said, he thought that the gentleman from Missouri might be mistaken—that he was well aware that the Legislature would never sell the lands in Townships inhabited, or partially so: their object would be, when they brought it into market, to obtain the best price possible, and never to sell it for the minimum price; that, in proportion to the fund becoming productive, so would education flourish. The reason to him was clear. To sell the land as wild lands, for less than the minimum price, would be folly; and to offer it for sale in a township uninhabited, could not be expected, because the competition would be too great, as the section of land would be surrounded by lands superior in quality, belonging to the Government, and always in market. The sole object of the Legislature would be to protect the fund for the benefit of the inhabitants of the several townships by the consent of each, and to sell only in the portions of the country that was strongly inhabited. It has happened that, in some instances, those, who have leased the school lands, have rendered them unproductive, instead of productive, by cutting and disposing of the timber, selling and disposing of the stone. There had been instances, that school lands were the place of resort for timber and stone, by those who had no lease. He concluded by saying, that, for the purpose of preventing, in time, the naked soil alone remaining for the inhabitants of the townships, the power had better be placed in the hands of the Legislature, with the consent of the inhabitants as to the future disposition of them.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1827.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, having been made the special order of the day for this day, was then taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose, and said, that, if any member of the Senate was opposed to the bill on principle, he would willingly give way to hear the objections to it, that he might have an opportunity of meeting them at some other time, as he did not feel inclined nor prepared to enter upon the merits of the question as fully as he could wish. It was not from levity that he persisted in pressing this bill upon the Senate. It was no plaything which he had gotten up for his amusement, or the amusement of others. He presented it under a solemn sense of duty, as one of the most important, one of the gravest and most solemn subjects which was ever brought before a legislative body, at any time, in any country. His greatest object on the present occasion was, to call the attention of the distinguished men whom he saw in such numbers around him, to this subject. He would make bold to say, that, but for the prejudices which were so powerful over human reason, and which so often subdued the human mind into an acquiescence to the worst evils, imprisonment for debt would be considered as tyrannical, oppressive, and absurd, as the Spanish Inquisition. He had not risen to fatigue the Senate with reading authorities, although he had the books before him; nor to detain the Senate with the perusal of the various letters which he had received upon this subject from every part of the United States. These letters, he said, were laden with the most painful details of the cruel operation of the law of imprisonment for debt. He alluded to them because some might tell him, as he had been told on former occasions, on the threshold of his remarks, that there was no actual suffering from this source; that imprisonment for debt in this free and happy land was merely nominal. But I know, sir, that the evil is a crying one. It stalks among the People from Maine to Georgia with heavy and gigantic steps, spreading in its course desolation and distress. The cries of the sufferers reach us from the South, and are still louder from the North and the East. Nothing at this moment but public opinion and the charity of South Carolina saved the distinguished citizen of that State, one of the most gallant heroes of our Revolution, [General SUMPTER,] from the horrors and mortification of a jail. The same barbarous law could have torn from his home and his family the illustrious author of the Declaration of our Independence. These two cases only served to place before the public the infamy of the system in more conspicuous colors. But he cared not whether the law affected the high or the low. He protested against it before God, who made men free and equal. His duty, as a Representative and as a man, was to protect the rights of the lowest as well as the highest of the community.

He did not pretend to say, that the abolition of imprisonment for debt would not sometimes favor dishonest debtors. He would admit that dishonest men would sometimes be relieved by it. But was that an argument against it? As well might the advocates of torture oppose its abolition, because confession of guilt had sometimes been extorted from the sufferer on the rack. One thing he knew, that the malicious and vindictive would be disarmed of this their legal weapon of persecution. He also knew that honest and unfortunate debtors would be protected against the cruel and selfish creditor. He was not disposed, however, to censure those views of the subject which differed from his own. Our Creator had so constructed the human mind, that the most highly gifted in intellect are not exempted from prejudice. In that situation was Paul, when he verily thought he was doing God service by persecuting the followers of our Saviour. It would hardly be thought that the community, and the many enlightened men who denounced this system as cruel and barbarous, were deluded on the subject. No. He was convinced in his own mind, that the delusion was on the other side of the question. But, Sir, said Mr. J. it is not sufficient for the establishment of a principle, that it is denounced by me or others.

He was prepared to prove it—First, as to mesne process. The first provision in the bill is to provide against the vexation of holding a defendant to bail upon mesne process—that is, to abolish imprisonment upon mesne process. He had in his hand an authority to prove that holding the defendant to bail previous to the trial of the cause, had its origin in judicial usurpation. The judges in England had, by legal fiction, changed the remedy which the common law had given to the plaintiff. The defendant could not be arrested and held to bail by the capias, or any other writ; he was liable only to a summons. The plaintiff was obliged to give, upon the commencement of his suit, pledges of prosecution, that it was not vexatious, but that he had an honest substantial cause of action. He was obliged to give, not John Doe and Richard Roe, but a real and sufficient security. The judges, by a cruel and absurd fiction, founded upon the pretence that the plaintiff was as pure as the angels, and the defendant as dark as Erebus, substituted John Doe and Richard Roe for the pledges—supposed again, that the summons had been served upon the defendant, and that he had refused to answer to the suit, and going on still further with their malicious, malignant falsehoods, called legal fictions, the defendant was supposed to have no property, and he was preparing to fly his country, in order to take his body by the capias, as the first step in the action upon which bail was required, or the defendant put into prison. Here is a complete summerset; the plaintiff released from all obligations on his part, viz. pledge of prosecution to secure the defendant against his malice, and the defendant deprived of his liberty wherein he had been always free from molestation. This practice of the ancient Britons, which secured to them freedom from arrest for debt, was changed by legal fictions and judicial usurpations. They did not deprive the debtor of his personal liberty upon mesne process. He thanked God that the foul stain was blotted from the escutcheon of his native State, Kentucky. No freeman of Kentucky can be enclosed for debt, nor cast into prison. You may deprive him of his property, and that is correct, where he owes it. There was a time, not long since, when it was otherwise. I have seen honest and valiant men, who had fought gallantly for their country, looking through the iron grates of a jail, for debt. But that time is past, never to return in the State of Kentucky. It had always been his opinion, and was yet his opinion, that an honest debtor, but whose misfortunes had prevented a punctual payment of his debt, to be cast into prison by his creditor, would feel absolved from all moral obligations to that man, at whose instance he had been deprived of liberty. One day; one hour, of virtuous liberty is worth an eternity of bondage. Mr. President, let me propose one question to you: Suppose I contract to pay a certain sum of money, or to do a certain thing, and it is entered into my bond, as a condition, that, if, upon failure on my part to pay the money, or to perform my covenant, I should be subject to loss of life, or limb, or liberty, and, farther, suppose I did fail, would not the courts relieve me from the penalty, as a violation of the constitution and the laws of the country? And if I cannot, under the constitution and laws, make myself a voluntary slave, how can I, under the same constitution and laws, be made an involuntary slave? I have not language, Sir, forcibly and eloquently enough to picture to you, like Sterne, the wretched victim of civil imprisonment, lying in his dungeon on his straw bed, counting the dismal days and nights of his confinement, and pining under that sickness of the heart which arises from hope deferred. But, let me ask if such confinement be not worse than the most abject slavery? It may be said, that the insolvent laws will afford relief. In addition to the other just principles and provisions of the bill, the best insolvent law which I have ever seen is incorporated into this bill, which was proposed by my worthy friend from Georgia, [Mr. BRADEN.]

But it is in vain to tell me of the insolvent laws as they now exist or can exist without the provisions of a bill like this. I have now before me a letter from Wm. Wood, of New York, who informs me, that, within less than two years, one thousand nine hundred and seventy-two persons have been received into the debtors' jail in that city. In some instances, men have been imprisoned for a sum as small as two or three dollars, with neither food nor bed except what was furnished by the Humane Society, a quart of soup for twenty-four hours; whereas the criminal, in Bridewell, receives three meals per day, a bed, and often clothing. While we applaud the exertions of these benevolent Societies, and rank Wm. Wood and its other members with the benevolent HOWARD, to be held up to mankind as worthy of imitation, we sit here with our arms folded, without seeing that these just praises to these benevolent Societies, and worthy individuals, press more indelibly the stain of cruelty and barbarism upon our National character. It is not my object to place the debtor upon any better grounds than the creditor. I wish to place them upon a perfect equality; there is as much honesty and integrity in the debtor part of the community as in the creditor part, and no more: all men, under the same circumstances, are nearly alike; give the property of the debtor to the creditor, till the debt is paid, if the property can be had; but, under all circumstances, give the debtor his liberty—he never sold that. It is beyond value or price—the law does not authorize him to dispose of it. He can only forfeit it by crime, by villainy. Imprisonment for debt, by some, is supposed to be used as coercive means. Be it so; and what then? It is very evident, that the hardships of coercion can only fall on the honest debtor.

If the debtor be a villain, and refuses to pay that which he owes, and is able to pay, his money, and the friends whom his money will gain him, will relieve him from all the hardships of your coercion—others say this imprisonment for debt is in satisfaction of the debtor's bond; that the honest debtor, too, must pay the pound of flesh; this is already answered; for I hold that a man cannot subject himself, without crime, to the loss of liberty. Mr. President, I am impressed with the belief, that, unless the relation of debtor and creditor in this wide, populous, and increasing Republic, be essentially changed, evils will sooner or later result from it, which, combined with other causes, will prove disastrous to our national liberty, happiness, and independence. I am not one of those who entertain the opinion, that nations, like individuals, necessarily pass through the stages of youth, maturity, and decline. It is true, this has been the case with many nations. We now read, in the pages of ancient history, of the splendid existence of Greece and Rome. But, in reality, they no longer exist—with many other renowned nations, they have all sunk beneath the all-devouring hand of time, and some latent principles of bad government. In very truth, we may say, that this is the freest Government on earth; and we might go farther, and say, it is the only free Government on the globe. These revolutions in States, Empires, and Kingdoms, have naturally made historians, philosophers, and statesmen, indulge in the remark, that States, like individuals, must pass through infancy, manhood, old age, and death. The causes which have produced, and are now producing, the same results, are to be found, not in the order of nature, but in some vice, some bad principle, inherent in their institutions.

When the population of Rome, on a certain critical occasion in the existence of that renowned Commonwealth, rose in rebellion, and retired to the Mons Sacer, or the Sacred Mount, it was owing entirely to the power of the creditor over his debtor; because the creditors exercised the power given them by the laws with cruel persecution and severity towards their debtors—citizen soldiers, who were revered for their public virtue, their gallantry, their public services, and could exhibit the deep scars which they had received in battle with the enemies of their country, could show to the populace the scars and stripes, fresh bleeding, inflicted upon them by their merciless creditors, by whom, with their wives and children, in some instances, they have been doomed to bondage. I have observed, that I do not believe that States and Kingdoms are doomed, by the decree of Heaven, to die as man dieth. I do not see how that consequence should follow. The materials of States and Kingdoms are always composed of the same materials at every stage of their existence, of rational and intelligent beings, moral agents, and always endowed with the same senses and same capacities by nature, and at all times capable of sustaining free institutions. The inquiry becomes more important to us, why these changes? I have no doubt that they arise from causes perfectly within our control, if we will it. Whatever has a tendency to degrade the human mind, or to infringe the unalienable rights of property, of conscience, of speech, of the press, and of personal liberty, in the smallest degree, has a tendency to destroy the best Government on earth. I will not pretend to say that imprisonment for debt alone will produce this result; but it is making great inroads upon free Government in the United States. And if, after the lapse of many years, the occasion should arrive—and Heaven grant that ages and ages may pass over before it does arrive—when some meditative Volney shall wander among the ruins, not of Palmyra and Persepolis, but of this proud Capitol, now the seat of free and enlightened deliberation, mark me, sir, if he does not trace our downfall, in part, to the fierce contentions arising between debtors and creditors. This is the time to apply the remedy to the evil, which is growing with our rapid growth, and increasing with the unparalleled increase of population. This is the time, in the vigor of our institutions, to free our legislation from this foul stain, which the law of civil improvement has stamped upon it; and to place on a secure and permanent basis the rights and happiness of our citizens. If, Mr. President, all the Empires, Kingdoms, States, and Republics, of the earth were here met with us this day in Council, in what would we be willing to compare with them? Not in extent of territory, for Russia exceeds us in that; not in wealth and grandeur; not in commerce and manufactures, for many nations equal and some surpass us in them; nor in science and arts, nor in salubrity of climate, nor fertility of soil, for in these blessings other nations may compete with us: but it would be in our free institutions that we might proudly compare with them; in civil and religious liberty; in the freedom of speech and of the press; in the right of each citizen freely to pursue his own happiness. These principles are sealed with the blood of our fathers. Let us not prove treacherous to them in one of their most essential particulars: for imprisonment for debt is a violation of those sacred rights, and perhaps the only exception to the freedom of the citizen.

In conclusion, Mr. J. said, he was unwilling, at this time, to trespass further upon the indulgence of the Senate. He had spoken without notes, and without intending to have said as much at present; upon some other occasion, in the progress of the bill, he might attempt more fully to explain the history of imprisonment for debt, and to show that it originated in judicial usurpation and legal fictions, and had been supported by tyranny. He entreated the Senators to turn their attention to the subject, and to open their ears to the cries, which were loud to those who would listen, of the unfortunate and distressed debtors, and to decide on the bill without delay.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1827.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HENDRICKS submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ceding and relinquishing, in full property, the public lands, within the limits of the new States, to the several States in which they lie.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that, in offering this resolution for the consideration of the Senate, it was, perhaps, proper for him to make a few remarks. It would be recollected, that, at the last session, in the form of an amendment to the bill proposing to graduate the price of the public lands, he had offered the same proposition, though in another form. The proposition of last session was one to which the attention of the Senate had not been very much directed. It was considered a novel proposition, a bold one, and there is little doubt that, by many accustomed to look to the public lands as a source of revenue, more important than they ever yet have been, or promise hereafter to be, it was deemed an unreasonable proposition. The bill and the amendment were laid upon the table, having received a very partial examination, and, for want of time, were permitted there to rest, without discussion, till the close of the session.

With a view of preventing this state of things, and that a full discussion of the principles contained in the proposition might be had at the present session, he had, at this early period, presented it to the Senate. The bill to graduate the price of the public lands would again be introduced, and, in all probability, he again referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. To this committee he wished to have this subject also referred. The Senate would then have the aid of their examinations and report, and be the better prepared for a vote upon the question.

Believing, as he did, that the sovereignty, freedom, and independence of the new States were much impaired, and that their equality with the old States was entirely taken away by the present condition of the public lands, as the representative of a new State he could not but feel a deep interest in the proposition, and he did believe, that, when the subject should be fully canvassed by the Senate, the constitutional argument, and the question of expediency, would alike preponderate in favor of the new States, and strongly admonish of the propriety of an absolute transfer of the public lands to the several States in which they lie. He believed that the Federal Government had no constitutional power to hold the soil of the States, except for the special purposes designated by the Constitution, such as the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings, and even for this purpose, the consent of the Legislatures of the States was necessary, by the express language of the Constitution.

He was well aware that the cessions from the States, and the pledge that the proceeds should be applied to the payment of the national debt, were usually resorted to as the authority of the General Government to hold the lands in the States; but these authorities, connected with the history of the times, which show the intentions and views of the actors of that day, instead of showing the right of this Government, might, in his opinion, be safely relied on to sustain a contrary position. It surely was the intention of Congress, and of the States, ceding waste and unappropriated lands to the Union, that the new States to be formed should be received into the Union as sovereign and independent States, and on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; and nothing could be more clear than that this was the intention of the framers of the Constitution. To maintain the equality of the States, it had even extended favors to the small States. It had in some degree balanced numbers in the large States, with political power in the small States. The equality of the representation in the Senate was an instance of this. To Senators who hold to the letter of the Constitution, and who deny to the Federal Government all powers not clearly expressed, he might safely appeal. To those who deny the power of Congress to interfere with the sacred soil of a State, so far only as might be necessary for the location of a road or canal, he might speak with the greatest confidence. If, according to their doctrine, Congress cannot thus temporarily occupy a small portion of the soil of a State, surely, they would agree with him in saying that Congress cannot permanently hold, in full property, the entire soil of the new States.

If, then, the constitutional argument should be with him, that Congress has no power to become or to remain, the lord of the soil of the new States, no one would contend that the compacts ought to be binding; for, if they are not based on the Constitution, they impose no obligation on the States. But, if even based on the Constitution, it was in the power of the new States, on the principle of free agency, to make them, or to refuse to make them. If the new States had refused to make them, then the objects attained by them would have been defeated. And what were those objects? That the new States should never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil. And if this object had not been attained by the General Government, would not the converse of the proposition have been the consequence? would not the inference have been irresistible, that the new States might have interfered with the primary disposal of the soil? Here it would, no doubt, be said, that the new States, refusing to enter into these compacts, could have been kept out of the Union. But this was ground untenable; for the new States were, by the ordinance of 1787, guaranteed admission into the Union, with a population of 60,000, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

Mr. H. said, that arguments of expediency, almost innumerable, might be urged in the present case. It seemed to him that whenever the subject should be fully examined, it would appear that an estimate had heretofore been put upon the public lands, far above their real value. The public lands had been in market upwards of forty years, and the whole receipts into the Treasury had been about thirty-six millions. We had now in market more than one hundred millions of acres, and for the last years the receipts had frequently been below a million, while the whole revenue of the country, in those years, had ranged from twenty to twenty-five millions. This view would show how small is the portion of our whole revenue derived from the public lands. This million, if indispensable to the Treasury, could easily be supplied in some other way. It could be laid on other objects of taxation, which would neither be seen nor felt, and the new States would rise to a level of equality with the old States. The new States would then be relieved from what he considered an unconstitutional and dangerous dependence on the old States and on the Union.

Nor had this proposition any thing to do with the great mass of these lands. The public lands in the new States amounted to little more than 200 millions of acres, and perhaps fifty millions of this had been given away in military bounties, and other donations, together with the public sales. The residue, subject to the action of the present land system, would be eight or nine hundred millions. With an unlimited control over this vast scope of country, the General Government ought to be satisfied.

Surely, said Mr. H. the Legislatures of the States are better qualified than the Congress of the United States, to dispose of the public lands, as the condition of their respective States require. They better know than we possibly can know, how to graduate the price agreeably to the quality, and when to give pre-emption rights and donations to actual settlers. The people of the new States should look to their own Legislatures for the regulation of the public lands, and Congress should be left to pursue, with undivided attention, the national interests submitted to their care by the Constitution of the United States.

But, there was another consideration, more weighty still. It was, that the public lands in the hands of the General Government, offered to the new States the strongest inducements to a dissolution of the Union, for, the Union dissolved, the lands would instantly become the property of the States, and all such inducements ought most carefully to be guarded against.

He had already glided further into the discussion than he intended when he rose. He hoped, that, at the proper time, the Senate would be favored with the reflections of others, much more capable of doing justice to this very important subject than himself. He would at this time no longer detain the Senate.

A resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PARRIS, for the erection of suitable buildings for the Courts of the United States, in the several States, was considered and agreed to, after having been amended, on motion of Mr. P. so as to embrace a provision for the preservation of the records of the Courts.

Mr. PARRIS remarked, that the Courts of the United States were, in many of the States, unprovided with suitable buildings, and were necessitated to depend upon the courtesy of the State Courts for the use of their rooms. It was to remedy this evil, and to procure the requisite accommodation for them, that he proposed this resolution. The preservation of the records of the Courts was a matter of great importance, and no regulation for that purpose had hitherto been made.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill to abolish imprisonment for debt was then taken up, and, after several amendments proposed by Messrs. BERRIEN, EATON, CHANDLER, HAYNE, KANE, and RIDGELY, which were agreed to, Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved that the bill be made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. TAZEVELL rose, and said that, as the bill was now open to discussion upon its details, he would say a few words, more by way of suggestion to the friends of the measure than of argument against it. Whether the object of the bill was useful or necessary, and whether the public was now displeased with the power enjoyed by the plaintiffs, were questions of great importance, and would be fully discussed at a proper stage of the progress of the bill. He did not rise to debate the question, whether the abolition of Imprisonment for Debt would be useful, necessary, or proper. It was his design only to say a few words upon the method by which it was proposed to obtain this object. His remarks would be directed to the machinery by which it was to be done. They wished to effect an abolition of Imprisonment for Debt; and how do they propose to do it? By removing from the laws of the land a certain process. Now, to every gentleman who has any knowledge of law, it is evident that this cannot be safely done. Will they say, that in taking away this single process, they can leave the laws exactly minus that process? No man of legal knowledge would say so. For the various processes are so connected, that it is impossible to disjoint one from the context without injuring and disorganizing the whole system. They are so amalgamated, that, to abstract any portion, would be to decompose and destroy the whole. To do this, without producing such an effect, was a scheme beyond the skill of the greatest statesman that ever lived, so were the laws under our system woven into and connected with each other. He would state some cases, which might—nay, which, he was confident, must arise, were this measure to go into effect. In the State of Virginia we follow the English law, which we have handed down to us by our forefathers. Real estate is not subject to execution for debt. But lands can be seized to pay a debt by an indirect process, which is equally efficient, and ensures to the creditor the real property of the debtor. For instance, you take the body of the debtor, and incarcerate him: you then say to him, you must release your lands for the payment of my demand, and until you do, you remain a prisoner. This is done by the means of a capias ad satisfaciendum. Now, if the capias ad satisfaciendum is taken away, what power is there remaining over the lands of the debtor? What safety will there be to the creditor, whose debtor is possessed of real estate alone? The body of a debtor is, by the operation of this act, to be free of imprisonment; and, it matters not whether the debt be five shillings or five thousand dollars, still the operation is uniform. But, if an individual agree to do a specific act, and fail in its performance, you have jurisdiction over his body, because this Bill does not extend to Chancery cases. Then the operation of it will be this: The man is released who owes five shillings in money; but the man who agrees to do a specific thing, not worth half that value, may be imprisoned. Is this an equal operation? Is it not partial in the extreme? These two statements, of what he believed would be the operation of the Bill, were merely given to illustrate the opinion which he entertained, of the operation of the Bill as it now stood before the Senate. The Bill would effect, perhaps, too much, and certainly in some respects, too little—probably more in some points, and less in others, than its friends desired. Mr. T. therefore, submitted to the advocates of the Bill, whether it would not be better to make some general arrangement to cover all the ground which the title of the Bill seemed to indicate, by making some general arrangement by which the exemption from imprisonment should be universal. He also suggested that it was dangerous to encumber the Bill with all the machinery under which it now labored. In the present shape of the Bill, they would assuredly do more or less than they intended. He had not risen to argue the principles of the Bill, at this period, and he merely threw out these reflections, in order that the attention of gentlemen should be directed to what he thought faults in the Bill. In its present form, he could not vote for it—nor would he pledge himself to do so in any case—but should it pass, it would be desirable to all, that its provisions should be calculated to arrive at the object in view.

Mr BERRIEN observed, that, under the circumstances that the gentleman who had introduced the bill had moved its postponement, it was hardly in order to discuss its merits. But, if it was advisable to postpone the details, it was, nevertheless, important to examine the principles of the measure, and he was particularly desirous to meet the objections made to it by the gentleman from Virginia. He was aware that any innovations upon existing laws of long standing, were more or less dangerous, and there was always reasonable doubt, whether they might not trench on existing institutions. And, it was highly to be desired, that the collective knowledge and experience of the Senate should be brought into action, to prevent, in completing a salutary measure, the occurrence of any such evils. But, if they were to refrain from any provision which the good of society, and the interests of humanity required, because there was danger that they might make innovations on existing laws—if they were to refrain from tearing from the statute-book, a leaf that stained and disgraced it, fearing, that in so doing, they should trench on the system of laws, of which it had for ages made part—if an acknowledged evil of no common magnitude were to be sanctioned and perpetuated, because, to abolish it, implied a danger of creating confusion in the practice—then might any amelioration be prevented. He knew not whether these effects would arise out of the present bill; but he knew, if such were the principles upon which Congress acted, then they were doomed never to advance, but to sit idly down under all the evils of the present system. If the bill now under consideration threatened any of those inconveniences that had been enumerated by the gentleman from Virginia, it was the duty of his brethren of the Senate to give their assistance in checking them, and render more perfect the bill, by placing around it all the requisite safeguards. For himself, he was in favor of the bill. Its principles met his full approbation. He had long looked upon imprisonment for debt as an evil that disgraced a free, an enlightened, and humane community; and from such motives he had acquiesced in the report of the Committee, of which he was a member, in its favor. He was not bigoted in his preference for the bill now before the Senate; nor did he arrogate that its form was the most perfect. In his adherence to the principle, however, he was firm. The bill was now subjected to the investigation of his brother Senators, and, from a body comprising so much learning and intelligence, he might hope that its provisions would receive all the necessary modification. He, therefore, wished that the opponents of the measure would examine it thoroughly—not to cavil and find fault—but to direct and improve it. So far as he was concerned, he held himself ready to accede to the bill as it might be modified by his colleagues. He was not pledged to it in its present form; but wished that the lights of others might be shed upon it, that all the good it promised might be realized and as little of the evil, with which it was charged in anticipation, might arise from its operation. With such views, he might be allowed to say that he was in no way apprehensive that the difficulties named by the Senator from Virginia, would be experienced. By the laws of Virginia, lands were not subject to a direct process; but they were liable to be seized by the indirect process, which that gentleman had explained. Now this right, or practice, was not touched by this bill. It provides that a plaintiff can, by making oath that the defendant keeps his lands in such a condition that they cannot be levied on—a complaint which every citizen has a right to make—which becomes the subject of a trial, and, if found to be true, his original right to issue a ca. sa. recurs; and thus, for all useful purposes, that process is retained, while, only where its operation is oppressive, is it abolished. It does not, in fact, touch upon the ancient mode of recovering land by taking the body by a capias ad satisfaciendum. It makes that process milder, and more accordant with the principles of justice and humanity. He did not wish to go farther at this time. He was desirous to hear the opinions of his coadjutors upon the measure; and he solicited the aid and counsel of those associated with him in pointing out the best and safest method of reducing the principle to practice.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was, although not intending to join it, highly pleased to hear the discussion upon this subject. He merely rose to offer a few remarks upon the objections offered by the gentleman from Virginia. That gentleman had done—what no one could be more sensible than Mr. J. that he was able to do—in making out a plausible, and even probable, case of hardship, under the bill for the abolition of imprisonment for debt. It amounted to this: that one man might sell a quantity of land to another, who, subsequently would not, or perhaps could not, pay for it; and that, in this case, the creditor must lose his demand. To this objection, said Mr. J., I have two answers. I admit that there might happen such a case of hardship. I go farther. I allow that such cases would undoubtedly happen. My first answer to the objection is this: The law is prospective in its operation, and the seller would, for his own safety, not only take the obligation of the purchaser for the payment, but he would retain a hold upon the title in default of satisfaction of his demand. He believed no gentleman would, even under present circumstances, sell a valuable estate in Virginia, and not retain some security upon the property for the fulfilment of the obligation entered into by the purchaser. Whether would it be better that this law should not pass, affecting as it does the freedom and happiness of thousands, or that an occasional case of hardship—and for which there was an adequate remedy—arising generally from the negligence of the seller to his own interests, should occur? If the gentleman from Virginia was disposed to make any motion by which the liabilities on the part of the debtor should be increased so as to protect the creditor from any imaginable injury, he was perfectly willing to accede to it. But in passing an act which the happiness of millions required, was it the fault of Congress that Virginia was not treated in the same manner as the other States? Nor was it to be maintained, that some partial inconvenience, or occasional hardship, must stand in the way of a measure calculated to redeem our country from a disgraceful violation of the rights of man, and the dictates of Christianity, freedom, and benevolence. He had one more remark, in answer to the gentleman from Virginia. If the case which he has stated be a hardship, what will he do with the thousands of cases in which an honest debtor, unable, by some unforeseen and unavoidable misfortune, is deprived of the means of paying his debts, and who is liable to be imprisoned, at the mercy of a hard-hearted and vindictive creditor? Can these cases be weighed against those possible ones to which he has referred us? Now, if the gentleman will frame a bill, by which the honest and unfortunate debtor shall be exempted from imprisonment, I will, in turn, agree to one by which the rich and fraudulent debtor shall be punished—I care not how severely. Yet the cases on his side are but one to a thousand of those that would be relieved by the abolition of this barbarous practice, from undeserved and inevitable wretchedness. To him, the character of the country seemed deeply involved in this measure. The doctrines of Christianity pointed out its adoption; for it was one of its first principles, that none but the guilty should suffer punishment. If this bill passed, it would be a triumph of principle; for it was based on the best and most humane principles. That it might do some partial injury, and create some minor inconvenience, he was not prepared to deny. But, when was ever a great change effected without some partial evil? The ingenuity of any individual would not be put to a very difficult task, to prove, that the putting down of any institution, long established, would produce injury to some one. This, however, is no substantial argument to oppose to a measure whose principles are founded in the dictates of truth and humanity. He was, however, fully convinced that, when the gentleman reflected on the benefits and injuries likely to arise out of this bill, he would be led by the acuteness of his judgment to a conviction that there was a vast balance in favor of the former, and be satisfied with the beneficence of its general operations. Mr. J. observed, in conclusion, that, as his friends were still desirous of putting off the consideration of the subject, he would alter his motion, and move that it be made the order of the day for Friday se'night, when he hoped that the Senate would be prepared to come openly to the discussion, and finally reject or adopt the bill.

Imprisonment for Debt.

Mr. TAZEVELL remarked, that he had, on several former occasions, stated his impressions firmly and strongly upon the measure proposed by this bill. His opinions were now the same—he had seen no reason to alter them. He had, in what he had said a short time since, suggested to the advocates of the bill the objections that had occurred to him, in order that they might put their object on its proper footing. Do they wish to abolish imprisonment for debt. So they say. But they have pitched upon the process of capias ad satisfaciendum, and think to attain their object by removing it. But they are in error. By this method they destroy their own object. If they are desirous to persist in the path they have marked out, they may. But were I a friend of the bill, which assuredly I am not—even were I as strong in its favor as my friend from Georgia, I should be averse to its present form. I, being opposed to it, shall offer no amendment; for I have been too long familiar with legislation not to have learned that amendments offered by an opponent, are little heeded, and are generally looked upon in a hostile light. They say that they do not intend to destroy the liability of real estate, but to abolish imprisonment for debt. And although they are, in my opinion, entirely in error, in endeavouring to reconcile these two positions, yet this is not the time to enter into the broad discussion of those fallacies. I say again, that the object I have in view, in the remarks I have made, is to call the attention of the defenders of the bill, to those means by which it can be made capable of attaining the end they propose. If they wish to go on, as it is, I can only say that it must meet with my opposition.

Mr. VAN BUREN, in the commencement of his remarks, spoke in so low a tone that the Reporter could not distinctly hear him. He was understood to say, that, if there was any ground for opposing the measure, it was that it might interfere with the laws of the States. The bill had formerly been before the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he was a member, and had been found full of difficulties. Its importance dictated that it should be carefully investigated. He was, however, of opinion, that the objection started by the gentleman from Virginia was founded upon an imaginary difficulty. He recollected that clause to which he took exception was formerly proposed by a member from Virginia. It went to provide, that, whenever real estate was removed by the debtor from liability to execution, the creditor was restored to his right of issuing a capias ad satisfaciendum; and the debtor was deprived of the benefit of the act, and the liberties of the jail were taken away; so that the creditor in Virginia would have an increased security over the debtor by this provision. Mr. V. B. had not read the bill this year, but believed it mainly the same. He did not apprehend that the difficulty pointed out by the gentleman from Virginia would be experienced. He was friendly to the bill in general, and thought it a good measure; nor was he apprehensive of any evil that would result from it.

Mr. KANE said that, as he was friendly to the measure, he hoped the details of the bill would be so arranged as fully to meet the objects in view. The gentleman from Virginia had stated objections which the present form of the bill did not remove. He wished to incorporate into the bill a provision, by which the objections of the gentleman from Virginia might be removed, which might, he thought, be done by altering the phraseology in such a manner as to provide that the debtor shall not be imprisoned unless he refuses to give up his property, or be guilty of a fraud.

Mr. HAYNE, after a few preliminary remarks, observed, that he thought the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois would not altogether meet the objections. He would suggest that a better method would be to strike out all but the 6th section of the bill. By striking out all but this section, it would be allowed to extend to all cases, in courts in which the debtor was liable to process; who, by filing a list of his property, and surrendering it to the Clerk of the Court, would be released from all liability of process thereafter. This would meet the object of the proviso as to fraud, and cover the whole ground. He thought, if the bill was in this manner amended, the most important objections would be removed. There was another view he had taken of it, which he would now submit. He thought the benefits of the bill would be much increased, if a provision were made for a uniformity of process in all the States—that is, an uniformity in each State with the process of the Courts of the State. The process, for instance, in Kentucky, was regulated by one rule, that in South Carolina by another, and so on, through the various States. His proposition would be, to make the process of the United States' Courts conform to that of the Courts of the State in which they were located. He did not rise to discuss the merits of the bill; but as its details were now under consideration, he threw out these suggestions, as tending, in his opinion, to increase its value.

Mr. MACON said he had no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina. But the question was, whether the plan proposed by the bill was the best. Perfection, he knew, was not to be expected from human nature. All the States had made alterations in their laws after being admitted into the Union. The evils which often existed in their laws were not discovered until custom had made men familiar to them. But evils could not be remedied at once, for it wanted time to discover them. As we go on we see our errors and faults; and he hoped his friend from Kentucky would not again, with his usual complacency, postpone the bill until it is lost in a press of other business, as has been the case on former occasions. Mr. M. thought he had better bring it up now, than put it off, and put it off, until the business became more urgent. There was at present but little to do, and the opportunity was a good one to push this measure to an issue.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, expressed himself highly pleased at a prospect that the bill was about to be fairly discussed. He hailed the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, as the dawning of a disposition to restore to Kentucky the rights of which she had so long been deprived. He hoped that unfortunate and patriotic State was about to be reinstated in the immunities of which she had been shorn, refused the right of making her own laws, and restricted by legal constructions, with a Solon to legislate for the People, in the character of a Circuit and District Judge. Mr. J. here alluded to the difficulties under which Kentucky had long suffered, and the evils, political and domestic, to which she had been subjected. He then moved the postponement of the bill to Friday next, then to be made the order of the day; which was agreed to.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1827.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. BENTON having obtained leave to introduce a bill for the graduation of the price of the Public Lands, prefaced it with the following remarks:

I rise Mr. President, for the purpose of making the motion for which I gave notice on Thursday last—a motion for leave to introduce a bill to graduate the price of the public lands. In asking this leave, for the fifth time, Sir, I do not deem it necessary to go into any general exposition of the merits of my bill; that was done very fully about two years ago; and it is not my intention to repeat now, any thing which I then said. But there is one point of view in which the character of the bill has been misunderstood, and for the better understanding of which, I should be glad to be indulged in saying a few words. It has been thought, by some, that this bill was of a sectional or local character, calculated for the peculiar benefit of the new States in the West, and not intended to do any good to the older States in the East, and the Union at large. If such was the fact, Mr. President, I believe I should have no necessity, certainly no inclination, to conceal or deny it: for I have had too many proofs of the paternal kindness of the Senate towards these young States, to fear that any measure favorable to them, would be the less favored in this Chamber on that account. But such is not the fact, Sir. My bill is not of a sectional or local character. It is not intended for the exclusive or peculiar benefit of the new States in the West, but comprehends within its liberal scope, the essential interest of every State in the Union. Every State, Mr. President, is essentially interested in having the public debt paid off, and its citizens relieved from the load of taxes which they now bear on account of it. My bill is, Sir, intended to facilitate the accomplishment of these objects; and any bill which shall have that effect, will be admitted, I apprehend, to be a very different thing from a piece of sectional or local legislation.

I believe, Mr. President, that, by the operation of this bill, in conjunction with other measures now in force, the public debt may be paid off in five years, and the people relieved from the annual levy of twelve or fifteen millions of taxes. I say five years; and paradoxical as such a declaration may seem, I believe it is not only true, but that the plainest statement of my proposition will amount to a demonstration of its truth. For example: We owe a debt of sixty-seven millions, bearing an interest of three millions, and we have a government to support which costs us ten millions. To meet these demands, we have a revenue of a million and a half, derived from sales of public lands, and twenty-three millions more, taking an average of three years, derived from duties on imports, bank dividends, and a few other sources. Now, it is clear that the revenue derived from duties and other sources, exclusive of the lands, would be sufficient of itself to defray the current expenses of the Government, and to extinguish the debt in five years, provided its whole amount could be applied to these two objects; and that it might be so applied is equally clear, provided the interest of the debt, for that period, could be raised from the lands. This, then, is my object; and in proposing to accomplish it by means of the bill which I am asking leave to introduce, I do not consider myself as attempting any new thing, or proposing any innovation upon the ancient policy of this government, but only as endeavoring to use these lands for the precise purpose for which they were ceded to the Congress of the Confederation above forty years ago. It is well known, Mr. President, that these lands, or the greater part of them, were, long since, ceded to the General Government, by different States, to be “disposed of” for the payment of the public debt; and it is equally well known, that, instead of being so “disposed of,” they have, on the contrary, been so reserved from sale, and kept out of market; so hugged up in the arms, and treasured away in the bosom of the Federal Government, that upwards of nine-tenths of them remain to this day unsold! and that enough has not been received from their sales to reimburse the federal treasury for its expenses in the acquisition and management of them! So far from paying the public debt, they have not yielded the one-fifth part of the interest which has accrued upon it; and the States which made so magnificent a provision for the discharge of that revolutionary legacy, after paying about one hundred and fifty millions in interest, with money derived from other sources, have the mortification, at the end of nearly half a century, to see the debt about as large as it was, and themselves still recurred to to furnish ten or twelve millions more, from other sources, to meet its annual interest, and a fraction of the capital! Such a result, Mr. President, announces a great fault in the administration of this fund, so patriotically given for a purpose to which it has not been applied; and I have no hesitation in affirming, that this fault lies in the policy of holding up these lands for a future rise and a higher price, instead of selling them off promptly for their actual value, as recommended by President Washington and Secretary Hamilton, in the year ‘91. These great men, when they were at the head of affairs, twice recommended to Congress to “dispose” of these lands as soon as possible, for their real worth; and the sum of twenty cents per acre was fixed by General Hamilton as their average value. I mention this sum particularly, Mr. President, and with emphasis, that gentlemen who have been astonished that my scale of prices should descend as low as to a minimum of twenty-five cents per acre, may henceforth dedicate a part of their amazement to the plan of General Hamilton, which rose no higher than to an average of twenty! His report to this effect, and the two messages of President Washington recommending it, with the manner in which his plan was defeated, and the consequent injury to the country, were fully insisted upon by me on a former occasion, and will not be further adverted to now.

But I wish to avail myself of the authority of the great names of Washington and Hamilton, in this my adventurous attempt to revive their policy, and to achieve a victory where they had sustained a defeat. I wish to have it known that my bill is bottomed on a principle which has received the high sanction of their approbation, and which the experience of six and thirty years has proved to be correct. I wish to have it seen that, like them, I am in favor of sinking our price to the quality of the land, instead of waiting, indefinitely, for its quality to rise to our price. To do this, my bill proposes, after the public sales are over, and all the choice lands are sold, which command more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre to offer the remainder, for five consecutive years, at an annual periodical reduction of price, at the rate of twenty-five cents per acre per annum, until every tract shall find a purchaser, or fall into the class of refuse lands. In this way every tract would graduate itself, and find a purchaser when it fell to its value. In five years every district would be picked five times over; every saleable part would be culled out and taken up; and the refuse, which would not sell for twenty-five cents per acre, and which would otherwise lie idle for centuries in the hands of the Federal Government, would be disposed of in donations to the poor, and in cessions to the States in which they lie for promoting the education of the people and the improvement of the country.—Such, Mr. President, is the plan of my bill; and, in proposing it to the Senate, I have the satisfaction to be able to say that it is not an untried experiment, now to be ventured upon for the first time, but that it has been tried in one of the States—the State of Tennessee—with the most complete and gratifying success, disposing of all her arable land in a few years, and bringing more money into the Treasury than it had received in the half century preceding. Doubtless the same system will operate equally well on federal lands; at least that it will make our two hundred and sixty millions of acres produce as much as will meet the interest of the public debt for five years, which, on the basis of an annual reduction of thirteen millions of the capital, will not exceed the sum total of nine or ten millions.

Thus, Mr. President, in the brief space of five years, the whole public debt may be paid off, (for what is not redeemable, is purchasable in market,) and the United States present the imposing spectacle of a great nation without a national debt. Such a spectacle would command the admiration of the civilized world, and would impart a moral power to this Republic, greater than the possession of fleets and armies could ever give her. But the advantages of such a position would not be limited to the acquisition of moral power, and to the enjoyment of foreign admiration. Other benefits, of a more direct and sensible kind, would immediately result, and diffuse themselves among the people. The extinction of the debt would enable the Federal Government to dispense with more than half of its present revenue, and, of course, to abolish taxes in the shape of duties upon comforts and necessaries, to that amount. The blessings of such a dispensation would need no recommendation from arts of speech, to render them acceptable to the people,—at least to the people of the grain-growing and planting States of this Union, with whose condition I am best acquainted. Unhappily, they have at home, in the decaying condition of too many of their towns and villages—in the melancholy aspect of too many of their farms and country houses—a sufficient commentator upon the amount of their taxes, and the necessity of relief. But, to gentlemen who dwell in more favored parts—to Senators who come from the sea-board of the East, where commerce collects her accumulated treasures, where multiplied banks diffuse an abundant paper currency, and where the policy of the Federal Government causes to be expended the chief part of the revenue which is elsewhere collected—to such gentlemen it may not be an act of supererogation to intimate, that the North American of the United States is among the most heavily taxed animals of his species; and that he occupies, in this respect, a middle position between the Englishman, who is taxed to the ultimate point of human endurance, and the Frenchman, who is not very far behind him. I make this suggestion, Mr. President, upon the authority of one of the most acute and practised statesmen of the age—one of whom we have long known, and under various titles, but best and longest under his old Republican and Revolutionary appellation of Citizen Talleyrand.—This veteran statesman, in a late debate in the French Chamber of Peers, took occasion to class the burthens of the English, French, and Americans, in the order in which I have stated them; and, strange as his classification appeared to me at first, I must confess that subsequent reflection and observation, much talking with the people, and two or three thousand miles of annual travelling through eight or ten different States, has brought me to acquiesce in its truth—at least so far as the aforesaid North American of the grain-growing and planting States of this Union is concerned. The secret of this heavy taxation, Mr. President, lies in the fact, that the citizens of the United States are subject to be taxed, at the same moment, by two separate and distinct Governments, without having, what the people of Asia under the like circumstances once demanded from Mark Anthony, a double set of seasons and of crops to answer the duplicate demand. They are taxed by the Federal Government, in duties upon imports, to the amount of twenty odd millions, which go into the Treasury, and eight or ten millions more, in the shape of mercantile profit, upon that sum, which go into the pockets of the retail dealers. By the State Governments they are taxed, as nearly as can be ascertained, about twenty millions more, in all the different forms of State taxes, county taxes, city taxes, corporation taxes, poor taxes, taxes upon licenses, working upon roads, serving on juries, supporting churches and charitable institutions, and a long list of et ceteras. The aggregate of the whole annual levy, under the exactions of the duplicate governments, may well be, as supposed by Citizen Talleyrand, about fifty millions of dollars. An enormous sum, Mr. President, for a population of twelve millions to pay, even if they were all tax-paying people, which they are not; for some are paupers, and pay nothing; many are poor, and pay but little; and two millions are slaves, and are paid for by their owners. I repeat, Mr. President, that fifty millions would be an enormous tax for this population to pay, even if the burthen of it was equally diffused, which it is not: for it is incontestable that an undue proportion of it is levied upon that quarter of the Union whose labor contributes most to the support of this Government, and whose citizens receive least from it—that quarter which is drained at once by the conjoint operations of Federal legislation, and the course of trade—that quarter, whose cotton, tobacco, and rice, constituting seven-eighths of the agricultural, and three-fifths of the total exports of the country, gives employment to numerous ships and mariners of the East, enriches many of their merchants, and builds up their cities, and brings back the chief part of the imports which pay the twenty odd millions of revenue into the Treasury, which are elsewhere expended. Still the fifty millions are paid, and must be paid. It is a levy which no force can resist, no art elude. The Sheriff is collector for one Government, and necessity for the other; and both agents are equally inexorable. One commits the body to prison for non-payment, and the other applies to it, not the old Roman interdiction of fire and water, but the Federal interdiction of food and clothes. It is in vain to say, that the duties are levied upon articles of consumption, and that it is optional with the citizen to use them or not. It is mockery to talk in that way: for the duties of which I speak, are levied upon articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, and such as no family can live without—upon sugar, teas, and coffee; upon salt and spices; upon blankets and linens; upon the working tools of the well man, and the physic of the sick one. It is in vain to speak of more economy, and more retrenchment. These negative aids of family revenue have long since been in requisition. Every family that lives upon its own means, has long since been reduced to its "peace establishment"—to its minimum of expenditure, and its peasimum of enjoyment. Still, every one has to yield its proportion of these thirty odd millions to the Federal Government, and 20 odd to the States. For every hundred dollars worth of foreign goods or groceries which a family buys, it pays, in addition to the value of the article, a tax of thirty-five or forty dollars to the Federal Government, besides another little tax of ten or twelve dollars upon that sum, in the shape of mercantile profit, to the retail dealer. The amount of this superincumbent, superstructure, and, I believe I might say, supercrescental tax, in the shape of mercantile profit upon taxes, cannot be less than one-third per centum, or eight or ten millions upon our present Custom-house revenue—a sum in itself four times as great as that direct tax of the year '98, which overturned the President of this Union, ruined his party, and marked an era in the history of this country, which is still referred to as one of oppression on the part of the Government, and of suffering on the part of the people.

Public Lands.

I hope the Senate will not misunderstand me. I do not draw this picture for the purpose of exciting dissatisfaction with our present rate of duties. I am one of those who contributed to establish it, and am willing for it to remain unaltered until the occasions which called for it are passed away. But it is not to be dissembled that thirty millions upon articles of consumption, in addition to twenty millions upon property in possession, is an enormous load for our population to carry, and that the Congress which shall relieve them of one-half or two-thirds of it, will confer a national benefaction, which will entitle it to the glorious appellation of "blessed." The Congress of 1832-3 may be that most enviable body, provided the Congress of 1827-8 shall make itself participator in its glory by laying the foundation of its work. To do that we must go to work at once, and in earnest, upon these public lands. We must rouse them from their dormant state. We must infuse new life and animation into the sales. We must give them an accelerated movement in the path of their original destination. We must force them to yield at least as much as will meet the interest of the debt for five years. In a word, Mr. President, this Congress must pass my bill. Then may we hail the approach of that auspicious day when the national debt shall cease to exist, and when the tariff shall be taken up, not to alarm and distract the country, not to array one half of the Union against the other—but to reconcile all hearts, to excite all hopes, and to call forth universal benedictions. Then shall we see the day when this subject, so pregrant with the seeds of bitter contention, shall be taken up with unanimous consent, and for the joyful purpose of expunging a long list of articles from its ample catalogue. What these articles shall be, is not for us to say, but for that most happy Congress which shall have the grateful task to perform, and which shall come fresh from the body of the people, instructed by their wishes, and amenable to their will. But, if I could be permitted to speculate on a measure still five years ahead, and to indicate a few of the articles which might be struck from the list, I would put into the first class all the articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, which are now taxed for the sole purpose of raising revenue, and without comprehending the further object of encouraging the home production of a rival article. This class would comprehend coffee, which pays a duty of five cents a pound, and costs the consumer six or seven cents more, in consequence of that duty: teas, which pay duties from twenty-five to fifty cents a pound, and cost the consumer from thirty odd to seventy odd cents more: spices, which pay one or two hundred per cent. and cost the consumer double; and linens, which incur an advance of forty or fifty per cent. on the twenty-five per cent. ad valorem which they bring to the Government. These articles and others of the same class, which are taxed for the sole purpose of raising revenue, would be expunged from the list with unanimous consent, the instant the Treasury could dispense with their proceeds. The next class would comprehend the catalogue of necessities partially made at home, and now subjected to duty for the double purpose of raising revenue and cherishing domestic industry. In this class is included salt, the duty on which takes thirty cents a bushel out of the pocket of the consumer, and puts twenty into the coffers of the Government: sugars, which take four, five, and six cents a pound from the consumer, and give three, four, and five cents to the Government; and blankets, which cost us forty or fifty per cent. more, for twenty-five per cent. ad valorem which they put into the Treasury. Upon the question of abolishing the duties upon these articles, and others of the same class, some diversity of opinion might prevail; but the rule which should govern in every case, is, to my mind a clear one, viz: to abolish the duties upon articles of prime necessity or ordinary comfort, which are not made at home at all, or not made in sufficient quantity to merit rational protection, and to leave them upon articles of taste and luxury, and upon such rival productions of foreign countries, as our security in time of war, and our general independence as a nation, require to be made at home. An abolition of one half the present duties, upon these principles, would not only relieve the country from a vast burthen, but would have the happy effect of reconciling all parts of the Union to the continuance of the tariff for the combined object of supporting the Government and protecting our useful manufactories.

These few remarks, I trust, Mr. President, will be sufficient to satisfy gentlemen that the bill which I ask leave to introduce, is not of a local or sectional character—that it is not designed for the exclusive or peculiar benefit of the new States in the West—but that, howsoever beneficial its enactment may prove to these young States, in extricating them from the condition of tenants to the Federal Government—giving them the use of all the soil within their limits, for settlement and taxation—multiplying the number of their freeholders—raising many indigent families from poverty and wretchedness to comfort and independence—and converting some millions of acres of refuse and idle land into an active fund for the promotion of the great cause of education and internal improvement—it would, at the same time, be eminently advantageous to the old States, and to the whole Union, by hastening the extinction of the public debt, and the consequent release of the people from twelve or fifteen millions of taxes.

Mr. BARTON said, he did not rise to oppose granting leave for the introduction of this bill, but to make some explanation in relation to it. It was not needful to tell the Senate that the propositions alluded to, of Washington and Hamilton, were made at a time when the Government was in great want of funds, when they were looking about for means to supply immediate necessities, and seizing upon every thing that promised to yield them. That other means were found, was well known, and that the practicability of the plan was never tested. He believed the Government would reap no benefit from it, however it might be beneficial to individuals. Indeed, there had been some practical experience of the effect of such a plan, as one of a similar nature had been adopted in the State of Alabama, where companies of persons had been banded together to purchase the lands; and the effect had been that the cultivator of the soil had paid much more than the speculators. Although no one could hold the character and opinions of General Hamilton in higher respect than he did; still, he believed that the proposition which his colleague had alluded to, was a mere temporary plan, hit upon at a season when the country was struggling for existence. As to any effect that the plan might have on the increase of settlements, he did not think any such result would arise from it. He believed, as soon as necessity required, the land would be settled and filled up; and he did not wish that any neglect should cause them to rise to an exorbitant price, of which he thought there was no fear, under the present arrangement. But he felt confident that the graduation of the prices was impracticable. It was, he knew, but just, that a graduation should take place, so that the price of the lands should be apportioned to their quality; but this was now impossible, since it was not adopted at the commencement. It ought to have been infused into the system at the beginning: the idea of graduating the price of lands was a pleasing and specious one. It was not the project itself that he opposed; it was the inevitable effect which he looked to. The operation of the measure, which could only be looked upon as a scale of depreciation, would be to delay all sales until the expiration of the five years designated in the bill; and then the same speculations would occur as had taken place in Alabama. The surveys that had as yet been made were merely superficial, and it would be impossible to ascertain the quality of the interior lots. Great misrepresentations have been made to the Western people, in newspapers and pamphlets, asserting that our land system "cost the Government upwards of 33 1-3 per cent. on the amount collected." The official reports from the Treasury, show that the whole expense of selling the nineteen millions and upwards of lands, heretofore sold, including the expense of surveying, was only 3 and 6-10ths per cent. on the amount of the sales: and this was cheaper than our revenue from commerce, which had been estimated at about 5 per cent.

One word more and he should close the few remarks which he designed now to offer. His colleague had noticed the land system in Tennessee. There was formerly an arrangement between the United States and Tennessee, in which it was stipulated that Tennessee, should not undersell the General Government. This arrangement went on for several years, until the best lands in that State were disposed of, as it was more populous than most of the other new States. All the States' lands being sold but the coves in the mountains, and other waste strips, the restriction was removed. He was not long since in Tennessee, and knew that persons were entering such pieces of lands at one cent per acre, which the State was willing to dispose of, because they became, after sale, taxable, like other lands. The plan only operated after the other lands were sold out; and there was nothing plainer, than that, if Tennessee could sell her lands at twenty-five cents, it would operate to increase her population. He should not oppose the introduction of the bill, because it was not customary; but he should, at a proper time, express himself more fully on its merits.

The bill was then ordered to a second reading.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. NOBLE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the continuation of the Cumberland Road; which he prefaced by remarking, that, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, the first bill for the construction of the Cumberland Road was passed, when Congress clearly held out to the people of the west that it should be continued. The bill which he now offered called on Congress to redeem the pledge then made, and take the preliminary steps towards a continuation of this great public work.

The bill was read and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted on Friday, by Mr. HENDRICKS, in relation to a cession of the Public Lands to the States in which they lie, was then considered.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that, as the Senate was very thin, and as this was an important proposition, he hoped the resolution would be laid on the table until after the holidays.

Mr. HENDRICKS observed that, he saw no cause for the delay, as no principle was to be settled by this resolution. It was simply a motion for an inquiry, by the Committee of Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that it would be injurious to have an idea get abroad that the lands were to be given away. He therefore urged his motion.

Mr. SMITH's motion was carried, 19 to 12.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the reserved Salt Springs, in the State of Missouri, to be exposed to sale, was read a second time.

Mr. BARTON, in reference to this bill, remarked, that so much had formerly been said on this subject, that much explanation was not necessary. The whole number of Springs reserved in the State of Missouri, were 34. Of these, 12 had been taken by the State, and were in operation. The remainder were considered of so small value, as to render it unnecessary to make any distinction between them and other territory. There was reserved around each of these Springs, however weak, a section of land, which was now lying waste. The neighboring inhabitants plundered these sections of their timber; and, if they were not shortly disposed of, their value would be much injured. It was a fact that a sufficient number of Springs had been reserved by the State to prevent a monopoly of the manufacture; and there was, therefore, no objection to disposing of these inferior Springs.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

The Senate adjourned to Thursday.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1827.

There was no business transacted this day to give rise to debate. The Senate adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1827.

The bill to authorize the cancelling of a certain bond therein mentioned, was read a second time.

Mr. KING asked for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN called for the reading of the petition, which he said would fully explain the object of the bill. The petition having been read, Mr. V. B. made a few explanatory remarks.

Mr. CHANDLER proposed some questions in relation to the bill: Whereupon,

Mr. BERRIEN made some additional explanations, from which it appeared that the negroes (39 in number) referred to in the bill, were part of a cargo of negroes found on board a Spanish vessel which was captured by a revenue cutter of the United States, went into Savannah and libelled for an alleged violation of the slave acts of the United States. The Spanish Consul set up a claim to the vessel and cargo, as the property of Spanish subjects. The Portuguese Consul set up a claim in behalf of certain subjects of Portugal; and the Captain of a privateer, sailing under a South American flag, advanced another claim. Upon investigation, it was found that the negroes had been plundered from several Spanish and Portuguese ships, by a South American privateer. The suits growing out of these claims were prosecuted in different Courts of the United States; and, after the lapse of eight years, were finally decided by the Supreme Court, at the last term. The Portuguese claim was rejected because no owners appeared; and the Spanish claim was reduced in amount to thirty-nine negroes. The claimants were also required to give bond, with security, for the removal of the negroes from the United States. The other portion of the negroes was sent to Liberia at the expense of the Government. Meanwhile, the negroes adjudicated to the Spanish claimants had formed ties in this country, and were unwilling to be carried to the West Indies. The petitioner, from motives of humanity alone, purchased them from the Spanish owners, for the sum of $1,500. He had also paid for salvage $4,500, to Marshals $6000, and to the Proctors in the different Courts between 2 and $3,000; the aggregate amount being greater than the value of the slaves. The petitioner had also offered the negroes to the Colonization Society, for transportation to Liberia, but the funds of the Society did not enable them to accept the offer. The petitioner, now, therefore, prayed that the bond given for the removal of the slaves from the United States may be cancelled, in order that they may remain in a state of mitigated slavery in Georgia, where they are well treated and content.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate adjourned over to Thursday.

MILITARY ROAD IN MAINE.

The following resolution, offered on Monday by Mr. CHANDLER, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making a Military Road from the mouth of the Mattawomkiag, where it empties into the Penobscot river, to Mars' Hill, in the State of Maine."

Mr. CHANDLER said that a military post must eventually be established at or near the termination of the road contemplated in the resolution. All he asked was, that the expediency of constructing the road should be inquired into by the committee.

After some remarks on the resolution, from Messrs. SANFORD, NOBLE, and PARRIS, Mr. ROWAN, who objected to the resolution on the ground that the construction of a military road, as such, would excite the jealousy of our British Canadian neighbors, moved that the resolution be laid on the table; which motion was lost.

Mr. HARRISON observed, he could not acquiesce in the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, that the designation of the proposed road, as a military road, would give offence to the British Canadian Government. They could not take umbrage at the construction of a military road more than at the establishment of a fort or an arsenal. Both the British and the American Governments have made warlike preparations on the frontier. Ships have been built since the late war on the lakes, and military posts established. He was not sufficiently well acquainted with the localities of the country, to say whether the military road contemplated in the resolution was necessary. But he was well aware that the Senator from Maine [Mr. CHANDLER] was acquainted with those localities, and he was disposed to confide in his opinion, as to the expediency of the road, at least so far as to authorize an inquiry on the subject by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was then agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt, as formerly amended, came up as the special order of the day.

Mr. M'KINLEY was, he said, favorable to the principle of the bill, but submitted to the Senate, whether the 5th section was not at war with the principle of the bill. He, himself, could see no reason why a preference should be given to judgments recovered in another State; and he moved, therefore, to strike out the following section, to wit:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in all actions brought upon a judgment recovered in another State, it shall be lawful to require bail on mesne process, and the plaintiff may have his execution against the body of the defendant or defendants, as if this act had not passed."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, would not oppose the motion for striking out this section. He was never partial to it, and he had assented to its adoption only in compliance with the expressed wishes of some members of the Senate.

The amendment was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, several verbal amendments were adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose, and said, that an opportunity was now offered to those opposed to the bill to present their views; and he would be gratified if his respected friend, the Senator from South Carolina, would now give his reasons against the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed that, however much he might be disposed, on other occasions, to gratify his honorable friend, the Senator from Kentucky, he was not now willing to go into the discussion of the question. Ten years ago, when this subject was before the Senate, he had joined in its discussion; and he was willing again to give it an examination, but was sorry he could not this day have the pleasure of gratifying his friend from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON expressed a wish that the bill would now be ordered to a third reading, and that Monday might be assigned for its discussion and decision.

Mr. SMITH said, that the Senate was now very thin, and thought it proper that a certain day should be assigned for the discussion: he should then take occasion to express his objections to the bill.

Mr. ROWAN proposed to amend the bill by striking out that portion of the first section which makes the operation of the bill entirely prospective. The bill, he said, in its original shape, embraced all cases of imprisonment for debt. It provided for the abolition of imprisonment in all cases, without reference to the date of the contract upon which suit had been instituted, or to the period when the judgment was obtained. The Judicial Committee had so amended it, as to confine its operation to suits instituted, and judgments obtained, upon contracts entered into after the 4th day of July next. He feared, he said, that the restriction of the operation of the bill to future contracts, would inflict a greater evil than the one which the bill was intended to remedy. The restriction having been made by the Judicial Committee, might imply that, in the opinion of that very enlightened organ of this body, there was no distinction between right and remedy—between the law of the contract, and the law of the forum; or rather, that the remedial system, which existed at the time a contract was made, entered into and formed a part of the contract; and, of course, that it could not be altered, without impairing the obligation of the contract. Such an opinion, coming from so high a source, might tend to strengthen the erroneous notions which were propagated in some of the States, by those who were disposed to weaken the power and diminish the rights of the States, in the view to strengthen the arm of the General Government. He stated, that he believed the rights of the States, and the rights, liberty, and happiness, of the People of the States, depended, essentially, upon maintaining the natural distinction between right and remedy—a distinction which existed most obviously in the nature of things, and one which had, until lately, been recognised by all jurists. A new doctrine had lately been established by the Courts in Kentucky, both State and Federal, that the legal obligation of a contract consists alone in the remedy. If it should be acquiesced in by Congress, and the States, it would produce consolidation, in its worst aspect. If such was the opinion of the statesmen of this country, it could not be too soon known. It would, he said, supersede the necessity of guarding against encroachments by the General Government, upon the rights and powers of the States, in relation to other matters, about which there had been much sensibility displayed. That clause in the Constitution which provides that no State should pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, would, if it were once conceded that the remedial laws of a State enter into and form a part of the obligation of contracts, throw the States inextricably into the power of the General Government. It would paralyze them. It would leave them no power worth exercising. It would not be in the power of any of the States, whose citizens might be fighting the battles of their country, to save, by a modification of the remedial laws, the property of those citizens from sacrifice by the Sheriff, in their absence—to save their families from being unhoused and reduced to the extremest want. Mr. R. insisted, that the great object of the State Legislatures was, to mitigate the evils inflicted upon the People, by great and unforeseen changes in the state of things. That, while a State would be restrained by its wisdom from changing its remedial system upon light or ordinary occurrences, it ought to possess the power to do so in instances of great national calamity; and does, he insisted, possess this power, and will exercise it, whenever its interests and its happiness will be promoted by its exercise, or rather, whenever, by its exercise, great suffering and misery can be avoided. He referred to the practice of the States during the last war. There was not, he believed, one of them that did not, during that period, soften the rigor of its remedial system. And he insisted that much distress had been avoided by the exercise of this power during that period; and who, said he, then contended that those alterations were unconstitutional—that they impaired the obligation of contracts? Mr. President, said Mr. R., we are very much influenced by the force of circumstances. If this erroneous sentiment were even adopted in peaceful and prosperous times, it would be rejected in times of great public calamity. But it is only in times of public calamity, that the remedial laws, which had been accommodated to times of prosperity, would be thought rigorous. It is only then that they would require to be so changed, as to suit the changed condition of society. The wisdom of all legislation consists in suiting the laws to the condition of the People; when, that condition shall be altered, the laws ought to be so altered as to fit the change. This power of altering the remedial laws upon great emergencies, was so essential to the States and to the prosperity and happiness of their citizens, that he was unwilling to see it questioned even by implication. He hoped, therefore, that the advocates of the prospective operation of this law had been influenced by what they considered reasons of expediency. That they had not predicated the alteration upon their belief of a want of power to alter the remedial laws in relation to existing contracts. If they should place it on the ground of expediency, and not of constitutionality, he should feel but little concern for the success of the amendment; which he had proposed rather to elicit the sentiment of the committee, than on account of any great concern about its import. He was, he said, in favor of the abolition of imprisonment for debt—but he did not believe that much would be gained by the passage of this bill.

He stated that the abolition should be by the States, and that the execution laws of the States should be the execution laws of the United States; that the only law which Congress ought to pass upon the subject of executions, should be a law adopting those of the States; that the United States should have no execution laws peculiar to itself, except those which related exclusively to its revenue. The cases, he said, which this law, if it passed in either aspect, could embrace, would be comparatively so few, that he felt concerned only about the moral effect which its passage would have upon the public mind. He repeated again, that the execution laws of the country must be enacted by the States, and adopted, so far as they are needed, by the United States.

Mr. BERRIEN said, in reply, that the object of the amendment was to render the provisions of the section retrospective. As the bill stood, they were limited to contracts which should be entered into, or causes of action which should originate, after the fourth of July next. The amendment would extend them to all contracts and causes of action, whenever they originated, or may originate.

The views of the Senator from Kentucky, it appeared to him, were erroneous in two particulars. No doubt can exist that there is a clear and well-settled distinction between the power of legislation over existing laws which affect the contract, and those which merely regulate the remedy. But that question does not arise here. So far as he understood, the section, in its present form, was adopted, not from want of power, but of will, to make the provision retrospective. In the opinion of the committee, it was expedient to leave the remedy on existing contracts, and other causes of action, to the regulation of the laws under which they originated. The inference which the Senator from Kentucky apprehended, could not, therefore, he thought, be deduced from the provisions of the bill as reported by the Committee. But if this were so, the argument in support of the amendment attached to such an implied concession by this House, an importance which did not belong to it. The States, in the exercise of Legislative power, cannot be controlled by the acts or concessions of this House. Within the limits of their constitutional charters, the whole array of Federal legislation is incompetent to such a purpose; and, whenever, in the exercise of their respective powers, in their application to individuals, a difference of opinion as to the extent of those powers shall occur, there is a common arbiter to which such controversy must be referred. He resisted the amendment, therefore, because it was founded on views not justified by the provision to which it was applied; and because the argument urged in its support seemed to him to attach an undue importance to the acts or declarations of this House, in their supposed influence on the constitutional powers of legislation in the several States. The restriction in the section did not concede a want of power, but resulted from a want of will on the part of the committee to render the bill retroactive. It was in their view a mere question of expediency, and neither does nor can effect the legislative power of the States, or of the Union. He trusted, therefore, that the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. BRANCH said, that the inference which had alarmed the Senator from Kentucky, was not justified. The States were forbidden, by the Constitution, to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts; and no act of Congress could either give that power to the States, or deprive them of it. He did not conceive that the power of the States could be, in any way, affected by our legislation. The means of coercion which were placed in the hands of the creditor, was, he contended, a part, and an essential part, of the contract. Right was not worth a stiver without a remedy. Congress, he said, had, undoubtedly, the power to make this bill retrospective. The question was, whether it was expedient to exercise that power. For his own part, though warmly in favor of the principle of the bill, he would not vote for it, if it was to operate on existing contracts.

Mr. KANE rose in support of the amendment. He thought, with the Senator from Kentucky, that the restriction ought to be done away with. It was due to the consistency and impartiality of this body, to render the law uniform in its operation upon all contracts, whenever and wherever made. Congress, he declared, never established the law of imprisonment for debt. The process acts of 1789 and 1792, provided that the United States' Courts should use the process of the several States, subject to alteration whenever occasion required. In some of the States, a debtor cannot be held in prison; in other States he can. This renders the United States' process different in different States. A uniform rule should, in his opinion, be established. There was no limitation to the power of Congress over contracts; nor did he think, with the gentleman from Georgia, that it was inexpedient to exercise the power vested in us over the subject.

Mr. ROWAN agreed with the member from Georgia, that Congress had no power to alter the laws of the States. His idea was this: that the moral power of a law of Congress would often induce the State Legislatures to concur in an opinion expressed in that law as to a constitutional point, &c.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BRANCH and ROWAN, Mr. R., at the solicitation of his colleague, withdrew his amendment.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1828.

CASE OF FRANCIS LARCHE.

The bill for the relief of Francis Larche, of New Orleans, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUGGLES said, that this bill had, two or three times, passed the Senate, but had never been finally acted on in the other House. The circumstances of the claim are these. The negro slave of the petitioner was impressed into the service of the United States during the last war, and was employed in the transportation of baggage. Whilst in this service he was killed by a cannon ball from the enemy. These facts had been proved to the satisfaction of the Committee, and, as slaves were recognized as property by the laws, the petitioner was, in the opinion of the Committee, entitled to relief.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, whether other slaves, killed under like circumstances, had been paid for by the Government?

Mr. RUGGLES, in reply, said he had no recollection of a similar case at present; no claim, to his knowledge, had been made upon the Government for compensation for slaves impressed into the service of the United States, and killed while in that service, and he was not aware that any similar case had ever occurred.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the blank was filled with $800, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CASE OF ABRAHAM OGDEN.

The bill for the relief of Abraham Ogden, and others, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOODBURY said he was instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move that the blank be filled with $1,000. Before the question was taken, he wished the report accompanying the bill to be read. The report having been read,

Mr. WOODBURY said he would explain the facts and grounds on which the Committee rested the bill. The petitioners claimed compensation for the detention of their vessel, which was chartered by the Government. He was aware that demurrage could not be recovered unless specified in the charter party. The decisions were contradictory on the subject, but the balance of them was against the admission of the claim. But, on principles of equity, the person who does the wrong is answerable for it. The vessel was freighted by the United States to transport a quantity of provisions to Laguaira; she was there detained twenty-eight days in unloading; she might have been unladen by lighters; and it was customary at that port to use lighters for this purpose, as the ships could not be brought to the wharves. It was the duty of the United States to have unladen her in the manner usual at this port. If this had been done, she would have been unloaded in four days, instead of twenty-eight. He was aware that the Consul of the United States had given reasons for not using the lighters. It was convenient for him to keep the ship as a store ship, and lighters were scarce, in consequence of the large quantity of shipping in the port. Two days after the ship was laden, the pacificating army entered Laguaira, and the ship was seized. This seizure occasioned a further detention of nine days, when the vessel was given up. The gross loss suffered by the owners was 5 or $6,000.

The United States was not answerable for this last detention, because the owners might have effected an insurance against capture by foreign power. They had neglected to do it, probably because they did not anticipate a long detention of the vessel at the port by the officers of the United States. The Committee had fixed upon the sum of $1,000 as a remuneration, upon the hypothesis that the United States were answerable for damages resulting from the detention of the vessel twenty-four days. The Committee allowed 5 or $600 for the detention for twenty-four days; which, with the interest amounted to $1,000. But, if the Senate thought that the United States were answerable for the further detention eight or nine days after, the sum allowed should be considerably increased.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that before the question was taken on the bill, he should be glad to have an opportunity of examining it. He recollected a corresponding case formerly before the Senate, in which he took an active part. He did not care for the amount, but the principle involved in the bill he considered highly important. This affair grew out of a project of benevolence. We undertook to feed the sufferers by the earthquake at Laguaira; and, like most other projects of this sort, it had been productive of little good to any party. He did not think the claimant entitled to compensation. But, in order to examine the facts, he would move to postpone the farther consideration of the bill until Friday next.

Mr. WOODBURY assenting to the motion, the bill was accordingly postponed.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill for abolishing Imprisonment for Debt was taken up, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HAYNE had not intended, he said, to participate in the discussion of the bill, but he was constrained to state his views in relation to it, by the circumstance that, in his former remarks, he had been erroneously supposed to have expressed himself in favor of the bill, as it now stood. He was in favor of the principle of the bill, but was opposed to its provisions. It might be made to assume a form in which it would meet his approbation, but he did not think it probable that such a form would be given to it. The only principle of the bill was this: it deprived the creditor of the power which the common law gave him, to hold the body of the debtor, after he had surrendered his property; and this is made to apply only to suits brought in the courts of the United States.

He was perfectly willing to adopt this principle, but he was not willing to abolish the process of capias ad respondendum and capias ad satisfaciendum.

He would beg leave also to remark, that the object as purport of the bill was wholly different from what its title expressed. It was called a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt. But it did not apply its provisions to a single case of existing debt, and affected no contracts except those that should be formed after the 4th of July next; and only that part of them which should be sued in the Courts of the United States. Of the whole number of debtors now confined, or in danger of being confined, jail, not one would be relieved by this bill, and not more than four or five, perhaps, even if it were made retrospective. Of those contracts which may arise after the fourth day of July next, not one in a hundred will be affected by this bill. These remarks he did not make to depreciate the bill; he knew that Congress had not the power to legislate for the States in this case; but he wished it to be understood by the people generally, many of whom had misconceived the purport of the bill, that it would not afford, to any extent, relief to debtors. The bill was nothing more than an act to regulate process, in certain cases, in the United States' Courts.

Imprisonment for Debt.

[SENATE.]

There were two classes of provisions embraced by the bill—one respected mesne process, and the other process after judgment.

As respected mesne process, the common law provides, that a person who is sued should give security that he will remain in the country, and abide the issue of the suit. The bill did not abolish this provision, but took away the means of enforcing it; and substituted, in cases where fraud or flight was intended, a mode of procedure which was expensive, tedious, and inconclusive. The plaintiff must allege, in certain forms, before certain authorities, that the defendant intends to abscond, set forth his cause of action, and then comes the defendant to contest the allegations, &c. forming altogether a complicated and tedious process.

The other provisions of the bill respected the means of enforcing payment after judgment had been obtained. After taking the plaintiff through this new and troublesome process, the bill gives him no means of collecting the money adjudged to be due to him. In South Carolina, and, as he believed, in nearly all the States, the plaintiff, after judgment, had recourse to the visible and tangible property of the defendant, not to his person. But it often happened, especially in cities, that the property of the defendant was locked up in bonds, money, notes, bank stock, and choses in action; in which case, the body was arrested as the means of enforcing payment. What does the bill substitute for this process? A new suit. After the plaintiff has obtained judgment, he must, to recover his money from a defendant whose property is secured in money, stock, or choses in action, institute a new suit, and pass a second time through the forms, expenses, and delays, of an action at law. Mr. HAYNE here read and commented on the several sections of the bill, in order to show that his construction of its provisions was correct.

The writ of "ne exeat," he remarked, was intended to hold defendants to bail who were about to leave the country; and, by the law as it now stands, the plaintiff may procure the writ from the Clerk of the proper Court, at a trifling expense, and without delay; but, under the provisions of the bill, it was necessary for the plaintiff to institute a Chancery suit. His objections, too, in regard to the final process provided in the bill, were insuperable; and, unless these objections were removed, he should be compelled to vote against the bill.

He would now suggest a remedy for what he considered the imperfections of the bill. He would propose, as an amendment, that the "process of the United States' Courts should be made to conform to the established process of the Superior Courts of the several States." The States, he conceived, were better able to provide rules of practice suited to their wants and habits than the United States. An exception might be made as to revenue debts. He did not know whether the bill embraced revenue cases. To that matter he would call the attention of the Committee of Finance. He thought it proper for them to inquire whether the provisions of the bill would compel the Government to pursue the circuitous mode which it established for the collection of debts. His first motion was, to recommit the bill to the Committee which reported it, with instructions so to amend it as to conform the process of the United States' courts to the process established by the Superior Courts of the several States, and to embrace proper provisions to secure the collection of the revenue of the United States. Another motion he should subsequently make, if he found gentlemen at all disposed to simplify the bill, and rid it of its cumbersome and complicated machinery; that is, to make the simple declaration that defendants, in any action of debt, in the United States' Courts, should be entitled to a discharge, upon filing in Court an assignment of all their property; with a proviso that, if subsequently found guilty of fraud or concealment, they shall be punished. If the friends of the bill chose to modify the bill, either according to his first or second proposition, he should vote for it. He then moved the recommitment of the bill, with instructions, &c. as above stated.

Mr. KANE said that the existing laws on the subject rendered the process of the courts of the United States conformable to the process of the State courts; subject, however, to the rules which might be prescribed by the United States' courts. The existing law, therefore, accomplished the object proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. But the existing law did not apply to all the States. There was now a bill before the Senate for extending the process of the United States' courts to those States which had been admitted into the Union since the year 1789. That bill would, in a few days, come before the Senate, and until it had, he hoped the Senator from South Carolina would consent to withhold his motion.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina related to the Judiciary, which he conceived to be one of the most important branches of our Government. Great difficulty had been found in adapting the process of the United States' courts to the judiciary system of the States. It had more than once been proposed to pass general laws on the subject. But, whenever this had been attempted, it had been found impossible to reconcile any one general system to the dissimilar usages of the several States. The law of 1789 adopted the State process as the rule of the United States' courts, under certain restrictions; while the proposition, now made, would put the process of the United States' courts wholly under the direction of the State courts. Mr. V. B. here enlarged upon the difficulties which would attend any change of the present system, either by extending or restricting the powers of the United States' courts over their process. Mr. V. B. also complimented the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON,] on the zeal and ability with which he had prosecuted his important and philanthropic measure, and expressed a hope that his honorable exertions would be crowned with success.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose, and said that the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina was totally distinct from the object of the bill. It presented a substantive and distinct object—to govern the United States' courts by the State laws. He would not oppose that proposition when offered separately from the bill, with which he did not see that it had any connexion. He and his colleague had, for year after year, attempted, without success, to effect this very object, in reference to the State of Kentucky, which the Senator from South Carolina now proposed in reference to all the States. The United States' courts had undertaken to regulate the process of the Kentucky courts; and, instead of adopting the execution laws of Kentucky, as they existed, so as to go, pari passu, with the improvements of the Judiciary of that State, they had arbitrarily and cruelly adopted those execution laws which had been used in the infancy of the State. The object of the law of 1789, he contended, was to render the process of the United States' courts conformable to the process of the State courts, as it might be modified from time to time. This matter, in his opinion, presented the most interesting question which had ever been agitated in this body, viz: whether the Supreme Court of the United States was clothed with legislative power? and whether the assumption of such powers over the process of the Kentucky courts, by the Supreme Court, was not palpable usurpation? Mr. JOHNSON here proceeded at some length to show the calamities which had been brought upon his State by the judicial legislation that had been exercised over it. He thought the subject presented considerations of much greater importance than the regulation of a ca. sa.; but he did not think that it should be brought up in the shape which the Senator from South Carolina had given to it. He would, however, at any time, vote for it as a distinct proposition.

In relation to the objections of the Senator from South Carolina, he would consider whether the bill went too far in restricting the power of creditors over debtors. The gentleman says, that many debtors may have concealed property, bank stock, money, and choses in action, and thereby may be able fraudulently to defeat the claims of their creditors, even after judgment has been rendered against them. But what, sir, is to be done with those debtors who have no bank stock, nor money, nor choses in action? Must they suffer, in hopeless confinement, because some few rich men may be villains? If debtors were proved to be dishonest, the bill provided for their punishment. He did not believe that the debtor part of the community was any better or worse, on the score of morality, than the creditor part. And he would fain know, upon what principle gentlemen assumed the fact, that debtors were dishonest. As many instances of oppression, on the part of creditors, can be enumerated, as of fraud on the part of debtors. The bill provided that the creditor, instead of confining the body of the debtor, upon a presumption that he has property concealed, should first give some kind of evidence of the fraud. Whereas, under the present laws, a creditor may first strip his debtor of all his property, even to his last blanket, and then, to complete his wretchedness, may turn against him, as a villain. But the gentleman also says, that the course of proceeding is too troublesome to the creditor. It would be more convenient for him to put the debtor in jail, at once, upon bare presumption of fraud.

He submitted, whether this sentiment was in accordance with any principle of morality, or with that equality of rights, in defence of which the honorable gentleman himself had so often raised his voice. In this connexion, Mr. J. begged leave to call the attention of the Senate to the historical fact, that coercion was never, in a single instance, applied to any one of the English Lords, who might become a debtor; and, that no inconvenience had ever resulted to any creditor from their exemption. The consequence of this privilege, in this respect, was, that their creditors took from them pledges of valuables, or relied upon their honor and property. Why cannot the same course be pursued, and with the same success, between creditors and debtors in this Republic, where all are nobles, and all commons; where there is neither patrician nor plebeian?

Let me ask the Senator from South Carolina, continued Mr. J., whether I have not shown to him, that the bill, in relation to the supposition of fraud, gives no more than a fair and equal opportunity to the debtor to exculpate himself from the suspicion or charge? If I am deceived as to this, let the gentleman suggest a better mode in which the object may be obtained.

I accord, said Mr. J., with the opinion of the gentleman, that the People should be undeceived as to the effect of this bill. He had been made aware by the great number of letters he had received from different parts of the country, that the People were under the impression that the bill would have a general operation, and would also affect existing contracts. But the advocates of the bill had not assisted in creating this impression.

A small number of the debtors alone can ever have the benefit of the bill; and most deeply do I regret, that its principles and application cannot be made co-extensive with the relation of debtor and creditor throughout the Union. But, if it relieves but one debtor out of a hundred, it will be well worthy of the benevolence and philanthropy of this body. It is, however, to the moral effect of this bill that I attach most importance. It will, in addition to the prevailing character of public opinion on the subject, have a decisive moral influence on the State Legislatures, who, it is to be hoped, will soon be induced to engraft its principles on their own judicial system.

The gentleman says truly, that the bill will scarcely touch that mass of misery which is exhibited by the debtors in our towns and cities. I was in favor of giving them relief in a mode which the gentleman so eloquently recommended last session. I stood by him in support of a bankrupt law, though that law was in opposition to all my former views and prejudices. The gentleman also underrates the importance of the bill, inasmuch as it does not apply to existing contracts. I have no partiality for that feature of the bill. In adopting it, I yielded to the views of my friends who would not vote for a retrospective law. But, must we relinquish legislation, because we, of the present hour, cannot reap its fruits? Must we not legislate for posterity?

Mr. J. pursued the subject still farther, and at considerable length. In conclusion, he said, that the object of the bill was to establish the principle, that crime alone should render a freeman liable to loss of liberty; and he believed that the moral effect of the passage of this bill would, in a short time, cause the abolition of civil imprisonment throughout the country.

Mr. KANE rose to explain some misapprehension, on his part, of the character of the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HAYNE spoke at some length, in reply to Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. VAN BUREN, and Mr. KANE, and concluded by withdrawing his motion for the recommitment, &c. for the reason that it would interfere with the bill now before the Senate, for extending the process of United States' courts to the States admitted since the year 1789.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the bill was postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Monday next, to which day

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1828.

The Senate were principally occupied to-day in discussing the propriety of printing a document from the War Department, containing the names of those officers and soldiers of the Revolution who were entitled to lands. The subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to report upon the expediency of the printing, and the manner in which it should be done.

Adjourned to Wednesday.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1828.

This day was principally occupied in discussing the propriety of printing certain memorials against an increased tariff of duties.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill to abolish imprisonment for debt came up in its order, and the question being put, "Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading?" Mr. EATON asked for the Yeas and Nays, which call was sustained.

Mr. BARTON said that he should only detain the Senate with a few remarks. This bill proposed to abolish imprisonment for debt. Such a proposition must always be popular, where it was known and where it was not known. It was confined to the United States' Courts, but it did not meet with his approbation. He could not believe that the system which was now proposed, would be as good as the one at present in operation; and he thought many of the benefits anticipated founded in mere speculation. He should, therefore, vote against it.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. was not very sanguine in his wishes, and his only object in making any remarks on this bill, was, to discharge his duty to himself and his constitoents. When gentlemen intended to make a radical change in existing systems, it was, he thought, incumbent upon them to show some serious evil in the present state of things. He was not sure as to the practicability of abolishing imprisonment for debt at all; but were he in favor of its abolition, he should vote against the bill now before the Senate, because its principal, if not its only effect, would be to deprive the plaintiff of his rights. The plaintiff is to state his case, and to swear that the defendant is about to leave the State, thus encouraging vexatious proceedings on the part of the plaintiff. He is moreover bound to state on oath the exact sum due to him. In hundreds of instances, this would be next to an impossibility, where accounts had been of long standing, and had become complicated. But if he cannot do it, he loses his power over the debtor. Then he has to go before a clerk, and make oath of the cause of the action; and this is not safely done without consulting counsel; because if he should state one cause, and it should turn out that another cause existed, he is not to have the benefit of process against the defendant. Before he can proceed to trial, he is to bring his case before a single Judge, who is to decide whether the trial shall proceed. If he pleases, he may discharge the defendant from bail. It is the act of one Judge, unchecked and unaided; and an able jurist has said, that the law of one Judge is the law of a tyrant. All men look differently on the same matter; and as this Judge is to decide upon the statement under oath of the plaintiff, might it not be possible that he should decide wrong, and that the plaintiff should be the sufferer? Then when the Judge has decided that the defendant may be held to bail on meane process, he has to make investigation, and an affidavit, whether the property of the debtor is concealed. If he fails in his second suit, the costs fall upon him. There were too many affidavits proposed in this new system. The plaintiff must go through a series of them, before he arrives at any security as to the trial. After all this, the defendant comes in, and if the proof is not sufficient, has it in his power to traverse it: and if the jury decide against the plaintiff, the defendant is ever after discharged, and can never be held to bail. This bill, said Mr. S., is, in my view, a one-sided bill. It provides all for the defendant, and nothing for the plaintiff. We know no such principle in our law. It provides for one party as well as another. It deals equal and exact justice to all. We have been told that the present system is cruel, and that our execution law is a disgrace and stain upon our statute book. It might have been so in the dark ages, because the imprisoned debtors had to support themselves, or depend upon being supported by charity. But in the present age of charity and civilization, every one knows that no such thing exists. The several States have provided against it; and we talk of mere imaginary evils, when we speak of the cruelty of imprisonment, under the present system. The Senator from Kentucky has told us that this law is to protect the debtor from the horrid cruelties of the creditor, and he has paraded before us a list of nineteen hundred prisoners in one State. But has not that gentleman been deceived in the representations that have been made to him? May he not have met with persons willing to exaggerate the cruelties to which he alludes. And if it should be so, it would not be the only time that gentlemen whose meaning was as good as that of the gentleman from Kentucky, had been imposed upon. But supposing there are nineteen hundred, or twice that number of prisoners for debt, in one of the States, are we to suppose that all these, or any very great proportion of them, are hard cases? Are we to suppose that the majority of these imprisonments are made to satisfy vindictive dispositions? Not so. The genius of the country was against it. The People would not allow such an outrage to be perpetrated, against the spirit and feeling of the community. He says, also, that this bill is to restrain the natural cruelty of mankind; and that all men are naturally cruel. I thought not. I believe that pity is the last passion that deserts the human breast. But are creditors always those who act from impure or unchristian feelings? Have we not instances every day where men have gone to prison, leaving their families to enjoy splendid fortunes, which they have wrongfully obtained from others? These are every day affairs. I will allude to some facts which were stated here the other day, facts which were stated openly, and which may serve to illustrate this matter. It was said, in relation to a list of the names of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, that members of Congress had obtained access to that list, and by making extracts from it, had led to speculations by which the rightful claimants were defrauded of their lands. Now, what would the Senator from Kentucky say, if those purchasers were prosecuted for restitution of the lands thus obtained? Would he shudder, then, at the open prison door? This is often the case; as often, perhaps, as the reverse. I do not intend to offer any amendment. I once, on a former occasion, had the honor to present my views of this subject, which I do not think it advisable now to repeat. Indeed I do not know that I should have said a word upon this subject, had not the Senator from Kentucky alluded to two of our illustrious public men. One of these was the great statesman, Jefferson, who has gone from among us—the other, General Sumpter, a native of the State I represent. The Senator from Kentucky has said that even Jefferson was liable to be imprisoned for debt in his old age. To make the picture still more revolting, he said that Jefferson was liable to be laid hold of by a constable. But the State which I have the honor to represent, has shown by its conduct since his death, that he could not have been arrested on a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum. But, said Mr. S., I would not have such a man as Jefferson exempt from the operation of the law. He ought to be, and, as a good citizen, he would have desired to be, a sharer in the liabilities as well as the protection of the law. It is but seldom that a good or an honorable man is oppressed by it, excepting in some case where the complex operations of banking institutions produced some evil of such a nature. The gentleman has mentioned General Sumpter, as one who had been subjected to the operation of the present system. But it is not to be supposed that a man who has served his country so well, and so nobly, could be forgotten by that country, whether the statement made by the gentleman, as to the pecuniary difficulties of that great man, was true or not. The gentleman says he is poor. His circumstances may have changed, and his finances have been straightened by some reverse of fortune; but he has been too much an honor to South Carolina to be forgotten or neglected by her. And, said Mr. S., I can assure that gentleman, that if he had been unfortunate, he never could be subjected to the operation of a ca. sa. No possible circumstances could produce such a disaster to a man so much venerated. His prison doors would fly open, and his manacles would fall from his limbs—not through the interference of a deity, but by the operation of public gratitude. One word more. I have always observed, in speeches upon subjects of this kind, that the blame of all the cruelty, as it is called, of the law, is thrown upon the Judges. I, for one, am not inclined to join in this cry. In matters of meum and tuum, the Judges have uniformly been right. I believe that the laws of England have been digested by as learned and as humane Judges, as those of any country. The law seems to me, in its great and general features, to be as wise and as humane as the fallibility of human nature will allow. Yet, here we are called upon to break up the whole system of execution laws, and adopt a new and undigested system; a system which he believed would injure the defendant for whose benefit its framers intended it. Under such convictions, he must vote against the bill.

Mr. BERRIEN did not rise, he said, to discuss the subject at this time; but having invited the aid of this honorable body, in maturing the bill, and in remedying its faults, in the spirit in which he had made that invitation, he would now avail himself of the suggestions of the Senator from South Carolina. He would, therefore, offer as an amendment to the bill, a proviso that it should not, as regards mesne or final process, be construed to affect the rights of the United States, in suits brought for the collection of revenue debts. In order to meet another objection, he would propose that, when the issue was made up, according to the provisions of the 6th section, execution should issue against the body of the defendant, as if this act had not passed.

Mr. COBB observed, that it struck him that the amendment proposed by his colleague did not go far enough. There were other suits brought against debtors by the United States, besides those for the collection of revenue debts. He alluded particularly to suits brought against disbursing officers for defalcation, which were the most important suits brought by the Government, and embraced a very large amount. He therefore thought an additional clause should be added to the amendment now offered.

Mr. BERRIEN said that there was no necessity for such a provision, as it was made in another part of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON said, that he objected to the amendment just proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. It would have the obvious effect to place the United States on better footing than other individuals would enjoy. Considering this principle at variance with the tone and spirit of the bill, he would never give it his assent. He was in favor of the bill in its general principles; and even with this provision he might vote for it: but, he did not wish to have it understood that in doing so, he was willing to make a reservation in favor of the General Government.

Mr. BERRIEN said that it was the practice to make a distinction in favor of the Government between debts due to it, and debts due to citizens. The whole history of the Government shewed that every endeavor was made to facilitate the collection of the revenue, until it had become the settled policy of the Government. There was a statute now in force, by which an officer of the Government was empowered to issue a distress warrant on a perfectly ex parte process. It would have been looked upon as highly improper to attempt to innovate upon what has become the established policy of the country; and certainly it would have been inexpedient, in offering a bill containing new principles, to interfere with any facility given to the collection of the revenue, which had become engrafted permanently on our financial system.

Mr. BRANCH said that he had a few remarks to make on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. He certainly could not agree with him. Was it intended to do more in passing this bill than make an experiment? Was it not the moral effect which was designed to be produced? And if so, should the Senate sanction a principle at once partial and unjust? If the example were to produce any benefit, the practice of the plan proposed in the bill ought to begin with the General Government. It was not for Congress to say to the States, "Pluck the mote from your eye," and still cherish the beam in its own. Should they, like the profligate divine, say, "Do as I do, and not as I say?" If, as is said, it is the policy of the Government to assume a privilege which does not extend to other creditors, then that policy ought to be altered. Let our reform begin at home. Let Congress approve, by practice, the declaration which is made in this bill, that imprisonment for debt is illegal and cruel. He agreed with the gentleman from Ohio, and must oppose this amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN remarked, that, when an officer of the Government appropriated the money of Government to his own uses, the principle at present acknowledged, authorized an union of equity with law, to effect a distribution of his property. This was done to operate as a security. But now it was proposed to carry the principle farther, and to allow the United States, for debts contracted by individuals who became unable to pay it, to imprison him summarily. It is true, as the gentleman from Georgia says, that it is the policy of the Government to assume to itself preferences in the collection of its revenue. But it was immoral, impolitic, and unnatural, to allow imprisonment in order to coerce the payment of debts by persons unable to meet them. If the system now to be established, was to make a distinction between misfortune and crime, as he had hoped it would, then it was inconsistent with it to retain a clause which should still disgrace the statute book with a principle at once immoral, impolitic, and unnatural. He should, therefore, vote against the amendment.

Mr. BERRIEN replied, that, if it were true that the principle heretofore established, and acted upon, by the Government, was merely a species of security, then the argument of the gentleman from New York would be a good one. But it was not so. On the statute book would be found cases which could not apply to individuals, and could not be governed by principles similar to those applying to individual parties. He would allude to the law for the better regulation of the Treasury Department, in which it is provided, that a person failing to pay moneys due to the Treasury, may be incarcerated until discharged by due course of law. He did not defend this principle; but, in advocating this object, I lay down the proposition that this bill, which is to change the jurisdiction of the United States, may not be obstructed by any attempt at innovation in any of those long established practices which have grown into the settled policy of the country. He would not pretend to say, that under the present law there had not been instances of oppression that would have disgraced any country. He was anxious that, in attempting to afford to the People the benefits of this system, in all ordinary cases, it might not be embarrassed by any interference with the established regulations of the finances. If gentlemen were disposed to alter the policy of the Government, let them introduce a bill for that purpose, and, as far as he could go safely, he would go with them. But he would not advocate any such attempt being engrafted upon this bill, which was framed for other purposes. He wished this bill to stand on its own footing, and that it might not be embarrassed by the introduction of propositions and plans not immediately connected with it.

Mr. VAN BUREN, in reply, remarked that the gentleman from Georgia's view of the present system was perfectly consistent with his own. He acknowledged that some preference was necessary in the collection of the revenue, where the transactions were so vast and multifarious. The United States was allowed the same privilege over the body that individuals enjoyed, only that the process was more summary. But now, a new era was to be commenced. This bill was to establish a new principle, and to draw a line of distinction between the unfortunate and the criminal. This was the whole scope of the bill now under consideration. And should they stop short of this object? Should they, in mere cases of debt, where the parties were not able to pay, allow to the United States the liberty of confining the debtor within the four walls of a prison? He hoped not: for, if such was the case, it would be a libel on the bill and its advocates, and convict them of the grossest inconsistency.

Mr. HAYNE rose merely to state the ground upon which he should give his vote. At first he had thought with the gentleman from Ohio; but, upon further reflection, he rather approved the amendment. He objected to the principle and operation of the bill. He first objected to it as applied to the citizen. If he was defeated there, he was against it as it would apply to the United States, and mainly, because he believed it would diminish the revenue. An unwise rule was by its application made nugatory. And he believed not an individual would go into the Federal Courts, if this bill passed; but would, in preference, go into the State Courts: for, when he went into the United States' Courts, after the defendant had been defeated, the plaintiff could not get possession of half of the property, because it was not attachable. But the United States must go into the Federal Courts, and suffer the same inconveniences, which he believed would result in a great loss of revenue. He could not, therefore, agree with the Senator from Ohio.

Imprisonment for Debt.

[SENATE.]

The question on the amendments offered by Mr. BARNES, being then taken, was decided in the affirmative, Ayes 20, Nays 18.

The question of engrossing then recurred, when

Mr. ROWAN said he had not attended to the provisions of the bill in detail. He had the most unqualified confidence in the members of the committee, who had examined and approved them. He was in favor of the object of the bill—the abolition of imprisonment for debt. He was opposed to imprisonment for any civil cause.

The acts of individuals, so far as they are cognizable by the laws, are divided into civil and criminal; criminal acts are those, which are injurious or offensive to the State; to them he would confine imprisonment. It should never be inflicted by any, but the government, and by it, for misdemeanor, or crime only. He did not believe that indebtedness was either a crime or misdemeanor; and upon the supposition that it was either, he would never consent that this punishment should be inflicted, or that the creditor should inflict it. Sir, said he, the relation of debtor and creditor is an accidental one, which takes place between equals; for in our government all are equal: equally secure in the enjoyment of their lives, their liberty, and their property. This equality lies at the root of republicanism. It is natural, and the republic was not formed to destroy, or impair, but to preserve and protect it. Hence the explicit guarantees, by the Constitution, of equal rights.

Can it then be supposed, that liberty which ranks in the Constitution as it does in the intelligence of mankind, next to life, and without which life itself is scarcely worth enjoying, can, by any law, which does not violate the spirit of the constitution, be subjected to the caprice, the whim, or the malignity of those who may happen, in the ever-varying condition of human affairs, to become creditors? The object of all civil regulations is to secure private happiness, from private encroachment. To secure individuals, from the power of one another. It was to promote the happiness of all, by protecting the weak against the strong, that government was instituted. But, by permitting the creditor to imprison his debtor, you counteract and defeat the great object of the social institutions; you surrender the weak, to the strong; for wealth is power, and poverty is weakness; you deprive every man, whom accident makes a debtor, of his liberty. Instead of appealing to the constitution, and relying upon it for the enjoyment of his liberty, he is referred to the caprice of his creditor. He is told, that, instead of relying upon the strong arm of his government, for the protection of his liberty, he must invoke the clemency of that man, whom avarice, parsimony, or accident, has clothed with wealth, and, under the denomination of his creditor, armed with the power of tyranny. That if his spirits have been broken by his adversities; if, with the loss of his fortune, he has lost his self-respect, and is prepared humbly to implore the indulgence of the more fortunate, but perhaps greatly less meritorious person, to whom he has, by the force of circumstances, become debtor, he may escape imprisonment; or that he may possibly escape, (for a while at least) by renewing his bond for the debt, with ten or twelve per cent. interest, as a moderate equivalent for his gracious forbearance.

If in the wreck of his fortune, the debtor has been left the means of bribing his creditor, or if some friend or neighbor, moved by the sympathies of a kind heart will become his sponsor for the debt, swelled by the inordinate premium for forbearance, he is graciously permitted to enjoy his liberty yet a little longer. So that the debtor is not barely in as bad a situation, in relation to his creditor, as he would have been without the aid or protection of the civil institutions; but in a much worse. In a state of nature, he could have resisted any and every encroachment upon his liberty, to the extent of his power, even to the infliction of death upon the assailant. In this he would have been justified by the law of nature; and even now, under our civil code, if any person shall attempt to imprison another, who is not his debtor, he may be resisted even to death. It is the creditor alone, who, by our law, is authorized to imprison. It is he alone, who may reverse the laws of nature with impunity; who may violate them, not only with impunity, but with the sanction and aid of the civil laws, and their machinery. The civil laws, so far from protecting the unfortunate debtor from the blow aimed by the disappointed and exasperated creditor, at his liberty, his peace, and his happiness, lend their vigour to his vengeance, and confer on deeds of private malignity the sanction of public approbation. They point the weapon of private vengeance with the venom of public scorn. Misfortune is treated as crime, even worse (as he should hereafter attempt to shew.) Calamity is aggravated by the loss of liberty.

The theory of our government derives all its captivity, (and it has much, very much) from its regard to the equal rights of its citizens, and from its seeming aptitude to maintain and preserve those rights. It proclaims their happiness to have been the great object of its institution; and as the best means of promoting that object, it guarantees to all, and to each, the same enjoyment of life, liberty, and property.

Sir, will any man say that the pledge given in the constitution for the security of the liberty of the citizen, is redeemed in the imprisonment of the debtor portion of the community, by their creditors.

Will it, can it be said, that the practice, under the constitution, conforms to its theory? Sir, we abound in political liberty, while we are destitute of civil freedom. Our political laws, our constitutions, proclaim us the freest people in the world. While our civil laws, so far from conforming, as they ought, to the nature and principle of our government, subject us to slavery. Sir, while it is our pride to have made our political law—to have framed our own constitutions, it is our misfortune, and our reproach, to have adopted a foreign code of civil law. Our political law is republican; our civil law is monarchical. We won our independence from England by our valor; asserted our freedom in our constitutions, and then voluntarily became her vassal, by adopting her laws. Sir, the most important half of the revolution remains to be achieved. We must conquer her in her code. If we do not, she will conquer us, through that medium. It is true, that, since our independence, we are not subject as a nation to her laws. But it is as true that distributively as a people, we are still subject to them; and imprisonment for debt is one, and not the least odious and oppressive of those laws. A law, however it might suit the constitution of a government consisting of kings, lords, and commons, but illy suits, he repeated, the genius and spirit of our republican institutions; a law which he considered neither more nor less than a foul blot upon the escutcheon of our government; a blot which our interest, no less than our pride, required us to wipe off; one which he hoped would be forever obliterated, by the passage of the bill now under discussion.

Sir, let us look at the practical operation of this thing, on the condition of society. Do not one-half of our citizens, the debtor half, hold their liberty by a courtesy tenure, of the other half? It is worse than a courtesy tenure. In that, there are certain facts, which give certainly to the tenure. But in this, there can be no certain criterion. Who may be debtor, and who creditor, depends upon the ever varying condition of human affairs and human agency. A man may be creditor to day, and debtor to-morrow. We are told, from very high authority, "that riches make to themselves wings and flee away." No man knoweth what a day may produce; no man's condition is exclusively within his own control. If the liberty of the citizen were made to depend upon the constancy of mutation or change in the condition of man, then indeed it would be perpetual. But, as the law now is, no man can make a contract, or incur a liability, without endangering his liberty. He is constrained to transact his business, on the vestibule of the prison of his country.

Sir, can freedom be predicated of any society, in which any one of its members may oppress any other, who shall have been unfortunate? In which the want of success in the honest pursuits of life, shall draw after it the loss of liberty? In which the poor and the unfortunate depend for their freedom, not upon their government, but upon the discretion, or the caprice, of the prosperous and the wealthy? Sir, liberty is the wealth of the poor man; bereaved of the good things of this life, he has nothing else left, with which to console himself; he has no will to make; he has no valuables to bequeath to his children; the fruits of the toil of his life have been exhausted in raising and educating them; he has nothing but the invaluable, the inestimable boon of liberty to bequeath to them, and he should be enabled to point exultingly to the constitution, and code of his country, and say to his children, in an emphasis of triumph, The freedom which has been the solace and pride of my life, you will find there. Guard it, maintain it, vindicate it at every hazard; when you shall lose it, you will have nothing left worth preserving. Sir, I repeat, that there is, and always will be, in this and every society, a large portion of its members from whom, when you take their freedom, you take their all. What, let me ask, has the honest, but unfortunate man, who has been deprived, by some unfortunate event, or sudden casualty, of the means of meeting his engagements, left, but his liberty to reconcile him to life? What motive has he to fight the battles of his country? How can he be benefitted by her victories? Vanquished or victorious, his condition is the same. The country in which, and the government under which he lives, belongs to the wealthy, not to the poor; he can exclaim, with as much emphasis as Cato did, "this world was made for Cæsar."

Mr. President, what is gained to creditors by the incarceration of their debtors? The debtor is not employed in reducing, by his labor, the amount of his debt. He cannot be sold, hired, or disposed of for money, in any way whatever; and what is gained to the public by his imprisonment? The volume of industrious exertion, upon which the general welfare depends, from which the public prosperity results, is diminished in proportion to the number of persons imprisoned; and should the United States be engaged in war, its strength would be diminished in the same proportion; so that while the unfortunate debtor would be deprived of his liberty, and of the society of his family and friends, and while his family might be deprived, not only of the comfort and protection, which his presence gave them, but of the sustenance which his labor afforded, neither his creditor nor the public would be at all benefitted. The majesty of the government would have been degraded, by the employment of its process, in the gratification of the malignity of the creditor. He might perhaps, by torturing the sympathies of the friends or relatives of the debtor, succeed in wringing from them the amount of his debt. But is it just to allow him to extort from their agonized sensibilities the debt of their unfortunate friend, a debt for which they never received any consideration, which they never contracted to pay, and to the payment of which, they were under no legal or moral obligation? Sir, the charities of life, and the sympathies which sweeten its most endearing relations, should not be exposed to the experiments of extortion, which the unsated or exasperated avarice of creditors might choose to make upon them. Government, instead of lending its energies for purposes so unholy, should elicit, cherish, and protect, those kindly workings of the human heart, which, as they are above all moneyed estimation, should be exempt from moneyed exactions.

Sir, we have heard of instances, in which the rights of interment were denied by the creditor to his unfortunate debtor, who had died in custody, until the debt had been wrung from the fresh, but credulous sorrow, of his surviving relatives. But, Sir, the effect of imprisonment upon debtors themselves is greatly to be deprecated. It has an humbling effect. It has a demoralizing effect. In every Republic, where the will of the people is this governing power, as it must be in all such governments, and as it ought to be in every government, care should be taken not to pollute its sources. Every individual in the Republic should feel a constant, and proud consciousness, that his will formed a constituent and justly proportioned part of the governing volume. But when he is torn from the bosom of his family, and of society, and thrown into prison, denied the power of either managing his own or participating in the concerns of the public, he is placed in an unnatural state, his faculties rust for the want of employment. He may, he must be inactive, but he cannot be idle. The means of useful or virtuous actions are denied him. The motives cease with the means. He either becomes spiritless and languid, or wicked and vindictive. If the former, when enlarged, he is useless: His mind has lost its elasticity, its spring, its pride. He is, at best, during the balance of his life, an inefficient harmless being. If the latter, he brings, when enlarged, the vices of the prison into the bosom of society, and propagates them there. He is mischievously busy, and vindictively active, during the balance of his life. The prison has lost its terrors with him; he fears it less now in its legitimate use, as a punishment for crime, than he did at first, as a confinement for debt: and he is more likely thereafter to be a criminal, than a debtor. Sir, our citizens should not be made too familiar with our prisons; the government needs for the restraint and punishment of crime all the ideal as well as real horrors of the prison.

Let it not, Mr. President, be overlooked, that, for the punishment of all the crimes which can be perpetrated, civil society has but the life, the liberty, and the property of the offender, upon which it can display its punishing energies. It inflicts death for the perpetration of treason, murder, and the other more atrocious crimes. It inflicts confinement, with or without hard labor, for shorter or longer periods, as the punishment for all the subordinate crimes; and, God knows, they are numerous and grievous enough. The government is under the necessity of economizing its criminal fund. It consists exclusively in its power over the life and liberty of the citizen. It can act upon the property of its citizens efficiently, in restraining and punishing misdemeanors and minor offences. Fines and amercements should be employed exclusively as punishments, or rather as the animadversions of government, upon all the acts of its citizens, which, though reprehensible and injurious, do not amount to crime, and are denominated misdemeanors; which are the result of frailty rather than wickedness. Civil society, therefore, cannot, without impoverishing itself, spare to creditors the power of imprisoning their debtors; and if it could, it ought not.

Sir, the more a State enhances the sanctity of the liberty of its citizens, in their own estimation; by so much the more it enhances its own power of restraining and punishing crime; and what is of no less importance, it promotes, by so much the more, a vigorous and healthy action in the body politic. Imprisonment, inflicted as the punishment of crime, loses much of its terror and its force, by the consideration, that it is inflicted indiscriminately upon the innocent, the unfortunate, and the guilty. This circumstance, while it diminishes the ignominy of imprisonment, in relation to the criminal, aggravates it most mercilessly, in relation to the debtor. The first views it with less horror, because he sees it inflicted upon the innocent; the latter abhors it, because he sees it inflicted upon the guilty. The use of imprisonment, in the case of debtors, is an abuse of it in relation to criminals. Mr. President, liberty is the jewel of a republic; it is the golden chain which connects life with property: without liberty, property cannot be acquired, or enjoyed; life, without liberty, is dull mechanism; it is respiration; it is vegetation; a condition to which no State should permit any of its citizens to be reduced, but upon the most urgent necessity; in a republic no such necessity can exist; on the contrary, there is in such a government, a necessity that such a condition should not be permitted to exist; nothing but the power of defending itself against the effects of crime can justify imprisonment, in a free government. Freedom is a mere illusion, a mockery in any government, which permits the imprisonment of its innocent citizens.

Surely, Mr. President, it will not be asserted, by the advocates of imprisonment for debt, that the mere act of being indebted, or of failing to pay a debt, according to contract, is a crime. That there is much perfidy, insincerity, and even fraud, practised by many debtors, must be admitted by every man of observation. But that all debtors, or even a majority of them, are fraudulent, must be denied by all, who are not prepared to blush that they are men. Sir, the fact, that a majority of mankind are disposed to act honestly, in their transactions, is as consoling to the philanthropist, as the fact, that there are some dishonest and fraudulent, is mortifying. The supposition that all, or that a majority of the citizens of any State, are dishonest, strikes at the root of civil society. The great compact, which binds civil society together, implies confidence in the honesty of its members. This confidence, which sustains the social fabric, which constitutes its foundation, its only basis, runs up through all its mechanism, and governs all its relations; it is matter of as much necessity, to presume honesty in the parties to an individual contract, as in the parties to the social compact. That every man shall be presumed to have acted honestly, until the contrary is proved, is a maxim of as much application and force, in the political, as the civil code; it is natural and necessary. If, upon every imputation of guilt, the proof of his innocence was thrown upon the accused, conviction would be the inevitable consequence of imputation. Indeed imputation, or rather accusation, would imply conviction. Distrust would, of course, supply the place of confidence, and society would be instantly dissolved. But man is happily so organized, that the path of his interest is the path of his duty. The maxim "that honesty is the best policy," has the foundation of its truth, in his organic structure. It has the sanction of his judgment, not less than the bias of his nature; he is naturally selfish, and led by that principle in search of his happiness: he is social in his nature, and led by that principle, to regard, in the pursuit of his own happiness, that of his neighbour; he is religious in his nature, and led by that principle, to regulate his selfish and his social acts, by the will of his Creator, as disclosed in the volume of nature, brightened by the great torch of revelation. How absurd then is it to suppose, that indebtedness implies guilt; that the failure to pay a debt, according to contract, implies fraud? That failures are frequent, is admitted; and what do they prove? Why, that man is a frail, impotent, short-sighted being; controlled by circumstances, instead of controlling them; that his misfortunes are more numerous than his crimes; that he is oftener the victim of weakness than of wickedness. Why, then, he asked, should the catalogue of his misfortunes be swelled, by superadding to the loss of his property, that greatest of all calamities, the loss of his liberty? And why should this last and greatest evil, be aggravated by the imputation of guilt, and consequent ignominy?

Sir, I have been labouring to shew that guilt ought not to be imputed to debtors; that indebtedness is not a crime; that the failure of debtors is not, in the general, matter of choice, but of necessity: but, upon the supposition that I am wrong, in all my views, upon this subject, and that to be indebted is a crime; to whom, let me ask, does it belong to ascertain and punish the offence? Surely not to the creditor! The public interest requires that every offender should be punished; and justice requires that the punishment should, in every instance, be proportioned to the offence. Now the guilt of the debtor was incurred, either in contracting the debt, or in failing to comply with his contract. If in contracting the debt, then the creditor participated equally with the debtor, in the guilt of the transaction; for it takes two, at least, to make a contract—and being equally guilty, should be equally punished; and if imprisonment is a just punishment for the guilt of the debtor, it should be inflicted upon the creditor also;—and we know, from observation, that the moral guilt of the creditor, if there be guilt in the transaction, is frequently greater than that of the debtor. The credit is always extended in the hope of gain, and not unfrequently of inordinate gain. The debtor, in many instances, is led to contract the debt by the urgency of his wants. The creditor takes advantage of that urgency, to obtain an extravagant price for his commodity, or an inordinate usury for his forbearance; he usually pays himself, for whatever risk he incurs, in the advantage which he obtains by the contract. For, Mr. President, in almost all contracts, the advantage is on the side of the creditors; they are the wealthy, and wealth, I repeat, is power. Now, sir, upon the supposition that the debtor has, either in contracting, or failing to pay the debt, committed the crime, can the creditor be safely trusted, to inflict the punishment? In that, as in every other class of offences, there are different degrees of guilt.

If the creditor be sympathetic and indulgent, he may not imprison his debtor; if he be avaricious, and his debtor possesses the means to bribe him, (and even Cerberus can, as we are told, be soothed by a crumb,) he may forbear to punish him. The man who contracted debt, with the most fraudulent intentions, may escape punishment; may go at large and enjoy his freedom, while the strictly honest, but unfortunate debtor, who is unable, from his poverty, to bribe his creditor; or, whose creditor shall be so callous as to be unmoved by his distresses, may be torn from his family and thrown into a jail. Besides, the debtor and creditor are equal in natural and political rights; as men, and as citizens, they are equal; their relation of debtor and creditor is accidental. The idea of permitting the creditor to punish his debtor, is at war with their natural and political equality; of two equal bodies, whether in the natural, moral, or political world, neither can control the other. Punishment can only be inflicted by the sovereign. Coming from the seat of the sovereign power of the commonwealth, its effect is felt, its justice acknowledged, and its power revered; coming from the hand of an equal, its effect is lost, and its power contemned and defied. The object of all punishment is reform.—The few are punished, in all wise governments, that the many may be restrained and reformed; but what reformation has been wrought in this country, or in England, by the punishment of imprisonment for debt, during the last three hundred years? To what extent has the guilt of incurring debt been restrained, by permitting creditors to imprison their debtors, during all that time? Sir, imprisonment for debt never has, and never will, diminish, much less extinguish, the guilt (if guilt it may be called) of indebtedness. People will incur debt, whenever they can obtain credit; and credit will always be given when there is a hope to gain by it. When you can extinguish the wants of the debtors, and the avarice of the creditors, you may hope to extinguish debt, and not till then. In fine, you must extinguish society, you must extinguish man, before you can banish this guilt from the world.

Sir, if you consider the debtor as a criminal, and imprisonment as the punishment of his crime, you cannot help perceiving, that the punishment is as unavailing as it is unnatural and cruel. But, again, if it is a crime to be indebted, why deprive the debtor of the privilege of every, even the most abhorred, culprit? Why do you invert the presumption of innocence, which shields the accused from punishment, until his guilt is proved, and presume him guilty without proof? Sir, when the debtor is imprisoned upon original or mesne process; even the fact of his being indebted, is not ascertained, is not proved, nor does the law require any proof of it,—it takes the word of the creditor for that fact; he brings his suit, and directs imprisonment, if bail cannot be obtained, and it is done accordingly. Sir, is there a people on earth, having any love of liberty, any pretensions to freedom, who would submit long and calmly to such a state of things?

Again, upon the admission which has been made for the sake of the argument, that debt is a crime, the debtor has a right, under the constitution, “to a speedy and impartial trial by a jury of his peers, from the vicinage, to be confronted, by the witnesses against him, and to compulsory process, to compel the attendance of witnesses, in his behalf.” But the debtor is imprisoned without jury, without trial, without the proof of witnesses against him, and without the privilege, or power, of adducing proof of his innocence. Now, the debtor is either innocent, or guilty; if innocent, he ought not to be imprisoned; if guilty, his guilt should be ascertained and established by proof, in the course of a fair, and impartial trial, according to the constitution of his country, before he should be imprisoned; conviction should, in all cases, precede punishment; but, whether guilty, or innocent, he should not, with or without a trial, be imprisoned by his creditor.

Mr. President, we are told by some of the opponents of this bill, that they have a great veneration for the common law, and are unwilling to make the innovation upon it, which this bill contemplates; that imprisonment for debt, is a common law regulation, which has existed for ages, and been sanctioned by the intelligence of mankind, during all that time; and they urge the long continuance of the rule, as conclusive evidence of its wisdom. Sir, it is certainly true of the common law, that it is a very ancient, and a very wise system, and that its antiquity is no small evidence of its wisdom. But has imprisonment for debt the authority of the common law in its favour? Is it of common law origin? If I believed it was, I, like the gentlemen who have advanced the sentiment, should be slow to question its wisdom; I should hesitate before I consented to abrogate it; for I consider the common law the most perfect, the most sublimated system of rules, for the conduct of man, in a state of civil society, that is to be found in the history of the world; a system which defines his rights, and regulates his conduct, with a more just regard to his life, his liberty, and his property, than any other, which has obtained amongst men; a system most happily suited to secure the personal liberty and promote the happiness of men, in all the conditions and relations to which they are incident, in a state of civil society: the only system which can, without the violation of modesty, exult in the boast, “that it is the perfection of reason.”

Sir, I, like the gentlemen who oppose me, claim the support of the common law upon this question; the gentlemen will pardon me, when I tell them that they labor under an illusion as to the common law doctrines, in reference to civil imprisonment; it knew of no such thing; there was no imprisonment for debt by the common law; that system left the creditor, in relation to his debtor, upon the only ground which he could justly or rationally occupy; the ground on which he had placed himself by his contract; it gave him access, by execution, to the property of his debtor, but forbade him to profane his person; it not only did not permit the creditor to tear the debtor from his family, and immure him in a prison, but it exempted the beasts of the plough from the execution of the creditor, for the support of the family of the debtor. And in this we see, not only the reason but the humanity of that wise system. Sir, it cannot be supposed that the creditor, in the contract, contemplated the body of the debtor as the fund out of which his money was to be made; he surveyed the condition of his debtor, and inferred his solvency from his possessions, not from his person. The common law rated the personal liberty of the subject above all price. One of its most favorite maxims is, “that the least corporal punishment is greater than the greatest possible amercement.” It would not, therefore, permit the creditor to take the body of the debtor, instead of his property; to violate his contract by the violation of the personal sanctity and liberty of his debtor. It would not permit the debtor, if he were so disposed, to contract for his imprisonment; still less would it sanction or enforce such a contract. Sir, the liberty of the subject, next to life, was the favorite of the common law; he could be imprisoned only for crime, and in that case, only by the sovereign power.

I repeat, Sir, that imprisonment for debt, so far from being sanctioned by the common law, was unknown to it, and reprobated by its spirit, its analogies, and its principles. The Senators from South Carolina have mistaken, if they will permit me to say so, statutory interpolations into that system, for the system itself. The antiquity of those statutory inroads upon the symmetry of that most excellent system, was well calculated to superinduce the error into which these learned Senators have fallen.

Sir, if the States in this Union had adopted the common law, the whole common law, and nothing but the common law, imprisonment for debt would have been unknown in our land, and they would have possessed a code of law as favorable to civil freedom as their Constitutions were suited to political liberty. The common law, before it was defiled by statutory innovations, might have been admired as the impenetrable Aegis of civil liberty. But the States, in adopting it, adopted with it the statutes of England, in furtherance (as they were miscalled) of its provisions; and the great misfortune is, that those statutes, and the judicial interpretations, or rather, in many instances, perversions of them, are mistaken for the common law itself. Sir, it was not until the reign of the third Henry, that civil imprisonment was known or tolerated in England. It had its origin, not in the intelligence of the nation, but in the power and avarice of the barons of England. It was not invoked by the reason of the people, but obtruded upon them by the aristocracy of wealth and title. The barons of that reign, obtained the passage of an act of Parliament, whereby it was ordained “that bailiffs, or stewards, who failed to account to their lords, if they withheld themselves, and had no lands or tenements, whereby they might be distressed upon by the common writ of attachment, should be attached by their bodies." Sir, I beg the Senate to observe with what caution, and under what limitations, this monster, civil imprisonment, makes its first appearance:—none but barons can imprison—and their lordships can only imprison their fraudulent bailiffs, or stewards, and them only when they shall have embezzled the money of their lords, and failed to account with them; and not even then, unless they abscond, having no lands or tenements. The reluctance with which the common law yielded to this first encroachment of the power of wealth upon the liberty of the subject, cannot escape the observation of the Senate. It is restrained in its application to a single class of debtors, and that in very special and imposing cases only. It is accorded to but one class of creditors, and when the poverty and paucity of the debtors are considered, in contrast with the number and wealth of the barons, we are led rather to admire the success of the resistance made by the common law against such an assault upon its principles, than to reproach it for yielding to the inroad. The jealousy, too, which it displayed in construing the statute, evinced its strong aversion to the odious innovation. The judges held the barons to the very letter of the act; for, if the steward had embezzled the money of his lord, and refused to account, but did not abscond, he could not be imprisoned; or, if, having embezzled the money, refused to account, and absconded, he could not, if he owned but one acre of land, be imprisoned by his lord; a concurrence of all the requisitions of the act were necessary to authorize the imprisonment. It was vain to urge that the bailiff had enjoyed and abused the confidence of his lord, had embezzled his money, refused to account, and had absconded, he could not be imprisoned if he had left one rood of land; so regardful was the common law of the liberty of the subject—so averse to violate it.

Sir, it was reserved for the power of wealth, in a more active and diffused state, to give more extended effect to this unhallowed innovation upon the liberty of the subject; the wealth of the barons consisted mainly in lands: it was as inoperative as it was unwieldy. The love of liberty with which agriculture inspires its practical votaries, was too strong to be extinguished by the sluggish power of baronial wealth; public sentiment was not prepared to sanction the perversion of the powers of the government, to the destruction of the liberties of the people. It remained for the more active power of commercial wealth to carry, at a subsequent period, the principle of imprisonment for debt, one step farther than it had been pushed by the influence of the barons. They had obtained the power of imprisoning their bailiffs only. The merchants obtained the passage of an act of parliament, in the reign of Edward the First, authorizing them to imprison their debtors. This matter, Mr. President, was got up and carried through Parliament as a tariff measure. That weak Prince seemed to have entered, most heartily, into the views of the coalition;—yes, Sir, a coalition between the barons and the merchants, to humble the proud spirit of freedom in that country. By the influence of the coalition, the Parliament taxed the liberty of the subject, to promote the spirit of mercantile enterprise, and encourage merchandize in the kingdom; that was the avowed reason for passing this law. It was in the process of taxing one interest to encourage another, under color of regulating the labor and the interests of all classes of the community, that the liberty of the debtor was sacrificed to the avarice of the creditor; the freedom of the poor to the cupidity of the rich. The law obtained by the barons against their bailiffs, backed by the concentrated power of all descriptions of wealth, had, by its secret, but unceasing operation upon public sentiment, prepared it for the enactment of the law in favor of merchants; and the passage of the law in favor of the latter, still farther prepared the public mind for the passage of another law, during the same reign, increasing the power of the barons over their bailiffs. By the last law, the baron, upon the mere failure of his bailiff to account, could, without any thing more or farther on the part of the bailiff, throw him into jail, there to remain in irons, until he should account satisfactorily. But the barons and the merchants were not the only wealthy classes in the kingdom; not the only persons whose wealth entitled them to the power of imprisoning their debtors; the people had grown familiar with civil imprisonment; their veneration for liberty had abated, in proportion to the frequency of its profanation; what had at first been resisted by all, as an innovation upon the common law, and a grievous encroachment upon their liberty, was now advocated by all denominations of creditors as a remedial measure. Every creditor asserted his right to the same rigor of remedy against his debtor, that had been accorded to the barons and the merchants. The barons and the merchants had no motive to resist, but every motive to assist and second this claim. But still the great mass of the people were unsubdued in their spirit; but their love of liberty, although shaken, was not conquered. It was not until the reign of the third Edward, that imprisonment was allowed in cases of debt and detainue. It was extended by an act of Parliament, in that reign, to those actions, and thus the law stood, until, in the reign of Henry the Seventh, when, by an act of Parliament, civil imprisonment was extended to actions on the case. Before this statute none but the barons, the merchants, and plaintiffs, in debt and detainue, could imprison their debtors. But, by this statute, imprisonment was almost indefinitely extended; none, indeed, could escape after the passage of this act, but the defendants, in actions of covenant and of annuities; and they were not long indulged with this immunity; for, in the reign of Henry the Eighth, imprisonment was extended by act of Parliament to them; and thus ended the freedom of the people of England, after a struggle of more than one hundred and fifty years; a struggle as glorious as it was protracted. Mr. President, in what other country was such a conflict ever witnessed; a conflict between the aristocracy and the people of a State, continued for nearly two centuries, without intermission! The assailants never pausing in their pursuit, while any thing was left to be achieved by perseverance; the assailed never ceasing to resist, while any thing was left them to defend. Sir, when this conflict commenced, the people of England were free; their civil code was the freest and the wisest in the world; their political code was a compound of monarchy, aristocracy, and republicanism. The common law, so far as it related to personal rights, was a purely republican system, and suited the representative principle, which was the republican feature in the political, or organic law of the kingdom; such was the effect of the freedom of their civil, united with the representative principle of their political code, as to make their government practically republican, while it was, in theory, a monarchy. It was substantially a republic in the mask of a monarchy, and the strong and protracted resistance made by the people to the encroachments of the aristocracy upon their liberty, by the infliction of civil imprisonment, resulted from the harmony of the principles of the common law, with the representative feature of their government; and of both with the natural and civil rights of man. The political freedom of England, so far as it depended upon the representative principle in her constitution, still remains, but the civil freedom of that country expired when the statute of Henry the Eighth received the royal sanction; from that moment every man in England (with the exception of the nobles, who never were subject to civil imprisonment) held his liberty at the discretion of his creditors. Sir, I have thus briefly attempted to rescue the common law from the imputation of having inflicted, or sanctioned the infliction, of civil imprisonment upon the people of England. I have done this by printing to the source whence it originated, and showing the time and manner of its introduction.

Sir, the acts of Parliament, to which I have called the attention of the House, are those only which originated and successively extended the power of imprisonment to all classes of creditors and to every species of civil action. I have, Sir, for the sake of brevity, overlooked two statutes, passed in relation to civil imprisonment; not in the spirit of the acts which established it, but to mitigate the rigor of that spirit; permit me barely to refer to their import and object: they were, the first, an act requiring the plaintiff to endorse upon the process the nature of his action, and directing the officer to be governed, in the service of the process, by that endorsement, in permitting or refusing bail to the party arrested. The second was an act to restrain and punish the abuses which were practised by the officers of the law, in carrying into effect the provisions of the first. And, Sir, what were the abuses intended to be restrained and punished? And who were the officers who practised these abuses? The officers were lawyers, judges, bailiffs, &c. The abuses were their oppression of debtors, by fraud, corruption, perjury, bribery, and extortion. Sir, they are recited in the preamble to the law; lawyers Empson and Dudley obtained a conspicuous infamy, and the infamous death of the gallows, for their oppressions and their crimes, in relation to civil imprisonment in the progress of its establishment. There were other persons, distinguished functionaries of the government, to whom it is not necessary to make special reference, who also expiated on the gallows the guilt of their unholy participation in the oppression of the people. Sir, there was, as I have stated, a radical discordance between the civil and political code of England; but the civil was made, by the power of wealth and of title, to conform to the nature, spirit, and principle of the political; the spirit of royalty, of nobility, and of the aristocracy of wealth which characterized the government, was infused into and impressed upon the civil code of the country; and it was the misfortune of the United States to adopt that system after it lost all its republican simplicity, and had been polluted, in the manner I have mentioned, by the interpolations of aristocracy. Sir, the States were, when they adopted this system, in a condition not very propitious to deliberate scrutiny. They had, in common with the other subjects of the monarch, from whose tyranny they had but just escaped, become familiar with civil imprisonment; they had worn the yoke so long that it had ceased to gall them; their attention, of course, was not directed by their sufferings to the consideration of that subject; and, if it had been, they had not leisure to consider it; and, if they had possessed leisure, they were not in a condition favorable to the scrupulous deliberation which the subject required; they were but just emerging from their revolutionary struggles; they had achieved their political liberty, formed their free constitutions, and, exhilarated with the joys inseparable from their triumphs, never dreamed of oppression from their civil codes; never dreamed that, although they had conquered England, the civil code of England, which they had adopted, might reconquer them. But, Sir, that is not now our condition; we have leisure for deliberation, and are unexcited and ought to decide whether, while calmly enjoying the political liberty achieved for, and bequeathed to us, by our revolutionary forefathers, we should continue to submit to the oppressions of civil imprisonment which they could not successfully resist.

Sir, it has always seemed to me strange that we should be so willing to adopt, and incorporate into our code, a system which was obtruded upon the people of England by the worst influences of wealth, aided by the most corrupt practices on the part of the functionaries of the government. A system that discolored the history of the times in which it was introduced, not less by the oppressions which it inflicted than by the corruptions and obliquities by which it was propagated and maintained; a system which, while it is sustained by the power of wealth, is reprobated by the reason and humanity of all mankind.

Sir, what are the benevolent associations throughout England; aye, all Christendom, for the relief of imprisoned debtors? What the daily contributions made by even the poor and the needy, to mitigate the horrors of imprisonment for debt? What but the tacit, the unceasing rebellion of reason and humanity against this wretched system? Sir, we exult in our government as the freest on earth, and yet there is not a free man within it, who may not be deprived of his freedom, whenever, by any of those innumerable casualties to which all human plans are incident, he shall be rendered unable to meet his engagements. We boast of our free institutions, and yet are continually soliciting and bestowing gratuities to relieve our incarcerated fellow citizens.

We refuse to abolish imprisonment for debt, while we are daily weeping over the miseries of imprisoned debtors. Strange insatiation!! We would pour out our blood like water, to vindicate our freedom from foreign aggression, and yet cherish domestic tyranny; as if the loss of liberty were not the same, whether inflicted by the Cossacks of Russia or by our creditors at home. How long, Mr. President, is this fatal illusion to last? When will the people awaken to a practical knowledge of their rights? When will they become convinced that no people can be free, whatever may be the theory of their government, who permit imprisonment for debt? When, Mr. President, will they learn that punctuality is not, cannot, be promoted by imprisonment? That a jail is not the best school for the inculcation of correct morals?

When, Sir, let me ask emphatically, will they learn that the fear of corporal punishment, if it operates at all, will make slaves of those on whom it operates? That it is the motive to action with the abject and slavish only? Sir, let me ask, with increased emphasis, when they will learn that the most effectual way to influence freemen is to address their pride—to appeal to their conscious self-worth?

Make punctuality a point of honor with our citizens, Mr. President, and there is nothing within the scope of their utmost energies which they will not achieve to maintain it. In that way, Sir, you will cultivate a sentiment, which, while it promotes punctuality in contracts, much more effectually than imprisonment can do, will form a guarantee for the continuance of our free institutions; and upon which the country may rely in emergencies, more than upon any physical force which can be arrayed in its favor. Sir, let us not forget here, and let it never be forgotten elsewhere, that the strength of a free government, consists essentially in moral, not in physical force.

Sir, let the civil regulations engage the affections of the people, by protecting their rights, and securing them from violence and oppression of every kind. Let them know and feel that their political condition cannot be improved by the substitution of any other form of government, and they will give perpetuity to their own. They aim to be happy, and once possessed of that form of government, and that code of laws, which conduce most to the attainment of that great end, they will support—they will perpetuate them.

But they cannot be happy in a prison; they cannot be happy under a constant liability to be thrown into prison.

JAN. 10, 1828.]

Imprisonment for Debt.

[SENATE.]

They cannot be happy unless they are free; and they cannot be free while they are liable to be imprisoned for debt. Therefore, Mr. President, it is necessary to the happiness of the people and the perpetuity of our institutions, that imprisonment for debt should be abolished. And, Mr. President, what valid objection—valid, did I say—what plausible objection can be alleged against the abolition of civil imprisonment? It is said by one gentleman that this regulation has so connected and intertwined itself with our civil proceedings, that we cannot well foresee the injuries which its repeal may produce. That, not seeing the exact extent of its repeal, he thinks it better to let it remain. He would prefer that the process laws of the States should be the process laws of the federal courts in the States respectively. In the latter sentiment I concur with him most sincerely, and shall unite with him most heartily to carry that sentiment into effect; but in the former, I cannot concur with him. While I admit that civil imprisonment has been mixed up with the process laws of the several States, to a very great, even to an embarrassing extent in some of the States, I cannot agree with him, that it is better to let it remain than to attempt its removal; nor can I concur with him in the reasons which he assigns for declining the attempt to remove it. Sir, although this bill, if it should pass, cannot have the effect to abolish imprisonment for debt in the States, yet it will deny to the General Government the use of civil imprisonment in its courts. This will be a banishment of it from the courts of the United States; and I calculate much upon the moral effect of it in the States. Sir, I cannot agree to the sentiment that an existing evil shall not be removed, lest the removal of it should produce greater; government itself is an evil, and the only one which I would not remove, lest greater should follow. The best test of a good government is, that it is itself the least evil which the people suffer, and the only one which they are obliged to suffer; and that, confiding in it, they may safely remove any, and all others. That, Sir, would be my definition of a good government—of a genuine republic. What would we say of the wisdom of an individual whose face was deformed with a wart, which threatened to become a cancer, who, instead of removing it by the knife, should permit it to remain until it had become a real cancer, and so intertwined its roots with his vital organs as to render excision impracticable? he forbore the use of the knife, fearing that its use might produce greater evils, and must expiate his folly with his life. Sir, the destroying power of almost every evil, moral, physical, and political, consists mainly, and somewhat mysteriously, in its continuity. The condition of that republic, to which the continuance of an incumbent and obvious evil has become necessary, is greatly to be deplored. Let us then, Mr. President, remove from the fair fabric of our liberty, this cancer, civil imprisonment, which deforms its aspect, and will corrode and destroy its vital structure, unless it be removed.

The only plausible ground for the toleration, for a moment, of civil imprisonment, is its alleged coercive effect upon the debtor. But that is utterly fallacious; for either he has, or he has not, property. If he has, let the creditor levy his fi. fa. upon it and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt, as far as they will go. If he has no property, then its coercion must be vain, useless, and cruel; so that, in neither case, can it be necessary, but in both, must be cruel and useless. But here, sir, I may be told, that the debtor may have no property except of an equitable character, such as bank stock, bonds, &c. which cannot be seized and sold by a fi. fa. I reply, alter the law in that respect. It is easy to do so, and much better, and more humane, to subject the equitable effects of the debtor to the execution of the creditor than to subject his body to imprisonment.

I am, Mr. President, as clear, that the property of the debtor, real, personal, and mixed, legal and equitable, should be subjected to the payment of his debts, as that his body should not be imprisoned by his creditor. No man, Mr. President, is a more zealous advocate for punctuality in contracts than I am; but I rate personal liberty too high to subject it to the casualties to which contracts are necessarily liable. It is not that I love punctuality less, but that I love freedom more. I would, therefore, instantly, reckless of the consequences, abolish imprisonment for debt. The evil is so much greater than any which could possibly follow its removal, that I would not for a moment hesitate to remove it. Indeed upon the supposition that the evils which are predicated would certainly follow, I would invite them, if I could not do better, by the instant abolition of civil imprisonment. For, Mr. President, who would not exchange a greater for a less evil; and any evil, which did not destroy life, would be less than imprisonment, in my estimation.

But, sir, I apprehend no evils from the passage of this bill; on the contrary, I anticipate great good. What evils are to be apprehended? None certainly that cannot be removed in like manner, by the legislative arm of the Government. And for what is the annual meeting of the Legislature, but to redress, or remove accruing grievances? Sir, this proneness in the people to bear with the ills that grieve them, rather than encounter those of which they know not, has led to the loss of their liberty, in innumerable instances. Mr. President, the people in every state of civil society, whatever may be their exterior relations, are engaged in an unceasing strife among themselves. The strife is between the wealthy and ambitious on one side, and all the balance of the people on the other: between the few and the many; the few to live upon the labor of the many, and to rule them; the many to enjoy the fruits of their own labor and to participate in the exercise of the ruling power. The wealth of every country falls eventually into the hands of a few. This wealth is, of itself, power; office is power; wealth and office associated, which often happens, is a power difficult to resist. In this conflict the many have the physical force, the few have the moral power. Sir, the few are the aristocracy, the many are the people; the people are confiding, unsuspicious, and prone to bear with things as they are; the aristocracy, influenced by the restless spirit of avarice and the ceaseless impulses of unchastened ambition, pursue their unholy purposes with a perseverance that never tires, and with a vigilance that never sleeps. The encroachments of the aristocracy are silent, sinuous, secret, and insidious. The people, busied in the honest pursuits of life, and struggling with its casualties and inquietudes, are without the leisure to detect and often without the power, and too frequently without the inclination, to resist these encroachments upon their rights; they resist only when they are agonized by oppression, and their resistance ceases usually with their sufferings; they never pursue and exterminate the cause of their afflictions. The assaultment of their rights is impalpable and continuous; such was the character of the power and of the operations which were employed for near two centuries in subjecting the people of England to civil imprisonment. Sir, it is this power, no matter under what disguise it may present itself (and it is always masked) which the people of a free government have to fear, more than all the other powers of the earth. Sir, we are told of the danger which civil liberty has to apprehend from military chieftains; such alarms are the usual stratagems by which aristocracy lulls the suspicion or diverts the attention of the people from its own insidious encroachments upon their liberty. Sir, this aristocracy is a very proteus; it is now a harmless civilian; at another time it is a zealous Christian, a rigid moralist, a great lover of justice; again it is a great patriot, influenced exclusively by a pure love of country and a great zeal to promote its prosperity and happiness ; but its most prominent characteristic is, an ardent love of the dear people and their dearer liberty. Now, Sir, all experience has proved that the love of aristocracy towards the people and their rights, is the love which the tiger bears to the kid, or the wolf to the lamb. No, Sir, it is not from military chieftains that liberty has any thing to apprehend. The danger lies in another quarter ; it is from the power of wealth, and the unholy aspirations of unchastened ambition, that she has cause of apprehension. Do you believe, sir, that one hundred thousand bayonets, headed by the most distinguished military chieftain, could have forced upon England this wretched system of civil imprisonment ? could have extorted from them, by force, the liberty which was filched from them by guile ? No, Sir, a people in a state of civil society, enjoying freedom, and animated with the genuine spirit of liberty, have nothing to apprehend from any open assault upon their rights ; it is, I repeat, from the secret, sly, insidious operations of aristocracy, their arch-enemy, that they have every thing to fear. Sir, a republic, in which there is the living and abiding spirit of freedom, has around it a zone of inviolability, a magic cincture, (analogous to that which surrounds and protects matron excellence from the approach of the licentious,) as impenetrable as adamant. Sir, such is the shielding effect of this atmospheric panoply, that neither the republic nor the matron is ever assailed, until they have given indications that they are accessible. Neither the one nor the other is assaulted until they are prepared to yield. When the people of a republic become too effeminate, or too corrupt, for self-government, they invoke, by their very condition, rule from some other quarter ; and none but a chieftain can accept the invitation, because none but such a character could vindicate his right to rule against other aspirants equally embraced in the invitation. Sir, they cannot deprive a free people of their self governing power ; they can only rule such a people when they have become too corrupt, or too effeminate, to rule themselves.

Do you, Sir, does any intelligent man, believe, that the people of Rome possessed the capacity to govern themselves, when Julius Cæsar usurped the government of that commonwealth ? No, Sir, if there had been virtue and vigor enough in the people of Rome for self government, Cæsar would not have made the attempt ; or if he had, he would have have lost his head ; not Rome, her liberty. When Cæsar was slain, did Rome resume her freedom ? No, she had lost the capacity. Sir, it was not the power of arms which enslaved the people of Rome or of England ; it was a very different and far more dangerous power—the sly, insidious, unprincipled, and unceasing power of aristocracy.

Rome, too, sir, had her civil imprisonment ; and, by the constant exercise of it, taught her people lessons of vassalage, which prepared them for the slavery which ensued. Sir, the people of this, or any other Government, will lose their reverence for personal liberty, by seeing, constantly, their neighbors or friends deprived of it. Rome was free while the sentiments of her people were in consonance with the law, which forbade stripes to be inflicted upon a Roman citizen. Sir, liberty is identified with the person of its votary ; it is inseparable from his person ; it is, of course, personal ; to preserve it, you must maintain the sanctity of the persons with whom it is identified ; to secure the jewel, you must be careful of the casket which contains it. Sir, to preserve liberty in a republic, instead of cheapening and degrading it by imprisonment for debt, the highest, the most sublimated notions of personal sanctity should be cherished and cultivated. It is the province of the real statesman to make the frailties of men, in a state of civil society, subserve the cause of their liberty, their virtue, and their happiness. Pride and vanity rank among the weaknesses of our nature ; and yet, if the vanity, or the pride, of our citizen were enlisted on the side of punctuality, who can doubt of what would be the effect ? Sir, the punctuality with which gaming debts are paid, is proverbial : this punctuality is not the result of civil imprisonment ; for those debts cannot be recovered by law ; whence, then, I ask this remarkable punctuality ? Sir, it results from those proud feelings, from that nice sense of honor, which it is the tendency of civil imprisonment to blunt, to vitiate, to obliterate. Let us then cherish and promote, in society those sensibilities from which results, so felicitous, may be justly expected.

Sir, a senator from S. Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has told us that creditors are, in the general, merciful and sympathetic ; and that they do not imprison their debtors cruelly or unjustly : the wealthy, he tells us, are not tyrants. The honorable senator judges of the feelings of the wealth from his own humane sympathies. And I am willing to acknowledge, that there are many, very many instances of humanity and charity to be found among the wealthy but these can only be regarded as creditable exceptions to the indurating effect which wealth exerts upon the feelings of those who have been long in the possession of it. Sir, if you dissect aristocracy, and examine its constituent parts, you will find the classes of which it is composed, avaricious and unfeeling ; there may and will be found, in each class, as I have said, numerous and honorable exceptions ; but all classes, even their reverence where they are upon good establishments, are influenced by the same unfeeling devotion to gain and to dominion which characterized the barons, the merchants, the lawyers, the judges, and other nurslings of fortune, of whom I have spoken.

Sir, who has not read of the tithe cases, and who do not know the causes which led to the enactment of the acts of mortmain ? Sir, it is a remarkable fact, that the laws, which authorized creditors to imprison their debtors are very few, compared with those which have been enacted to mitigate the sufferings which have been inflicted upon debtors by the unfeeling rigor of their creditors. The great fire, which consumed London, reduced to poverty and destitution many thousand honest debtors ; who was the mercy, the sympathy, displayed by their creditors ? Why, instead of extending indulgence to their unfortunate debtors, and softening their calamities, by generous and charitable contributions, they threw them in prison, and continued them in confinement, until they were released by act of Parliament. Shall I refer to gentlemen to another instance of the sympathy of creditors, in the wretched assemblage of lacerated debtors, the Mons Sacer at Rome ? The history of mankind but a history of the unfeeling and oppressive conduct of creditors towards their debtors. If you want to find sympathy, look for it among those who have learned from their own sufferings to feel for the woes of others. The sympathies of the heart come to perfection only when they are bedewed by its sorrows. Talk not, then, Mr. President, of the mercy of creditors ; it is cruelty, it is ranny : I speak of it as history exhibits it : but if it were not, is it wise to have our citizens dependent upon the mercy of their creditors for their freedom ? Can any thing be more humiliating to the debtors as men, or degrading to them as citizens ?

Mr. President, let me repeat, that the strength of a State consists in the number, and its wealth in the industry, of its citizens. I have seen it stated in one of the public prints, that, during the last twelve months, there were imprisoned in the little State of Rhode Island 100 debtors. Now, Sir, upon the supposition that the remaining twenty-three States of this Union were no larger than that small State, there must have been 25,200 freedmen imprisoned within the United States, for debt alone, within the last twelve months. Suppose the price of labor:

be fifty cents per day, and suppose their confinement to average only ninety days in each year, the loss is $12,600 per day, and, for the ninety days, it is $1,135,000: but suppose that number, upon an average, to be confined annually, and for the whole year, then the loss in each year would be $4,540,000, and in twenty years would amount to the enormous sum of $90,800,000. This loss is a fair drawback upon the public stock. Is it not enormous, and sustained without any competent motive on the part of the Government?—A loss which the Government inflicts, under the influence of the power of wealth, upon the poor and most meritorious portion of the community, and through them upon itself. But the mere loss, in dollars and cents, is but a small part of the evil, when compared with the loss of liberty inflicted upon 25,200 citizens; the derangement in their affairs; the agony inflicted upon their families and friends; and last, though not least, the diminution of reverence produced in the public mind, for the liberty of the citizens, by the constant incarceration of them, and the consequent tendency to vassalage. Sir, your jails are schools in which the science of slavery is taught, and exemplified by the imprisonment of debtors. Its effects are only not alarming, because they are not seen in the aggregate. Could they be exhibited at one view, they would shock the public mind, and awaken the sympathy and indignation of the whole community. The great majority of the people require but to know in order to do what is right; and if they could but see even the one-half of the misery which is daily inflicted upon debtors by the merciless rigor of their creditors, there would be no difficulty in abolishing imprisonment for debt. Mr. President, it is strange that the miseries of the imprisoned should have engaged the attention and awakened the sympathies of the wise and good in all countries, and that imprisonment should, notwithstanding, be tolerated by almost all Governments. It is surely no small argument in favor of the abolition of imprisonment, that the miseries of that condition excited the compassion, and drew forth expressions of tenderness towards the imprisoned, from the lips of him who spoke as never man spake. "I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me not," is a language which ought not, when we consider where it came, to be without its effect, in the consideration of this subject.

Sir, if barely to have devised the means of mitigating the sufferings of imprisoned debtors conferred immortality upon the benevolent Howard, in what estimation ought the creditors who inflict those sufferings to be held? And, in what estimation ought the legislatures to be held, who conferred upon creditors the power of imprisoning their unfortunate debtors, or tolerated its exercise? Sir, I feel some pride in being able to say, that the State which has honored me with a seat in this body, has washed its hands of this evil; has, by the abolition of civil imprisonment, given freedom to her own citizens, and to all who shall come within her borders.

Mr. President, what is the consistency of that legislation, which denies, under severe penalties, to the avarice of creditors, the exaction from their debtors of a cent beyond the established rate of interest, and yet permits them to imprison their debtors? How can we reconcile, on the part of legislation, this carefulness of the property, and carelessness of the liberty of the debtor? The laws against usury are as creditable to legislation, as those in favor of civil imprisonment are reproachful to it. The first secures the honest industry of the poor and the enterprising against the merciless encroachments of the rich; the latter subjects the body and the liberty of the poor to the avarice of the wealthy; as if liberty was of less value or importance than property. Sir, why is our standing army so small? why are we opposed to having large standing armies? You tell me that large standing armies are dangerous to liberty; if you mean any liberty but that of creditors, I tell you that the caution on that subject is unnecessary: your army is reduced to 6,000, while 25,200 of your citizens have lost their liberty, and are now pining in your prisons. Sir, your creditors, the aristocracy of the country, are infinitely more dangerous to liberty than a standing army of any number. Afraid that liberty may be endangered by a large standing army!! while you arm every creditor with the power of depriving his debtors of their liberty!! Afraid of the tyranny of a large standing army, while you subject the liberty of your citizens to the tyranny of exasperated avarice and inflated wealth! You are careful to secure the liberty of your citizens against the uncertain power of arms, while you subject it to the certain, the tremendous, the resistless power of avarice; for surely that power is tremendous and resistless, which in a free country can imprison twenty-five thousand two hundred innocent, but unfortunate citizens per annum. What, Mr. President, is the practical result of all this care for the preservation of liberty? Is it not that the wealthy and the prosperous are secured in their liberty, and in the power of depriving the poor and the unfortunate of all they possess worth preserving—their liberty? Sir, the liberty of the citizens of a republic should be subjected to hazard only by their crimes. It should depend, not upon the caprice of individuals, but upon the sovereign power of the State, and it ought to cost the State the exertion of its sovereign energies to deprive its humblest citizen of his liberty. But, sir, with us, not only can any one individual deprive another of his liberty, but there is among us a single individual who can at any time deprive thousands, I might say millions, of freemen of their liberty. I mean the bank of the United States; it can furnish nearly all the money which can be beneficially employed in our commercial and other agencies throughout the United States. All who employ or use its money must be indebted for it, either to that institution or to those who are indebted for it. It is easy to perceive, not only the moral influence of that enormous creditor over its debtors, but the power of actual incarceration, which it possesses, under the existing laws. It must, or rather may, and most certainly will, exert whatever imprisoning power it may possess, and choose to exert, through the instrumentality of the United States' courts; so that a corporate person, created by the United States, may imprison ad libitum the citizens of the States who are its debtors; and thus the liberty of the States, which consists in the freedom of its citizens, may be prostrated in the imprisonment of its debtors to an indefinite extent by this institution. Mr. President, this consideration ought not to be without its weight in our deliberations upon the effect of this bill; nor ought it to be overlooked by those who contend that but few cases can arise in the courts of the United States, to which its benign provisions can apply. Sir, the cases may be innumerable, and whether they shall or not, depends, unhappily, not upon the will of Congress, but upon the will of that bank.

And after all, Mr. President, what is gained to mankind by civil imprisonment? Do we learn from the history of England, that the people were more happy, more wise, more virtuous, or even more punctual, after the introduction of civil imprisonment, than before? Not at all; so far as we are furnished with any lights on that subject, we are led to the contrary conclusion. The people were at least as punctual, as virtuous, and more happy, before, than since that period.

The aristocracy of England had motives in the stability and duration which the laws of primogeniture and the doctrine of entails gave to wealth in that country, to swell, by every practicable device, the volume of its power; they could promise themselves, in the durable enjoyment and transmission of the power which wealth confers, some equivalent, however unenviable it might be, for the sacrifices of principle and of feeling which they made to acquire it; but with us, happily, there is not even that poor incentive. They could hope, while struggling to obtain the power of civil imprisonment, that they and their children could exercise it through a long line of succession; but our constitutions have wisely cut off all hopes of that kind, by placing an irreversible negative upon the aristocratic doctrines of primogeniture, entails, and of perpetuities of every kind. Our doctrine, that the distribution, division, and mutation of wealth, is the basis of equality and liberty, ought to impress us with the folly and shortsightedness of advocating civil imprisonment; for, with us, those who, to-day, exercise the power of imprisonment, may, to-morrow, be themselves the subjects of it; so that in the lapse of a single century, the children of unfortunate imprisoned debtors, may imprison the children of the unfeeling creditors of their fathers. We ought to reflect, that while avarice and the bad feelings of the human heart prompt to imprisonment for debt, it is casualty and misfortune, it is, in short, the destinies, that prepare and furnish the unhappy subjects for the exercise of that cruel and unjust power. So that, Mr. President, upon a rational survey of the human condition, for any one century, it will be found, that the people of a Republic will, by civil imprisonment, have tortured themselves, abridged their liberty, and impaired their happiness, without having at all improved their general condition; without having become more wise, more virtuous, more happy, or more punctual. They will not have gained, but they will have lost; lost greatly; lost, to the amount of all the sufferings, and all the agonies, which had been thus uselessly and unavailingly inflicted upon them by their exercise of this bad imprisoning power. But what is greatly more to be deplored, they will have lost their veneration for liberty, which, in all Republics, is the immediate precursor of the loss of liberty itself.

But, Sir, there is another consideration which ought to have great weight in this matter, and that is, that the subjects of civil imprisonment, are generally the most useful and enterprising of our citizens. The people of every State may be divided into those who live upon their capital, and those who live by their labor, or labor for their living. The capitalists are, in the general, indolent, luxurious, and effeminate, possessing neither energy nor enterprise; they are the wealthy. The laborers, who are the poor, are hardy, resolute, and enterprising; they fell the forests, subdue the soil, and spread, under the smiles of Providence, plenty over the land; they make the roads, and cut the canals, which so essentially subserve the purposes of commerce and social intercourse; it is from their toil, and their hardihood, the commerce springs, which enriches the public coffers and sustains the Government. In fine, it is to their valor we are indebted for those victories which have thrown around the nation the halo of glory of which we are all so justly proud. Sir, they are the gunwales and knee timbers of the vessel of state; they are the bone and sinew of the state; they assert, maintain, and preserve that very liberty which is so much abused in their very persons. Sir, I do hope, and I rejoice in the hope, that the bill now under discussion, is destined to banish this monster from the General Government, and that the States will follow the example and banish it from their respective Governments; and that, hereafter, the families and relatives of unfortunate debtors will not be compelled by the rigors of unfeeling creditors, and the connivance of the law, to abhor the Government under which they live.

Sir, I fear I have fatigued the Senate; the importance of the question must plead my apology. I will sit down under the consolation, that I have been advocating the rights of the unfortunate, and under the hope that my feeble exertions in their behalf will not have been unavailing.

Mr. MACON said, that, in the eye of the law and of justice, there was no difference between the debtor and the creditor. They stood on the same ground of right, and deserved protection alike. He never could see into the justice of keeping a man in jail when he had given up all he had. If he did this, what more could be asked of him? If he is put in jail, what can he do? He can't work there, to earn a living and pay his debts, unless he happens to be a tailor or a shoemaker. He did not believe that all creditors were hard-hearted, nor that all debtors were fraudulent. They were likely to be faulty and frail, as human beings always were, but that was all.

I don't intend, said Mr. M. to keep you here long, because it is pretty near our dinner hour; although we have a little time left, because we don't get our dinners until the other House adjourns. But there are fraudulent creditors, as well as debtors, as the gentleman from Ohio said the other day about some claimants for land. For instance, how many fraudulent men are there who go about shaving notes; and I am sure, he is as bad who shaves, as he who gets shaved—I should think, worse. Then how many men are there who lend money to young people, and make a practice of cheating what may be called infants. They say, "Oh, your parents will pay, rather than see you disgraced." The gentleman from Kentucky has said, that there are 1,900 prisoners for debt in the State of New York. Well, it is said, that, perhaps, most of them are in for frauds. But suppose they are; ten righteous people might have saved Sodom and Gomorrah; and if the gentleman from Kentucky gets out ten, that his bill applies to, he'll do well. I am sorry the gentleman has seen fit to use the names of Jefferson and Sumpter, and tell how poor they were. I do not like to legislate under the influence of names. If a thing is right, let it go for such—if not, get rid of it. I know that gambling is common at the South, and so it is in every other part of the country where I have been. But the gentleman says that gambling debts are always paid. Yes; because they are debts of honor: and I believe many men would sell their wives' bonnets to pay them. It is said that they are debts of honor. Yes; because a man who refused to pay them, would be kicked out of the society of his associates, and nobody else will have him: so that he is obliged to make these debts debts of honor. But, it is said that this will operate only in the United States' Courts. Well; there is just where it is wanted. Every man is known in his own State, and has friends who will go bail for him. Our people from the South chiefly go to New York, and there they can manage pretty well—but it is not so every where. I always thought that Governments were made to be rich, and what the gentleman from Kentucky said to-day, makes me believe it. Why is it, that we can't touch Bank stock? Why, because it is held by the rich. It is a kind of lottery that they deal in themselves. Now, this bill will remedy that, because, if any man puts his money into bank stock, he will be coerced to give it up. We are not much troubled with lotteries at the South, though we have a great deal of horse-racing, and many fine race-horses. And for my part, I am willing that people who have money should bet upon them. The reason why this bill has been opposed on former occasions, was, that the gentleman from Kentucky was so very willing to please every body. And he reminded him of the man who, endeavoring to please all he met, lost his ass for his pains. I recollect he admitted an amendment to go into the bill, and I told him that he would lose it: but he was so anxious to carry it, that he wished to make friends to it by allowing all the propositions that were offered. I told him then that he would lose it, and he did lose it—and I am afraid it will be so now. I did not intend to say so much when I rose, as I know that long speeches are seldom welcome near dinner hour.

Cahawba Navigation Company—Imprisonment for Debt.

[SENATE.]

Mr. TAZEWELL said, that he would merely suggest to the friends of the bill, that a question would naturally arise as to what was to be done with the unfortunate being who happened to be imprisoned. They had made provision that any one who should be imprisoned should be deprived of the benefit of the prison rules, and go within the walls of a prison. He felt this proposition perhaps a little more than others, because he had a few days since made some remarks on the operation of the law on his own State, and on the method of obtaining process on landed estates. But the answer of the gentleman from Georgia was, that the provision applied to all persons who so invested their property as not to be subject to execution. Against them the capias ad satisfaciendum was to operate. Thus, every person in Virginia to whom his predecessors have left landed property, would be subjected to imprisonment in close jail, for no other crime than for being the heirs of their fathers. They would be placed in this predicament for no crime of their own, but for the law under which they happen to live. He rose to ask the gentleman whether this was the operation they intended to give the bill.

Mr. BERRIEN thanked the Senator from Virginia for his aid, and his suggestions. It was in no idle or insincere spirit that the aid of his coadjutors had been asked. I shall take every means in my power to consider these suggestions. All the attention I can give them, they shall claim from me. But I must state, that the object aimed at by the friends of this bill in its plan and details, is to relieve all but those who fraudulently withhold their property from their creditors. He felt disposed to give full consideration to the condition of the Virginia landholders, and it should be a subject of his closest investigation. But, as the hour had arrived, he would now move an adjournment.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1828.

CAHAWBA NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill granting the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Alabama, incorporating the Cahawba Navigation Company, without amendment.

Mr. KING remarked, that, in explanation of this bill, he would merely say, that the Legislature of this State, considering it incumbent on them to obtain the assent of Congress—in which he, [Mr. K.] did not agree with them—to improve the waters within its limits, had instructed him to introduce this bill. The waters of the Cahawba were not now navigable, and it was highly desirable that the obstructions in that stream should be removed. It was therefore proposed to raise a toll upon the navigation, for the purpose of defraying the expense.

Mr. CHANDLER said that he did not know upon what ground the consent of Congress was asked.

Mr. KING further explained, that the Cahawba was a small stream running through Alabama, the navigation of which was necessary to enable the citizens of that State to transport their cotton to market, and bring back the necessary articles of merchandise. The State wished to know whether they had a right to levy a toll for the improvement of this stream, and to obtain the assent of Congress to the enterprise.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that the same bill passed the Senate last year, but did not pass the House. It involved no new principle. The compact between the United States and the new States had restricted the latter from levying tolls on the streams within their limits; and it had been customary, from time to time, to give the assent of Congress to the collection of a toll on waters not previously navigable, to defray the expense of the improvement of their navigation.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

VOL. IV—5

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up, and the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt being under consideration, on the question of engrossing for a third reading—

Mr. BERRIEN moved an amendment to the sixth section, so as to make the provisions of that section operate not merely prospectively, but upon cases of actual imprisonment; which was agreed to.

Mr. EATON moved an amendment to the 7th line of the 10th section, by adding, after the word "female," "or male of the age of 70 years or upwards."

Mr. TAZEWELL referred to the fact, that, under the existing laws, the plaintiff, after obtaining judgment, acquires a lien on the estate of the defendant; which lien has precedence of those subsequently obtained, and entitles the plaintiff to be paid before those creditors who afterwards obtain judgment are paid. But this bill takes away the lien, and reduces the plaintiff, after he has encountered all the costs and trouble of a suit, to the same level with all the other creditors. It was, therefore, obvious that the bill, in this respect, required alteration, at least in phraseology.

Mr. BERRIEN said that the Senator from Virginia would not have made this objection, had he fully contemplated the provisions of the bill. The case presented was this: A vigilant creditor prosecutes a suit, and compels the debtor to an assignment of all his property, and then the negligent creditors, without cost or trouble, come in, sharing rateably in the fruits of the first plaintiff's vigilance. This is the objection. But this is not the intention of the bill. The bill does not take from the plaintiff his lien on the estate of the defendant, nor does it take from him his priority in the distribution of that estate. This construction, Mr. B. said, would be found correct, on reference to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TAZEWELL did not think that the Senator from Georgia had put a right construction on the words of the bill. The lien, he said, which was acquired by the judgment, was barred by the assignment.

Mr. BERRIEN further explained.

Mr. TAZEWELL was not satisfied as to the correctness of the construction of the Senator from Georgia. Of what use was the execution against the estate after the assignment was made. The property no longer belonged to the debtor, but to his creditors. That is the proper construction, and will be the effect of the bill, unless its phraseology be altered.

Mr. BELL rose to suggest that, in many of the States, the judgment did not give a lien on real estate.

Mr. BERRIEN said that the bill adapted its provisions to the existing state of laws in the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, observed, that the bill left the State laws where it found them. Those laws would regulate the lien given to creditors by judgments.

Mr. MCKINLEY said he found, by the 4th section of the bill, a provision for filing interrogatories, with a view to elicit disclosures as to the value of the defendant's property. But he did not perceive that these disclosures were to lead to any beneficial end. No order or proceeding with regard to the property was to be the result of the information obtained through the interrogatories. The property being discovered through this process, was left without any provision as to its distribution. The inquiry, therefore, as to the value, condition, and place of the defendant's property, appeared to him to be nugatory.

Mr. BERRIEN said, the inquiry made by the Senator from Alabama was natural, considering that, in the State where he resided, all property, real and personal, was subject to execution. In some States lands were subject only to be extended; in others, they were liable both to extent and sale. If, upon inquiry, by means of the interrogatories, it is found that the plaintiff has no concealed property, he is exempted from the operation of the ca. sa.; but if it be found that he has property, and seeks to withhold it, the operation of the ca. sa. revives as to him. The result of the interrogatories, then, will be, that, in those States where land is subject to execution, the party can take out execution against it, if the defendant has any; and in those States where land is exempt from execution, the party plaintiff may take out an execution against the body of the defendant. In regard to personal property, also, the plaintiff, after the discovery of the property, may have recourse to it, or, if it be withheld, to the body, which he may commit to close confinement. The plaintiff, therefore, in case of the discovery of property withheld by the defendant, is remitted to his original remedy, as if this bill had not been enacted.

Mr. McKINLEY was not satisfied with the explanation. If the plaintiff incurs the expense and trouble of a Chancery suit, to ascertain whether the defendant has property, is it proper that the proceeding should there stop? Ought not the creditor to have the power of securing, in some way, the debt due to him? How many debtors, after final process, find means to evade their debts, and retain their property? The interrogatories were in the nature of a bill of discovery; and he was in hopes that they were intended for the double purpose of securing the rights of the creditor and the debtor.

Mr. BERRIEN intended, when up before, to add, in answer to the Senator from Alabama, that, if the bill provided that all property discovered by the courts of interrogatories should be given up to the plaintiff, it would conflict with the laws of those States where lands are not subject to execution for debt.

Mr. TAZEWEILL should not, he said, say any thing in relation to the effect of the bill on those creditors who have gone through with its double process. He had now risen to offer an amendment to the bill, by striking out the 9th section, which provides "that in all cases where the body of any person shall be subject to imprisonment by the provisions of this act, such person shall be deprived of the benefit of prison bounds, and kept in close custody until discharged by due course of law." He had already stated the effect which the provision would have in one State, Virginia; and gentlemen from other parts of the country would apply it to the States which they represented. The effect of the provision in Virginia would be to incarcerate every landholder sued in the courts of the United States. To inherit land in a State where land was exempted from execution, was made a crime; and the debtor landholder must go into close confinement.

Mr. BERRIEN trusted that the motion would not prevail. The principle of the bill is to secure to the honest debtor exemption from imprisonment. Let us take a case and see how the bill will apply to it. A debtor has land in a State where land is not subject to execution; he keeps his property in this manner invested, in order to debar the creditor from his claim; and the plaintiff is then, by this bill, remitted to his original remedy by a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum. Then comes in the 9th section of the bill, providing that the debtor shall be kept in custody till he shall make an assignment of his property for the payment of his debts. Is it his fault that he is the inheritor of lands? No; but it is his fault that he withholds them from his creditors. If the debtor was fraudulent, it was argued on all hands that he should be coerced by imprisonment. Where property was not secured in lands, it was sometimes secured by covering the title; and did not concealment or cover of property present a case of fraud? In all these cases the present laws enable a debtor to keep his property, and take the benefit of the prison bounds. He insisted that it was right that debtors, being able but unwilling to pay their debts, should be coerced by close confinement, whatever may be the laws of the States. The insolvent law of Virginia had, he believed, been recognised by the Circuit Court of the United States, sitting in that State, as that law had been enacted prior to the formation of the Constitution of the United States. The prison bounds in Virginia, therefore, extended to fines issuing on process of the United States' courts, which was not the case in other States.

The only means of enforcement is close confinement. In the cities, particularly where, with money, society and amusements could be found within the bounds, imprisonment is nugatory to the rich. They may, with thousands in possession, live in ease and luxury, in a merely nominal confinement. This bill not only mitigates imprisonment for debt, in cases where the debtor is honest, but it has the further effect to render imprisonment more efficient, in cases where that process is properly used.

Mr. TAZEWEILL said, that the bill purported to mitigate or abolish imprisonment for debt; and also to render such imprisonment infinitely more severe. It made the inheritance and possession of land criminal, and punished it as such; and, perhaps, (if it was so, he should like to have it avowed,) it has the further purpose to force a repeal of the ancient laws of the State which he represented.

The gentleman from Georgia says, that, after judgment is pronounced against the landholder, he ought to sell—this might do in a State where a large amount of money is circulated, and where there is a great demand and ready sale for land; and such was, perhaps, the case in the State of Georgia: if it was so, he was glad of it. But such, he assured the gentleman, was not the case in Virginia, nor in any other merely agricultural country that he ever heard of. But who, he would ask, would purchase the land under such incumbrances as the bill imposed on it? It is to be sold subject to all the claims of all his creditors; and who will buy before the amount of these claims are ascertained and fixed? In the first place, the debtor, under this law, though guilty of no fraud nor folly, is imprisoned, and denied bail; he would relieve himself by the sale of his land, if he could sell it, but that necessarily requires time; and, moreover, nobody will purchase the land, for reason of the lien on it. His anxiety for the preservation of faith in contracts was as great as that of the Senator from Georgia. Fides servanda est, was a maxim which should prevail in all public and private transactions. Personal liberty was valuable; but it would be purchased at too dear a price, if acquired at the expense of good faith. He asked for the ayes and noes on his motion to amend.

Mr. BERRIEN rose to make a single suggestion. If a defendant have property not liable to execution, but bound by the judgment, it is said that he will be subject to close confinement, unless he sells or assigns his property. This difficulty did not in fact exist. If the property was sufficient to meet the debt, it could be sold; for what would hinder purchasers from taking it at a fair price, in which the liens should be included? Whenever he relinquishes his property to his creditors, that moment he is free. If he does not relinquish it, the plaintiff is restored to his original rights.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that we owe it to the country to dispose, without delay, of this subject, which, for six years, has consumed so much of our time. In the first discussion on this subject, it was contended that the rights of the creditor were impaired by the provisions of the bill; it is now said of the same bill and provisions, that they give too great a power to the creditor over the debtor. Now, Sir, how stands it? The provision objected to, is, in my opinion, the most salutary contained in the bill, and both debtors and creditors would probably concur in the opinion. The provision draws a distinction between debt and crime. It subjects no one to imprisonment except those who, having the ability, want the inclination to pay their just debts. The bill provides that no one should be imprisoned on mesne process, except those who are fraudulent. Suspicion of debt is not made punishable, and on what principle of humanity and equity can you punish a man on mere suspicion of any crime? The final process is also objected to. What is that process as it stands? The creditor may confine the debtor till the debt is paid, or till he is discharged by course of law. The bill confines the debtor until he has surrendered, for the benefit of his creditors, all his property: and can you confine him any longer, except as a punishment?

There has been a time when debt was punished; but, in this age, and in this country, no one attempts to justify imprisonment for debt, except as the means of coercion to payment. But what avails coercion, after the property of the debtor is given up? The legitimate object of final process is then attained by the bill. He would also contend and show that this object was more fully attained, than by the existing laws. At present, in every different State, wide limits were secured to persons committed on final process. In the State of New York, the jail bounds extended to the limits of the county. The rich and fraudulent debtor, therefore, goes on the liberties; and lives in ease and independence, wantoning on the property of his creditors. He may, perhaps, for a little while, lay aside his coach, but not always. He was not excluded from society, nor from any luxury which money could procure, and he supposed none of the disgrace of confinement. I say, then, said Mr. V. B., that the present law for imprisonment for debt does not apply to fraudulent debtors. One object of the bill is to extend the rigors of confinement to them, and to relieve the honest debtor. It puts the dishonest debtor within the four walls, and keeps him there till disgrace, mortification, pride, and interest, shall compel him to disgorge his ill-gotten wealth. To every case of fraud this provision applies; to the disbursing officer, who is guilty of a double breach of honesty, as an officer and a man; to the executor, who has betrayed the most sacred trust that can be reposed by man in his fellows; to the attorney, who has been faithless to his profession, and to the confidence of the community. If the Senator from Virginia had confined his amendment to the particular case of landholders in Virginia, he would not have opposed it. But he has pushed it to an extent which would destroy one of the best features of the bill. I have, said Mr. V. B., in my mind's eye, many cases wherein creditors are suffering all the evils and distresses of honesty, while their debtors are luxuriating in wealth, within prison limits. There was no wish to apply the provision to Virginia landholders, and he would vote for their exemption, if, as it had been said, it bears harshly on them. He saw, however, no difficulty likely to arise from their case. They could sell or assign their lands, and thereby become entitled to the benefits of the bill. If, after judgment is obtained, they keep their property invested in lands, with a view to defeat the claims of their creditors, the provision would apply to them.

Mr. HAYNE had not, he said, the slightest wish to prolong the discussion. He rose merely to state a fact. The Senator from New York says that the provision of the 9th section has no other object than to punish frauds. Now, said Mr. H., if I do not show him that he is mistaken as regards this fact, I will abandon the whole question. The provision is, "that in all cases where the body of any person shall be subject to imprisonment by the provisions of this act, such person shall be deprived of the benefit of prison bounds, and kept in close custody until discharged by due course of law." In all cases this clause is to operate. What are the cases? Disbursing officers. Are all these who are indebted to the Government fraudulent? We have ourselves passed laws for the relief of many of them from their debts to the Government. Merchants, who owe revenue debts, are all these fraudulent? Their property is exposed to the winds, waves, and the ravages of fire, which oftentimes disables them from meeting their revenue bonds. Other cases mentioned were, perhaps, properly qualified as fraudulent. But there is another large class of persons to which the clause applies, who are guilty of no fraud; he meant those who keep their property so invested as to prevent its liability to attachment or execution, after judgment is recovered against them. The gentleman from New York, in reciting this clause, used the words "with a view" to prevent, &c. Those words did not appear as a qualification in the bill. If a landholder in Virginia becomes liable to the clause, the gentleman from New York says he may sell his lands. But this cannot always be done immediately, if, indeed, it can be done at all. In Virginia, as well as in other Southern States, lands have been offered for sale over and over again, without finding any bidders. In case the landholder fails to sell, he must go, without bail or mainprize, into close prison.

Mr. VAN BUREN explained, and replied to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, spoke briefly in opposition to the amendment. In trying to please every body, he said, the committee would please nobody. He believed that the bill, in its original form, was more efficient, both for debtors and creditors.

The question was then taken by ayes and noes, on Mr. TAZEWELL's amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chase, Ellis, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Tazewell, Thomas, White, Wiley.—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Eaton, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Marks, Parris, Ridgeley, Rowan, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury.—29.

Mr. COBB rose to offer an amendment, but said he would give no pledge to vote for the bill, even if the amendment was adopted. He moved to strike out from the first section the words, "But if the court shall be of opinion that the said allegations are not well founded, it may make an order, to be entered on record, discharging the said bail or security from his or their suretyship." The object of the amendment was, he stated, to relieve the plaintiff from the delay, expense, and embarrassment, of trying the issue on his allegations. The trial would necessarily be inconclusive; for though the judge might decide one way, the jury, on the main issue, might decide in another way. The bill, he said, provided for several trials in the same cause, some of them on collateral points. The prospect of so much delay and embarrassment would prevent a plaintiff from prosecuting the most plain and just action.

This amendment was opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, KANE, VAN BUREN, and BERRIEN, and supported by Mr. WOODBURY.

The question being taken on the motion, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. NOBLE wished to have time allowed him to examine the bill further, with a view to ascertain its bearing on the Western States. He was under the impression that it would destroy all commercial confidence in the West, and that it was a bold and alarming innovation on the laws, usages, rights, and interests of the Western people. The benefits of the bill were, in his opinion, entirely visionary. It would have no tendency to mitigate the evils resulting from Imprisonment for Debt, but would destroy credit and confidence. He should therefore resist it. He would stand in opposition to it if he stood alone. Notwithstanding the abuse which had been heaped upon him by the public press, on account of his opposition to this bill, he should still exert his efforts to prevent its passage. Regardless of consequences, he should withstand the popular current, and discharge his duty. He moved that the bill be postponed to Tuesday next, and made the order of the day for that day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, did not hear the reason, he said, which the Senator from Indiana gave for the postponement. Those near me inform me that he wishes to be heard in opposition to the bill. I shall with great pleasure listen to the arguments of the gentleman on the subject of the bill. He does not often detain the House in speaking, and, in respect to my willingness to hear him, I would be content to comply with his request for the postponement. I was not aware that the gentleman had been abused in the public prints on account of his opposition to this measure. If he has been misrepresented and abused as he complains, I assure him that I lent no aid to it.

The reasons which the gentleman has given for his hostility to the bill appear to me to be contradictory. In one breath he says that the bill will not abolish imprisonment for debt, and, in the next, he says it will destroy commercial confidence. The gentleman objected, too, to the title of the bill, as differing from its character. I shall be very glad to hear his argument on the title of the bill. While he denies, however, that the bill will abolish imprisonment for debt, he declares that it is destructive of the rights of creditors, although it is not to operate on any existing contracts. He wished to give the gentleman an opportunity to express his views; but, as the time which he proposed is distant, I shall vote against his motion for postponement.

Mr. NOBLE replied, that he was happy to learn that, though the Senator from Kentucky was so sensitive on the subject of his bill, he was willing to listen to arguments in opposition to it. His views were not so contradictory as the gentleman supposed. He believed that the bill would help the Western States, poor as they had always been; and the case of the 1900 debtors in New York, who were not to be relieved by the bill, would show that it did not abolish imprisonment for debt. The Senator from Kentucky thinks, however, that I have asked for too long a time. I ask, said Mr. N., only for four days; whereas the gentleman has taken six years. The Senator from Kentucky hoped the bill would be decided on, because it was his hobby. He, thank God, had no hobbies. He stuck to the people. The people asked no favors from the Government. They had not asked for this bill. The gentleman had often, on this floor, expressed his jealousy of the federal power, and his apprehensions that it would swallow up the States. If he gets this bill through, he will find that the States will swallow up the general Government. He should press his motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he did not understand that the Senator from Indiana intended to offer any amendment. In that case he may suffer the bill to pass to the next stage, and take an opportunity to express his views on its third reading.

Mr. NOBLE replied, that he had an amendment to offer. He would move that on mesne process the debtor should be discharged on making a surrender of his property, and on final process he should be discharged on making a surrender of his property.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said those were the very provisions of the bill as it stood.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to lay the bill on the table. On division, 22 rose in the affirmative, and 22 in the negative. The Chair voted in the negative.

Mr. BERRIEN said, he hoped the Senator from Indiana would allow the bill to go its next stage, as he had declared his opposition to the whole bill, he would not care to amend it: besides, the amendments suggested by him are distinctly the main provisions of the bill. If, however, he insisted on its motion, he should vote with him.

Mr. NOBLE considered, he said, that he could not withdraw his motion. He wished time to examine the bill in all its bearings, and he should propose amendments which would go to simplify it, and rid it of its complex and heavy machinery.

The question on the postponement of the bill to Tuesday was taken, and carried in the affirmative.

The Senate then adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1828.

The Senate spent nearly the whole of this day's sitting in the consideration of Executive business.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1828.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE.

The bill for the relief of the Columbian College, in the District of Columbia, was taken up.

Mr. CHANDLER said that he was uninformed as to the object and character of the bill, and would be glad to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, had hoped the vigilance of the Senator from Maine would supercede the necessity of making any explanation on this subject to him. The bill had, for several sessions, been before the Senate, and had often been fully explained. Its object was to relinquish to the Columbian College twenty-five or twenty-six thousand dollars, with interest, amounting to twenty-eight or thirty thousand dollars, being a debt due from the college to the Government. The relinquishment would relieve the college of great embarrassment, which would otherwise bear it down; involving in its destruction great loss to individuals and a total loss of the debt due to the Government. One portion of the debt was contracted by the Rev. Luther Rice, agent of the college, with the Secretary of the Treasury, for two houses, situated on Greenleaf's Point. Mr. Rice thought he could turn the property to advantage, and he purchased it, giving a lien on it to the Government for security. The Government will therefore get back the property in the same condition in which it was sold. The other part of the debt became due by the assumption, on the part of the college, of a debt which Mr. Thomas L. McKenny owed the Government. Mr. J. was not well acquainted with the particulars of this transaction, but he was informed that the arrangement proved to be very prejudicial to the interests of the college; inasmuch, as, for a trifling consideration, it was made responsible for a large debt. He would now show, how the passage of the bill would materially benefit the institution, and how its rejection would ruin it. The institution had been founded by voluntary contributions. Its early receipts did not realize anticipations, and its expenditures, which were based on the supposition that the college, in its first years, would have been 100 students, considerably exceeded those receipts. The debt which the college owed to individuals, was about one hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the debt to the Government. The creditors had agreed to take $75,000, and to give up their claims, relying upon the honor of the institution to pay the other portion when it was able. To pay this sum of $75,000, the college had $25,000 in stocks, and could raise $50,000 more by individual contributions. This sum had been subscribed, payable on the condition that the claims of the Government and of individuals against the college, should be relinquished. If, however, an attempt be made to enforce the payment of the debt, the exertions of the friends of the college would be paralysed. He hoped that no opposition would be made to the bill. It would prop up a seminary which would be fruitful of advantages to the cause of education, without in any way impairing the rights of the Government, or calling upon it for a single cent: for, if the Government pushed its claims, those claims must be lost, as well as the claims of the private creditors. Congress, too, was the Legislature for the people (he might call them unfortunate people, for they had no political rights,) of the District of Columbia; and if Congress did nothing to promote the literary institutions of the District, it would not do what the State Legislatures had done in each several State. The proposition to relieve and re-establish the institution by this cheap and easy boon, would not, he trusted, find a dissenting voice.

The Congress had been called upon to extend this relief, by the memorial of a number of individuals whose characters were as respectable as the object which they proposed was laudable.

Mr. CHANDLER was, he said, friendly to the college, which he hoped would succeed; but he was opposed to the means by which the bill contemplated to relieve the college. He objected to this bargaining, which, it appeared, had been going on between the Government and the college. He also objected to the principle that the college, as a party to these bargains, could hold the Government to them, if they proved advantageous, and be released from them if they proved disadvantageous. He doubted not that the gentleman from Kentucky was fully informed as to the facts, in which respect the gentleman had an advantage over him; but he must, however, take leave to protest against what he conceived to be the principle of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was, he said, in the dark as to the merits of the transactions alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky; he should, therefore, move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with a view to have the facts reported.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky. They had been reported.

Mr. SMITH would then be glad of an opportunity to read the report. He would like to know something of the bargain for the houses, and how the Government became a dealer in houses; and he would thank the gentleman to inform him where he could find the report.

Mr. EATON said that the committee had not made a detailed report of the case this year; but there was one last year, and there had been one nearly every year for the last three or four years. He did not think it necessary, therefore, to go into the merits of the case fully. The only question was, whether the Government should relieve the college from a disadvantageous bargain. The facts were, briefly, that some years ago the Government had unavailable funds in the Cincinnati Bank. A part of these funds, which, it seems, were ultimately lost to their holders, were disposed of by the Government to an individual for the two houses in question, on Greenleaf's Point. Mr. Rice, the agent of the college, purchased the property, giving the Government a lien on it for security. But the contract proved to be a very unprofitable one to the college. Its benefits enured to the Government; for it got security for its unavailable funds, and still holds a lien on the property. In the second contract, Col. Thomas L. McKenney, an officer of one of the Departments, owed a debt to the Government, which was assumed by the college, and Col. McKenney was to pay the debt to the college in instalments, payable from time to time; but it seemed that the college never received but $1000, though their liability to the Government still remained. The institution was formed by private funds without the aid of Government. It was objected to it, that it was sectarian; but, though sectarian in its origin, it was not so in practice. The subscribers to the relief of the college would not invest their funds while this debt was hanging over it. These subscriptions would be paid only in case the college should be able to obtain a discharge from its creditors. It was left to Congress to determine whether, by relinquishing the debt, to re-establish the college, or, in character of a creditor, to break it down.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved the postponement of the bill to Friday next, with a view to examine the case; which motion prevailed.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1828.

The bill to authorize the purchase of sites, and the erection of Custom Houses at Newport, Rhode Island, and Mobile, Alabama, and for the repair of the Custom House at Newburyport, in Massachusetts, was read a second time.

Mr. WOODBURY stated, that the peculiar situation of the ports in question, made it necessary that this appropriation should be made. As to Newport, it had been shewn that there was no fire proof building in the place that could be hired for a Custom House, and hence it was considered necessary for the United States to build. As to the commerce of Newport, the committee had proof before them that, for several years, the amount of the duties had been $60,000 per annum. As to Mobile, those stores which had hitherto been considered fit for hiring, for this purpose, had been consumed in the late conflagration; and those which remained were not considered suitable. The duties collected at Mobile, had, for several years past, averaged nearly $60,000. Hence a Custom House was more needed there than in many ports where they have been established. All that was required in relation to the Custom House at Newburyport, was to repair the building, which had been obtained from a person indebted to the United States, and for which only a small amount of rent was paid. If required, this building would not only afford accommodations for a Custom House, but the remaining portion might be rented. In some ports the rent of the building was paid by the officers; but in the ports, named in this bill, the rent was paid by the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS made some explanations, as was understood, in relation to the Custom House at Newport: when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill declaring the assent of Congress to the renewal of several acts of the Legislature of Maryland, was read a second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said, in explanation, that, prior to the adoption of the constitution of the United States, the Legislature of Maryland had passed several acts granting certain rights to the port of Baltimore, for the improvement of the harbor. After the adoption of the constitution, those acts had been renewed by Congress, and this is the object of the present bill. The grant was two pence on the ton, which amounted to about $3,000; while $18,000 had been appropriated by the citizens of Baltimore to deepening the channel, for which purpose no assistance had ever been asked of Congress, while other cities, similarly situated, had frequently received its aid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of the surviving officers of the Revolution, was read a second time.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that as this was a bill of considerable importance, both in point of principle, and the amount of property, he should move its postponement until Wednesday week, and that it be made the order for that day; which was agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The special order of the day on the bill to abolish Imprisonment for Debt, then occurred.

Mr. NOBLE, after some remarks in opposition to the details of the bill, proposed the following amendments:

Strike out, in the 5th section, after the word 'rendered,' to the word 'costs,' and insert the following:

"A schedule of his or her whole estate, and take the following oath, which the clerk is hereby empowered to administer: I, A. B., do solemnly swear, or affirm, (as the case may be,) profess and declare, the schedule now delivered and filed, by me subscribed, doth contain, to the best of my knowledge and remembrance, a full, just, true, and perfect account, and discovery of all the estate, goods, and effects, unto me in anywise belonging, and such debts as are unto me owing, or to any person in trust for me, and of all securities and contracts, whereby any money may hereafter become payable, or any benefit or advantage accrue to me, or my use, or any person or persons in trust for me; and that I, or any person or persons in trust for me, have no lands, money, stock, or any other estate, real or personal, in possession, reversion, or remainder, of the value of the debt or debts with which I am charged in execution, or owing to others, and that I have not, directly or indirectly, sold, lessened, or otherwise disposed of, in trust, or concealed, all, or any part of my lands, goods, stock, debts, securities, or estate, whereby to secure the same, to receive or expect any profit or advantage thereof, to defraud or deceive any creditor or creditors to whom I am indebted in anywise however. Which schedule, being so subscribed in the presence of the clerk of the court, shall remain with him, for the information of the creditors of such defendant or defendants."

And at the end of section 9, add sections 10, 11, 12, and 13, as follows:

"Sec. 10. The lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which shall be contained in such schedule for such use, right, and interest, or title, as such defendant shall then have in the same, which he may lawfully part with, reserving to the wife of such defendant her right of dower therein, and also all goods and chattels whatsoever in such schedule contained, shall be vested in the marshal of the district where such lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, and chattels, shall lie or be found; and such marshal is hereby authorized, empowered, and required to sell and convey the same to any person or persons whatsoever, at public sale, for the best price that can be got for the same; and the money arising by such sale, shall be by such marshal paid to the creditor or creditors at whose suit such defendant may have been arrested. And after the delivery of such schedule, and the taking of said oath, it shall be lawful for said clerk, by his order, under the seal of the clerk, to command the marshal or jailor, in whose custody such defendant may be, forthwith to set at liberty such defendant; which order shall be accordingly obeyed, and shall be sufficient to discharge and indemnify such marshal or jailor against all escape, escapes, action, or actions whatsoever which shall or may be brought or prosecuted against him or them, by reason thereof. And if any action shall be commenced against such marshal or other officer, for performing his duty in pursuance of this act, he may plead the general issue and give this act in evidence.

"Sec. 11. When any defendant shall be discharged pursuant to this act, and the schedule subscribed and delivered in by such defendant, shall contain money due to such defendant, or of goods, chattels, and estates, or estates to him belonging, or in the possession of any person or persons for his use, in that case the clerk of the court with whom the schedule is directed to remain shall immediately issue a summons against each of the persons named as debtors in such schedule, and against such others as are therein said to have possession of any goods, chattels, or estate of the property of the defendant, reciting the sum of money he or she is charged with, or the particular goods, chattels, or estate said to be in his or her possession, and requiring him or her to appear at the next court, and declare on oath whether the said money, or any part thereof, be really due to such defendant, or whether such goods, chattels, or estate, or any of them, be really in his or her possession, and are the property of such prisoner; and if the person so summoned shall fail to attend accordingly, or to show good cause for his non-attendance, it shall be lawful for the court to enter judgment against every such person for the moneys, goods, chattels, or estate, in such schedule mentioned, together with costs of suit; and if such person so summoned shall appear and be sworn, judgment shall be entered for so much of the money, goods, chattels, or estate, as he, she, or they, shall acknowledge to be due, or to be of the property of such defendant, and in his, her, or their possession, with costs as aforesaid; which judgment shall be entered in the name of the marshal of the district, who may thereupon proceed to levy execution, as in other cases, and to dispose of the money, goods, chattels, or estate, so recovered, in the same manner as by this act he is directed to dispose of other effects.

"Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, where any such garnishee shall not acknowledge the whole money to be due, or all the goods, chattels, or estate mentioned in the schedule to be of the property of the defendant, and in his possession, the marshal, or such defendant, shall be at liberty to claim the residue by legal process; and the former judgment as to such garnishee shall be no further bar in such process, than for so much money, or such goods, chattels, or estates, as the garnishee is thereby ordered to pay and deliver.

"Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the marshal shall be allowed to retain, out of the effects of such insolvent defendant, before the distribution thereof, and before the payment of the amount of the judgment to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, all reasonable expenses in recovering such money, goods, chattels, and estate as aforesaid, for proceeding against a garnishee, as shall be judged reasonable by the court. And after such expenses are paid as aforesaid, and the judgment as aforesaid to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, all the residue of the proceeds of the insolvent defendant's estate, shall, under the order of the court, be distributed rateably among the creditors of such defendant or defendants."

Mr. EATON proposed the following, as an amendment:

"Sec. 10. And where any male of the age of sixty years and more, or where any female shall, at the passing of this act, be in confinement for debt, or in the bounds upon surety for the prison rules, they shall, on the fourth day of July next, be discharged from the said imprisonment, if confined; or, if under bond to keep within the prison bounds, they and their securities shall be released and discharged from the stipulations and liabilities contained in any bond given for said prison bounds: Provided, if the creditor shall, on or before the first day of July, make oath, before the clerk authorized to issue executions, which shall be retained on the files of his office, that he verily believes the debtor has concealed or disposed of his goods and effects, with a view to defraud his creditors; or has covertly so disposed of them, as that they cannot be reached by ordinary process of law; a notice of which said proceedings shall be served on the debtor, and be traversable in the mode herein before provided for, then, and in that case, the party imprisoned or in the bounds, shall not be discharged, in virtue of any of the provisions of this act, until said traverse shall be acted upon.

"Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the administering of any oath shall become necessary, if the witness or person offering to swear, shall have any scruples of conscience, it shall be lawful for him to affirm; which said affirmation shall have the same effect, and, if false, be subject to the same pains and penalties which appertain to the taking a false oath."

Mr. BERRIEN did not purpose, he said, to discuss the amendments, nor to go fully into the subject of the bill.— But he thought that the manner in which the bill had been discussed, by reference to particular amendments, was not the most favorable mode to promote the success of the bill. He should, at this time, content himself with suggesting some few ideas, which, in his opinion, were decisive in favor of the bill, in opposition to the amendments. The bill provides that after a judgment or decree is obtained by the plaintiff, the defendant may relieve himself by making an assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors, and provides a mode for testing the fairness of the assignment. In lieu of this, the amendments substituted a provision, vesting in the creditor at whose suit the judgment or decree is obtained, an absolute property in the defendant's effects to the amount of his claim, and then divides the remainder ratably among the other creditors. This was the precise subject already discussed on the objection of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] made under a strong impression as to the effect of the bill. The amendments provided no mode of testing the validity and fairness of the assignment, and afforded opportunities for fraud. Try the principle by applying it to a case. Suppose A to be indebted to certain persons: B, who may or may not be a creditor, is suffered, by collusion with A, to obtain a judgment and conveyance of his property. A then takes the oath, and his creditors are cheated. This would not happen under the provisions of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana further proposed to substitute an arbitrary and summary process for the right of trial by jury. The allegations of fraud are to be tried and decided by a judge instead of a jury. It seems to me, said Mr. B. that the amendments will fail of their intended effect, and that they have not been deliberately considered by their movers. What protection does this tribunal, proposed by the amendments, offer to the debtor? If he comes at the summons, he is deprived of the right of trial by jury; if he does not come, he is to be considered as contumacious, and judgment is to be forthwith entered against him. For what purpose was this amendment? To prevent the practical operation of the 5th section of the bill. Among the many arguments relied on, in opposition to the bill, was one which had ever been urged against reform—the dangers of innovation. Mr. B. did not fear innovations. To guard against their danger, it was only necessary to consider existing laws or institutions, in comparison with the improvements proposed. In this case the obligation was imposed upon us to consider the existing law, and the practicability and expediency of the proposed substitute.

The suggestion then, amounted only to this, that we should consider the practical effect of the measures which we adopt, and, as he must be permitted to say, it applied to every exercise of legislative power, as well as that now under consideration. It surely was not intended to be maintained that the fear of change should arrest our march in jurisprudence, and rivet upon us forever the errors of our ancestors. No one was prepared to advocate civil imprisonment in the abstract. The fears of many were alarmed by the suggestion that the evil was affiliated with our laws, and could not be rudely cut off, without deeply wounding those laws themselves, and the bare possibility of such a result, in their opinion, put an end to the argument. He, therefore, begged gentlemen to point out the precise provisions of the bill to which they objected. If they concurred in the principle, they had a right to call in question the practical operation of the bill; but let them not denounce it, in general terms, as an innovation. In Mr. BARRIEN's opinion, an undue importance had been attached to the bill, both in and out of Congress. The effect of this had been to increase the opposition to the measure. The bill was extremely limited in its operation. Few debtors would come within its scope. It was true that, within the sphere of its operation, it takes from the creditor the engine of oppression and extortion, but he would fearlessly assert that it also greatly added to the means of recovering payment of debts, where there was property in the hands of the debtors. He would ask, what is the principle on which the rights of creditors rest? Imprisonment for debt was given to creditors, as a punishment for withholding property, or as a means to enforce the surrender of concealed property. In punishing debt the law confounds it with guilt; as a punishment of fraud then it is ineffectual and improper, for its exercise is capricious and indiscreet. The bill asserts a limit beyond which the power of the creditor shall not go. If imprisonment be used as a means of coercing a fraudulent debtor, the propriety of applying such coercion to any particular case must depend on the proof of the fraud. If fraud be not proved, the principle does not apply, for it is not reasonable to imprison those who have not concealed property. Take then imprisonment for debt as you will, you will find that the rights of creditors go far beyond the principles on which they are based. Does this bill secure creditors from fraud, and withhold from them the means of oppression? If so, it secured to creditors all the rights to which they were entitled, and restored the exercise of them to proper limits. In mesne process, unless you have reason to apprehend that the defendant intends to abscond or withdraw from the jurisdiction of the court, you have neither right nor motive to arrest him. If you charge crime, the party is arrested but not committed. The magistrate is bound to look into circumstances, and if the charge be not supported by proof, the party is entitled to a discharge. Why should the law make debt, and even the suspicion of debt, more criminal than murder? The bill, therefore, required that the plaintiff, before he could hold the defendant to bail, should make oath that the defendant is about to leave the country, &c. and should give reasonable proof of the fact. This was no new principle. It had always been extended to those who were charged with crimes. But it was said that there was a second trial, a second series of oaths, allegations, and issues. Whenever there is doubt, said Mr. BARRIEN, the law gives the benefit of the doubt to the citizen defendant. The citizen was not, by any principle, bound to prove his liberty, but his accusers were bound to prove their right to deprive him of his liberty. Unless, therefore, gentlemen are prepared to deny this principle, they cannot object to the provisions of the first section.

The remaining section, which it was necessary for Mr. B. to animadvert upon at this time, was that which regulated the mode of proceeding after judgment. The existing law authorizes execution either against the body or the property of the defendant. The bill gives a process to the creditor, and another to the debtor; the objects of both of which are to secure the creditor in the possession of the debtor's property, if he has any, which he refuses to surrender; and, if he has none, to secure the debtor in his right to personal liberty. In one process, the creditor may mean that the defendant has concealed property; the creditor appears before the court to contest the allegation; and, according to the result, the debtor is imprisoned or not. In the other process, the debtor may make an assignment of his property, and the creditors may appear to contest the fairness of the assignment; and, according to the result, the debtor is liable to imprisonment or not. In either case, if the debtor proved fraudulent, the plaintiff resorts to his original remedy. But the debtor who is proved to be fraudulent, is deprived of the benefit of prison bounds. The objection to this part of the bill is made upon an assumption that public opinion will interpose itself between the creditor and the debtor, and restrain the former from oppressing the latter. It is conceded that the imprisonment of an innocent debtor is cruel and unnecessary, but it is attempted to exempt the principle conceded from any practical operation, by an assumption that the moral influence of public opinion was so powerful as to prevent such imprisonment. Gentlemen say there is no case in which honest debtors are imprisoned.

SENATE.]

Imprisonment for Debt.—Navy Lieutenants.

Mr. B. was as free as any one to concede that the conventional and moral laws of society were more powerful than statutory enactments; and he would put the issue on the fact, whether public opinion was exercised on this subject to such an extent as to prevent any abuses of the law of imprisonment; and, if it was found that there was, or was likely to be, a single case which required the interposition of the law between the avarice of an unfeeling creditor and the liberty of an honest debtor, he would advocate, to the whole extent of his ability, the passage of this bill.

It was not necessary for him to inquire whether the number of debtors entitled to relief would be greater or less than had been supposed; for if there should exist any occasion for the operation of the bill, it would be with him a sufficient reason for adopting it. But, any one who had long been engaged in the practice of the law, knew that cases of imprisonment, even of the most honest and deserving men, were not rare; and it was known too, to the profession, that persons are often sued in order to force them, by the difficulty of getting the necessary bail, to a compromise, and to the payment of a smaller sum. Writs were also used to force the friends of the debtor to relieve him from his debt, and the danger of a jail. Even when individuals had given up all their property, and paid nearly all their debts, having, perhaps, given a preference to endorsers, or some other creditors, in conformity with established usage, he was thrown into prison with the expectation that some one of his friends or connexions would pay the debt. An appeal was often made to the father by a ca. sa. against the son; and the last resource of the wife was extorted from her by a ca. sa. against her husband. Mr. B. thought that all creditors could not be restrained in the exercise of their rights by moral considerations. They would extend their means of coercion, from the debtor to those of his connexions, to whom he is near and dear. In Mr. B's opinion, the legal and moral operation of the capias ad satisfaciendum ceased with the debtor; and, to extend it further, with a view to operate on others, was inconsistent with the object of the process, and with the rights of humanity.

It was also objected to the provisions of the bill, that their operation would be attended with trouble to the party plaintiff. The "complicated machinery" of the bill had been much dwelt upon as an argument against it. This objection he would meet on the same principles with which he had met the alleged "innovation" of the bill on the established laws.

The machinery of the bill was the provisions adopted to carry into effect the principle of the bill. If any of the provisions were unnecessary or inefficient for this object, let them be pointed out, and altered or expunged. But the industry and vigilance of the opponents of the measure, had failed in detecting such provisions. The objection is not to the machinery but to the consequences resulting from it. Take this proposition: no debtor who has honestly surrendered his property should be imprisoned; every body grants it. But it is said that some debtors have property locked up in choses in action and bank stock, and therefore the ca. sa. must in every case be retained.

Mr. B. denied the consequences. A vast majority of those who come within the provisions of the bill had no bank stock, nor choses in action, or other property concealed or withheld. This argument is refuted by stating it. It asserts a right to use the ca. sa. against all, because there is propriety in using it against a few. In regard to this case, the bill pursued that middle course which had always been found to be the safest course. Truth and propriety were ever found between extremes. The bill gave the usual process to the creditor, on condition that he proved a fraudulent intention on the part of the debtor. This was the head and front of the bill's offending. It goes so far as to secure the creditor in his just rights, and no farther. On these views Mr. B. was content to rest his vindication of the bill from the objection that its machinery was complex.

Another objection to the bill had been urged by the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. HAYNE, that the writ of ne exeat, as used in the State of South Carolina, was abolished by the bill. Here Mr. B. showed that, under the laws of England, and those of the States, so far as he knew, excepting the State of South Carolina, the ne exeat was a prerogative writ, and, out of Chancery, was applied only to two cases, to wit; alimony and accounts in which Chancery and common law were concurrent. With a few more remarks, showing that the bill pursued that middle path, which equally respected the just rights of creditors, and the personal liberty of debtors, Mr. B. was content to submit the bill to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. considered that the amendments offered by the Senators from Tennessee and Indiana, embraced some important principles, and he therefore hoped that time would be given for their consideration. The eloquent and able argument just delivered by the Senator from Georgia, in which many new points had been introduced, also rendered it necessary that the opponents of the bill should be heard before the final vote on it was taken. He would move that the bill be laid on the table till to-morrow, not with a view to delay it a moment after 12 o'clock.

The motion was negatived, ayes 17, noes 18.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. was ready to give his views in opposition to the bill now, if he was compelled to do it. But the lateness of the hour, and the exhausted state of the Senate, induced him to move an adjournment. If the motion was not sustained, he would commence his remarks.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1828.

LIEUTENANTS IN THE NAVY.

The bill to increase the pay of the Lieutenants of the Navy, who have served ten years and upwards, as such, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. HAYNE said, that the bill was best explained by the memorial of the officers; which he read. Mr. H. then remarked on the difference between the pay of the Navy Lieutenants, and that of the officers of corresponding rank in the Army, showing that the pay of the latter was beyond all due proportion larger than that of the former. The Lieutenants of the Navy, many of whom had been 18 or 20 years in the service, and who had families dependent on them for support, received but 751 dollars a year, including rations. The bill proposed to add 211 dollars to their pay, so as to make it altogether, 962 dollars; which left it still $183 40 less than that of a Lieutenant of the Army. About ninety Lieutenants would come within the provisions of the bill, and the additional appropriation required to give them each 211 dollars in addition to the sum at present received by them would be $18,990.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed the bill in a few words.

Mr. BRANCH would like to hear a reason for the discrimination made by the bill in favor of those Lieutenants who had served ten years and upwards. Many Lieutenants, who had served a shorter time as Lieutenants, were equally worthy of the proposed increase of pay. Some Midshipmen, though not less deserving than others, of promotion, had been kept back, and, of course, were not now Lieutenants of ten years' standing, though they well deserved to be. This system of partial legislation was replete with mischief.

Mr. WOODBURY, in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, explained the principles on which the Committee had framed the bill. The memorial prayed an increase of the pay of the Lieutenants, Midshipmen, and Surgeons. The Committee was not willing, however, to go the whole length; and they singled out that class of officers whose length of service, and situation in life, seemed most to require some additional pay. The Lieutenants of the Navy did not receive, and ought not to receive, so much nominal pay as the Army Lieutenants. For the Navy officers have prize money in time of war, which, in the course of 20 years, would give to each officer a considerable sum. The class of Lieutenants which had been selected by the Committee, were advanced in life, and had formed connexions which imposed on them expenses far exceeding the limits of their small salaries. The passed Midshipmen were already allowed an increased salary. The Committee had not, however, gone into the whole subject; if they had, the case of the surgeons would also have been considered.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, referred to the memorial as coming from all the Lieutenants; and he could not see the propriety of giving a preference to one class of them. The Army and Navy officers, he said, were not placed on a footing of equal advantages. The cadet was four years supported and educated at West Point, and then commissioned in the Army. The Midshipmen, on the other hand, were for eight or ten years supported by the pittance of nineteen dollars a month.

Mr. S. without derogating from the merits of those Lieutenants who had served for ten years, insisted, that other officers of the same grade were quite as meritorious. The Midshipmen, he remarked, were also highly deserving. Before they could be passed, they were obliged, in their examination, to give satisfactory evidence of moral excellence, of their seamanship, and of their acquaintance with Naval science. He considered that the proposed distinction would be injurious to the service, and moved to strike out the words "ten years and upwards."

Mr. HARRISON regretted, he said, that any distinction had been made between the lieutenants. The same officers, he thought, should receive the compensation, for they performed similar duties, and underwent similar hardship. The Senator from New Hampshire had said that the lieutenants of ten years' standing were growing grey in the service; so are the midshipmen, said Mr. H. without any but a very distant prospect of promotion.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. CHANDLER] opposes the bill for the reason that he apprehends from it future evil to the service. Mr. H. invited the gentleman to give a more distinct and direct objection to the measure. There was no appropriation of public money for which he voted with more pleasure than for the naval service. He felt anxious that the Navy should be maintained; he feared that, unless promotions were accelerated, or the pay increased, officers of talents would be compelled to abandon it. He would vote for an additional compensation to all the grades referred to in the memorial. Our naval officers bore as high a character for intelligence, gallantry, and urbanity, as those of any country in the world, and they received a smaller compensation. In reply to the remark that fell from the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WOODBURY,] that those midshipmen who passed an examination received additional pay, Mr. H. said that the passed midshipmen formed a distinct and separate grade of the service. He hoped the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland would be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER said that there was no evidence of a scarcity of officers to serve the country at the compensation now allowed. When that was the case, it would be time to think of raising their pay.

Mr. EATON said that, before he should vote for the bill, as it stood, he must hear some reason for the preference given by it to one class of Lieutenants. Under the present and the former practice of the Navy, officers were promoted, not in regular succession, according to their several terms of service, but by favoritism. For a signal proof of this, he called the attention of the Senate to the list of Navy Lieutenants which he held in his hand. The individual who stood first on the list was the example to which he referred. Several Lieutenants had been promoted over his head to be Masters Commandant. Was it fair, then, that those promoted at a certain time should have a preference to those who had been as long in the service, but had not been so highly favored by the Government? The qualifications of the junior Lieutenants were, in most cases, admitted to be equal to those of the Lieutenants who preceded them; and their services were as efficient. But the only question before us, as to any grade or class of officers, was—is it proper to increase their pay? He had no objections to raise the pay, if it was insufficient; and he, for one, was of the opinion that their pay, in reference to their services, and to the pay which we allow for services of other descriptions, was too low. As one illustration of this, he would refer to the fact, that a messenger of the Navy Office, whose chief business, he believed, was to carry letters and papers to and from the Post Office, received seven hundred dollars—within fifty-one dollars of the sum which we at present allow to a lieutenant of the Navy. Was this a fair graduation of salaries? At home, our officers are entitled to live in comfort; and, when abroad, should be enabled to support, in their style of life, the dignity and independence of their station. They were, in foreign ports, frequently employed as negotiators, and in the transaction of other business, which brought them into communication with officers of other navies, and of foreign Governments; and it is well known, that, with their small salaries, they could not, without great inconvenience, reciprocate the civilities which they received. Mr. E. did not wish to encourage extravagance in our naval officers; but, if a messenger was entitled to seven hundred dollars, surely those who sustained the honor of their country, as far as that honor was connected with the naval service, were entitled to an increased compensation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was apprehensive, he said, that the discussion which had commenced would occupy a great portion of the day, to the exclusion of the bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt, which was the unfinished business of yesterday. He was anxious that the bill should be decided on at an early day, in order that, if it passed, it might go to the other House, with a prospect of being acted on there during this session. He, therefore, moved the postponement of the bill under consideration, with a view to take up the bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt.

The motion was withdrawn, at the request of Mr. BERRIEN, who said that he desired to submit the follow resolution.

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to report a bill which shall provide for the increase of the pay of the Lieutenants in the Navy, having regard to the compensation of officers of corresponding rank in the Army: and, also, to provide for the additional compensation of Surgeons in the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, then renewed his motion, and the bill and resolution were postponed until tomorrow.

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill to abolish imprisonment for debt was taken up as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, opposed the bill, in a speech of some length. He could not suffer the bill to pass to the next stage without accompanying it with his objections. His objections were multifarious, and he should only give a few of them. The challenge had been thrown out by the Senator from Georgia to the opponents of the bill, to indicate any redundancy in its "machinery"—an expression originally drawn from the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL.] He would therefore undertake to show what he considered as the complicated and objectionable machinery of the 1st and 4th sections. In the 1st section, Mr. S. then proceeded to point out and comment on nine provisions, embracing all the leading objects of that section; and in the 4th section, he indicated seven or eight provisions, as being, in like manner, exceptionable. If there was not here a superabundance of "machinery," he would like to know where it could be found. If any one could see aught that was desirable in these provisions, it was something invisible to him.

Mr. S. also referred to other parts of the provisions of the 3d and 4th sections, which, he said, were wholly inexplicable, and the meaning of which was inscrutable. The most difficult and abstruse law treatises, even those on Executory Devises and Contingent Remainders, were comprehensible to the studious inquirer; but it would baffle the ingenuity of man to gather from those provisions to which he referred any distinct idea. The 9th section provided, he knew not why, that debtors of the age of seventy and upwards should be exempt from imprisonment. If an old man had property, and withheld it, he was as fit a subject for the ca. sa. as a younger man. Females were also exempted, wherein, he said, the Committee had displayed much gallantry and much wisdom. Here Mr. Smith proceeded to show that females were oftentimes invested with peculiar privileges by our laws. In the State of New Jersey, they had been indulged in the privilege of exercising the elective franchise. The laws of the same State formerly provided for the sale, at public auction, to the highest bidder, of the Bankrupts: and there was no law excluding the ladies from becoming purchasers.

As to minors, there was no law in any State of the Union which subjected them to imprisonment for debt. We are told that the minor is credited with goods, and when he becomes of age, he is sued, and his father is forced to relieve him by the payment of his debts. But this was not the case with prudent fathers; but with those who indulged their sons in cards, billiards, dogs, and horses.

If a father suffered a son to lead an extravagant life, and to run in debt to the poor and industrious mechanics, that father is morally bound to discharge such debts. Is it the tailor, the shoemaker, the baker, or the butcher, who is oppressed and imprisoned by the rich? No; the complaints of the violation of personal liberty come from those who for years have preyed upon the mechanics. We were told that the banks and shavers ought to be restrained from inflicting injuries on their debtors. Mr. S. would not have ventured on the subject of Banks, had it not been introduced into the debate. They had broke the community, and were breaking themselves. He could not discover any provision in the bill which restrained them in their usances and exactions.

It was said that a Southern merchant, who visited New York for purposes of trade, is exposed to the danger of being arrested for a debt which he owes at home, and of being imprisoned for want of bail; which, among strangers, he cannot obtain. Many (I know the fact, said Mr. S.) go to New York for the very purpose of being thus arrested, and of procuring a discharge under the insolvent laws of that State. Debtors fly from the mild laws of South Carolina to the milder laws of New York. No State was more indulgent to debtors than the State of New York. After ten days, they could get the benefit of the act. The prison bounds of New York extend to the limits of the several counties. Surely there was no violation of personal liberty there.

Mr. S. here noticed the argument that the United States'

Courts had now too much power over personal liberty. Was this bill to check the growing powers of those Courts? He would not take from the courts any constitutional powers, and he would add nothing to those powers.

Mr. S. was persuaded that the Senator [Mr. JOHNSON] who introduced this bill, did it from the purest motives. But such was his anxiety to get the bill through, that he had consented to a number of amendments, which, with the original provisions, made the bill a perfect "round robin." The debtor was first held to bail, then relieved; held to bail again, and again relieved; and then comes another, a third trial. To complete the remedy which the bill afforded to the defendant against the plaintiff, it wanted only a provision, that if, on the third trial, the plaintiff was cast, he should be himself imprisoned, without bail or mainprize. Mr. S. then adverted to the case, so often referred to in the debate, of the 1,900 debtors in the New York jails. Some of these persons had been committed, it was said, for the debt of twenty-five cents. These were probably drunken and riotous persons, who had been committed for fines, by the lowest corporate authorities. He would not believe that the liberal and enlightened policy of the State of New York would suffer a citizen, an honest and worthy citizen, to be imprisoned for the sum of twenty-five cents. So far, indeed, had the laws for the collection of debts been relaxed in that State, that the Legislature had been compelled to interfere to prevent the mischiefs resulting from that relaxation. Mr. S. was not disposed, after so much had been said on this subject, longer to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing it; and he briefly adverted to the criminal character of fraudulent debtors; to the mildness and sufficiency of the State insolvent laws, and to the fact that within his knowledge, no fair-dealing debtor had ever been oppressed. In conclusion, Mr. SMITH said that fancies and fashions sometimes took a run among the people, and prevailed for a season over reason and good sense. They were often pregnant with mischief to society, and were always difficult to check. The French Revolution had its origin in laudable motives; but the tide rolled on, gathering strength as it rolled, 'till it had nearly overwhelmed Europe, and brought it under the dominion of a single man. This bill originated in philanthropic and popular motives; and, impelled by the sanction of this House, it may carry its principles to an extent, which will prove destructive of the very foundations of Commerce and Society.

Mr. ROWAN rose, and spoke at considerable length, in reply to Mr. SMITH, and in favor of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of S. C. rejoined at some length.

Mr. NOBLE also made some remarks in support of the amendments offered by him yesterday.

The question on the amendment offered by Mr. NOBLE was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Cobb, Hendricks, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith of S. C. and Willey—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson of Ky. Johnston of Lou. Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Macon, Marks, Pariss, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Sanford, Silsbee, Smith of Md. Thomas, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—34.

The question then recurring on engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The bill to abolish Imprisonment for Debt came up on its third reading, and, on the question of the passage of the bill—

Mr. BELL said he was opposed to the passage of this bill and would present to the Senate, very briefly, the reasons which would induce him to vote against it. It was always with reluctance that he consented to change a system of legal provisions which had been a long time in operation, because experience and observation had taught him that the advantages expected from such changes were seldom attained, and that unforeseen evils and inconveniences invariably resulted from them. He would therefore withhold his assent from such innovations, unless where he could clearly see that great advantages would be attained, or serious evils be obviated by them. He had given considerable attention to this subject, but had been unable to discover any such reasons to justify the innovation which this bill, should it become a law, would make in the existing laws of the States.

He was aware that persons whose sensibilities are easily excited by real or fictitious tales of distress, imagine they see great oppression and injustice in the operation of the existing laws authorizing imprisonment for debt. But no practical evil had resulted from them, as now modified in the several States, so far as they had come under his observation. If cases of hardship and oppression have occasionally occurred in their operation in some of the States, this bill will afford no remedy, because it cannot control the operation of State laws or State courts. It is not even pretended that a single instance of oppression has occurred under these laws, in suits brought in the Courts of the United States. And in these Courts alone can your laws have an operation. The State which he in part represented, had so modified its laws on this subject, that debtors cannot be imprisoned, either on mesne or final process, for small debts. But its Legislature had thought it a wise and correct policy to permit imprisonment for debt in other cases, as a means of coercing payment from fraudulent debtors, and it often produces this effect. Under these circumstances, he could not give his consent to impose upon the citizens of that State, a law which he believed their own State Legislature would not enact or approve. He would leave legislation on this, and on all other merely municipal concerns, to the State Legislatures; to whom, he thought, they properly belonged, and with whom they may be most safely trusted. The State Legislatures understand the situation, circumstances, and wants of their own citizens, and what municipal regulations will most conduce to their interests, better, far better, than we do. He did not wish to see two different systems of law in relation to the rights and liabilities of debtors and creditors in operation in different Courts within the same State. It cannot fail to produce great confusion and great injustice.

This bill has a very fascinating and popular title; but whatever title may be affixed to it, it is, in reality, in all its important and operative provisions, an insolvent law, and, as such, contains several very objectionable provisions. The proceedings under it cannot fail to be very dilatory and very expensive, two of the worst qualities that can belong to a system for the administration of justice.

By the provisions of the bill, three several trials in the same suit may be had before it is in the power of the plaintiff to obtain the benefit of the final process by which he is to recover his debt. The defendant, when arrested on mesne process, may demand and obtain a trial on the question, whether he is a debtor, or whether he intends to leave the State. When this question is decided, he may again contest the justice of the plaintiff's claim, and have a second trial in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding. If judgment is rendered against him, and his property is supposed to be secreted, or so invested that it cannot be levied upon, the plaintiff, by alleging these facts, may require a third trial, and a judicial decision of these questions. After these repeated trials, and this protracted and expensive litigation, the defendant, by an assignment of his property to the Clerk of the Court, for the benefit of his creditors, may liberate himself from imprisonment.

When the plaintiff has pursued the fraudulent debtor through all his windings, and by a most tedious and expensive process has compelled him to make an assignment of his property for the benefit of all his creditors, the plainest principles of common justice require that the plaintiff should first have his costs repaid him out of that common fund which his unaided exertions have secured. But such is not the provision of this bill. The property assigned is to be ratably distributed among all the creditors, "saving to any creditor any lien which he may have acquired, or any priority to which he may by law be entitled."

The bill does indeed secure to the prosecuting creditor all his costs in those States where judgments operate as liens on the defendant's property, and it seems to have been framed on the supposition that such was the law in all the States.

This is an incorrect opinion. Judgments do not operate as liens, either on the real or personal estate of the judgment debtor in any of the New England States.

Shall we pass a law which refuses to the prosecuting creditor in those States the same measure of justice which it affords to him in all the other States? Can you suppose that they will approve a law thus unequal in its operation, and partial and unjust as it respects them. The bill requires them to change their entire system of laws, in relation to the effect and operation of judgments, before they can obtain the same measure of justice which it affords to the other States. This feature of the bill admits neither of denial nor justification.

The bill provides that the proceeds of the defendant's property assigned to the Clerk of the Court, shall be ratably distributed among the creditors, under such rules for collecting the same, and for calling in the creditors, as the Court shall prescribe. This is a vast and most objectionable transfer of legislative power to the Judges of the Courts of the United States.

These assignments will often consist of debts due to the insolvent from citizens of his own State, and there will be outstanding claims against him in the same State. It will be necessary to resort to some judicial tribunal for the adjustment of both; but we look in vain to this bill to ascertain what tribunal it shall be.

We transfer to the Judge the legislative power of prescribing rules for collecting the debts, calling in the creditors, and, I suppose, ascertaining by adjudication the amount of their respective claims.

How is this to be done? Is a commissioner with judicial powers to be appointed to collect the debts and liquidate the claims? or, is this to be done by the District Courts, or by the State Courts? The bill gives us no information on the subject. The legislative power vested in the District Judge, seems to be broad enough to authorize him to prescribe any of these tribunals to perform these duties.

Have we the constitutional power to authorize a District Judge, or any Judge of a Federal Court, to decide in a civil action between citizens of the same State? We certainly have no such power, unless in the single case where the parties claim lands under grants from different States. This case is an exception to the general rule, founded on very wise and obvious reasons. It was never the intention of the Constitution to permit the Federal Judiciary to adjudicate between the citizens of the same State. This power of prescribing rules for collecting the debts of the insolvent, calling in his creditors, adjudicating upon their claims, and distributing the property among the creditors, is a power of no ordinary magnitude; it may involve not only the rights and property, but even the liberty of the citizen.

He could not consent to transfer a legislative power of this magnitude to any Judge.

If we look beyond the title of this bill, we see that in all its important provisions it is an insolvent law.

Has the Constitution invested Congress with the power to enact a law of this character? He believed it has not. No article of the Constitution has been pointed out from which this power can be derived, nor does it contain any such article.

It is true, that the Constitution gives to Congress the power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. This is the only clause of the Constitution which, upon any rational construction, invests Congress with the power of constituting a tribunal to decide between citizens of the same State. And if we have power to pass this bill, it is because it is, within the meaning of the Constitution, a bankrupt law.

It will hardly be contended, that, by passing this bill, we have established a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. If that is not its legitimate character, it will be passed without any constitutional authority.

There are several other objections to the provisions of this bill, but he would not take up the time of the Senate by stating them. Those which he had already stated presented, to his mind, insuperable objections to the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he was a member of the committee which reported the bill, and he greatly regretted his absence during the discussion of it. Being, however, in favor of the bill, he begged leave briefly to offer his views in regard to it, and to throw out some suggestions in answer to the arguments just advanced by the Senator from New Hampshire. Mr. C. denied that the bill was an innovation: it was in accordance with the improvements of jurisprudence which had of late years been made in every State of the Union: it was in unison with the spirit of the age. In the State of which the honorable member who last spoke was a representative, imprisonment for debt had been abolished in all cases except those where property was fraudulently withheld. This was the very substance and object of the bill before us. But the gentleman objects to the delays incident to the provisions of the bill. He would be happy to hear and to act upon the suggestion of any feasible mode of lessening the delay, or of rendering the results more certain. That the system was perfect, he did not believe; nor was perfection to be attained by the first experiment. In law, as well as in other departments of science, a system could be formed only by long and careful observation and experiment. There might be imperfections in the details of this law, but if its principle was good, those details would soon be corrected. Mr. C. was not surprised that a wide difference of views should exist in this body as to any measure of a legal character: for the systems of jurisprudence prevailing in the different States were widely different. It was not to be expected, therefore, that gentlemen would at once relinquish their prejudices, and concentrate their views. He, like the Senator from New Hampshire, had been brought up a lawyer, and was attached to the particular legal usages to which he had been accustomed. A compromise of conflicting opinions was necessary in regard to the details of this bill; and compromise, he remarked, was the basis of our Constitution and of all our legislation. The Senator from New Hampshire objected to the introduction into his State of a new system of laws. Will this consequence result from the bill? That discrepancy exists already to a greater degree than it will when this bill has become a law. At a period when legal science was less improved than at present, it was difficult to make the State laws correspond with each other, or to conform the laws of the United States with them. In all the States, efforts, some of them successful, had been made to secure the personal liberty of debtors; and the sanction of the United States was now proposed to be given to those efforts. Constitutional difficulties had been urged; but Congress was specifically vested with power to regulate the process of the Federal Courts. In cases where there were a number of claimants to a fund placed for distribution, according to the provisions of the bill, in the hands of the Federal officers, there were other Courts in which these claims could be prosecuted by the several claimants, besides the United States' Courts. The bill gave to the United States' Courts the charge of the distribution of the property after it had been adjudged to the creditors.

Mr. C. saw, therefore, none of the difficulties which formed objections to the bill with other gentlemen. Mr. C. was unwilling, and he thought it improper, that the creditor should be the sole judge of the measure of coercion which should be applied to the debtor. He was, himself, in favor of taking this power entirely from the creditor, and of vesting it in other and more impartial hands. He believed that the bill was called for by public opinion, by the improvements of the age, and by every freeman whose liberty was jeopardized by debt.

Mr. BERRIEN regretted, he said, but he did not complain, that the Senator from New Hampshire had postponed his objections to the bill to a time when the Senate was exhausted by constant and long continued debate on the subject. The Senators opposed to the bill had, in its earlier stages, been pressed to bring forward their objections to it. He hoped he would be excused in making a very brief reply to the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire. The first objection of that gentleman was, that the bill would introduce a system into the several States discordant with the jurisprudence of those States. He would ask the gentleman to reconsider this argument, and say whether the evils which he predicted would result from the bill. The State tribunals are regulated by the State laws; and it belongs to the Legislature of the Union to establish tribunals for carrying into effect the laws of the Union. The gentleman's complaint is then directed to the system under which we live. The discordancy to which he objects exists in the Constitution of the country. The process of the United States' Courts was, by the act of 1789, made to conform to the process of the several States, as it at that time existed. But the process of the United States' Courts no longer conforms to that of those States which have altered their laws in this respect; and, of course, the law of '89 does not extend to those States which have since been admitted into the Union. A discrepancy must, therefore, necessarily exist between the process of the Courts of the United States and of the several States.

To the objection urged against the title of the bill, it was not necessary for him to reply: for the title formed no essential part of the bill, and did not, in any way, control its provisions. If it was considered inapt, he would consent to its modification. It was said that the bill was an insolvent system. So it was, to a certain extent: but the whole force of the bill was not spent upon that object. He would agree that the bill was an act to relieve from imprisonment, or the danger of imprisonment, those debtors who made a full and fair surrender of their property, and to render more efficient the existing laws for the coercion of fraudulent debtors. It was also objected by the gentleman from New Hampshire, that the provisions of the bill delayed the administration of justice.

Imprisonment for Debt.—Judicial Process.

[SENATE.]

He was not about to travel again through the arguments which he formerly urged against this objection. But he would take occasion to remind gentlemen, that the delays of justice between citizen and citizen was a part of the price which we paid for justice. The Senator from New Hampshire assumes that the framers of the bill took it for granted that judgments were, in every State, a lien on the property, real and personal, of the debtor. The assumption was gratuitous. The laws of the States remained unaffected by the provisions of the bill. The gentleman was alarmed by the vast delegation of power to the District Courts—a power to decide between the claims of citizens of the same State to the property assigned by the debtor. But the bill, he averred, gave no such power. It provides only for the distribution of the property assigned, after the claims of that property had been adjusted and decided by the proper tribunals. The laws existing provided for this case. If the cause of action came within the laws of the United States, the action would be brought in the United States' Courts; if not, it would be brought in the State Courts. The bill was said to be an insolvent law; and he had already admitted that, to a certain extent, it was. The Senator from New Hampshire doubted whether it was competent to the United States to enact an insolvent law. The constitutional power, he thought, could not be doubted. Judicial power is granted by the Constitution—and is Congress to be restricted in the method of exercising that power, by such scruples? He wished the bill might be charged with the faults that really belonged to it, and not with those for which it was in no way responsible. Insolvency, said Mr. B. is a part of bankruptcy, and if we have a right to regulate the greater subject, we have a right to regulate the less. The Supreme Court had decided that we had this right. Is this bill, concluded Mr. B., which has such large claims on the Government, and from the moral effect of which so much is hoped, to be sacrificed to a doubt, whether we have a power which was never denied to us before?

Mr. WOODBURY said, he asked the indulgence of the Senate a few minutes in reply to the remarks of his colleague, concerning the operation of this bill upon New Hampshire. He had not heretofore entered into the debate upon its merits, and certainly, at this late stage, should not in that way trespass. Was the passage of the bill an unusual or unwarranted stretch of power in the General Government? Had New Hampshire, or any other State, a right to complain that the Legislature, for the confederacy, when the Constitution was silent, should prescribe particular forms of process for its own Courts, and alter them as experience and reflection should dictate? It must be done from necessity. It had been done ever since the organization of the Government; and during the last quarter of a century an act of Congress had existed, without complaint, which allowed private debtors committed under process from the Courts of the United States, to be discharged from imprisonment after a surrender of their property. New Hampshire had not been aggrieved by the exercise of this power, though in substance operating as an insolvent system: because she had in substance, under a form in some respects milder, a similar system of insolvency; or, in other words, a similar system of abolishing imprisonment for debt. Mr. W. said, if he believed the present bill would prostrate the rights or trench deeply on the accustomed privileges of her people, he would oppose its passage as cheerfully as he now supported it. But, in truth, the great principle of the bill is now the great principle in the system of his own State. The difference existed mainly in details; and though he disliked some of the details of the present measure, that great principle was too laudable and humane a one to be sacrificed for form. It was a principle in accordance with the spirit of the age and the genial influence of Christianity. What is the difference? In New Hampshire no debtor can be imprisoned, either on meane or final process, unless the demand exceed $13 33. That goes still further than the present bill to abolish imprisonment for debt. In all cases over that sum, debtors can be held to bail on meane process. So they may by this bill. The only difference is, that an oath and other formalities are required here, and not there. But there, in practice, not one debtor in five hundred is committed to prison on meane process. How stands the difference on final process? In New Hampshire, every debtor can be discharged from prison in fifteen days, on a full and fair surrender of his property. By this bill he can be discharged on such a surrender and notice before final process issues. But there in practice the surrender is usually made before the capias is served; and then the debtor is not committed; but whenever he is in fact committed, the detention continues only fifteen days, and has not, for many years, exceeded thirty days, unless the debtor wants further time to adjust his concerns previous to his disclosure. The principle, then, both there and here, is, that the debtor shall not be imprisoned after an honest surrender of his estate; while there, as well as here, if the disclosure be proved dishonest and fraudulent, the debtor must remain in prison. In both cases, the fair and upright debtor is not to be treated as a felon, while the deceiver and knave are to be kept confined till they disgorge their ill-gotten gains. In this last provision, the present bill is an improvement on our system, as the confinement is restricted, as it should be, in cases of fraud, to the prison walls, instead of the limits of the jail yard. The other slight differences between the two systems, relate entirely to detail. It is not pretended, by my colleague or any body else, that either of them is, in form or substance, a bankrupt system. But the system of New Hampshire is, in essence, an insolvent system, as much as this bill; and this is no more unconstitutional in regard to debtors committed under process from the United States' Courts, than that is as to debtors committed under State process. Both Governments have an undoubted right to regulate their own process, and that is the only power exercised by the present bill. The lien of the creditor does not, it is true, exist there as to either personal or real estate, till a seizure or levy; but the operation of this bill neither injures nor benefits the people of New Hampshire in that particular—they are left as before. Indeed, the whole operation of the bill there, if it differed materially from the principle of her present system, would be very limited, as it affects only process from the United States' Courts, and those are so few, that not five persons in a year, in the whole State, would probably avail themselves of its provisions.

The Yeas and Nays being called for by Mr. VAN BUREN, on the passage of the bill, it passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Eaton, Foot, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson, of Ky. Johnson of Lou. Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Marks, Parris, Ridgely, Sanford, Silsbee, Smith of Md. Van Buren, Williams, Woodbury—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Ellis, Knight, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith of S. C. White, Willey—16.

So the bill passed.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

The bill to regulate process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789, was read a second time.

Mr. WHITE said, he thought the bill susceptible of improvement. I move you, sir, (said he) that it be amended by striking out the word "now," in the ninth line, and inserting in its place, the words "or may be." By this alteration the Federal process, in each of the States admitted into the Union since September, 1789, will, as to its kind, the matter upon which it is to operate, and the manner of its execution, conform to the process used in the courts of these States respectively, not at the time of the passage of this bill, alone, but in future. As the bill now stands, we adopt for the Courts of the United States the process of these new States; and the rule of process thus settled, will remain permanent, notwithstanding any changes which may be made in the process of the State tribunals. The consequence will be, that in a short time, in some, if not in all of these States, we will have one rule for Federal process, and another for State process, in the same State. This, in my judgment, ought not to be. Whatever is a safe and convenient process, to bring a defendant into a State court to answer to a demand set up against him by a citizen of the same State, and whatever process may be used in the State Courts to compel satisfaction of the judgment recovered in such case, will probably be the most safe and convenient process to be used in the Federal courts sitting in the same State. This was my impression at the commencement of the session, and the arguments used on the bill "to abolish imprisonment for Debt," and especially the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, not now in his seat, on the motion made by him to recommit that bill, confirmed this impression. I voted against the passage of that bill, not because I am opposed to abolishing Imprisonment for Debt; but because I then believed this was the bill, by virtue of which that object would be attained, as far as justice to the creditor would authorize. Uniformity in the process to be used in the Federal Courts in the new States, is not intended by the bill, as it now stands. If it passes in its present shape, we will have at once nine different rules, disagreeing each, perhaps, with all the others; but in each the Federal rule and the State rule will be the same in the same State. This will be, in my opinion, as it should be, at the commencement; but as soon as any one of these States by its legislation changes its rule of process, without my amendment, we will have two rules essentially different, in the same State: the one for the State, and the other for the Federal Courts. This, in my opinion, ought never to be. Therefore I have proposed the alteration. With it, there will always be harmony between the State and Federal process, in the same State; and whether they agree or not, with the process used in any other State, is of no importance whatever. The Legislatures of the respective States will always be more competent to decide what is the most suitable process to be used within their limits, than the Congress of the United States. I put it to every gentleman to say, whether a man living in Maine would be as competent to decide what species of execution ought to be used in Tennessee or in Louisiana, as the same man would be, if he had resided a considerable time in those States, and was legislating for the sake of doing justice between debtor and creditor there? He certainly would not be. That which would be a very suitable process in one of those States, when their habits, their modes of dealing, and the species of property which they owned, were duly considered, might be, and often would certainly be, an inappropriate and ruinous process of execution in the others, when these things were materially different. If a non resident citizen, or an alien, has always, in any State, exactly the same measure of justice meted to him in the Federal Courts, which a citizen of the State would be able to obtain against a citizen of his own State, he obtains every thing which, reasonably, he can desire.

In new States, where the circumstances of the people are continually changing, it will invariably happen that execution laws will be changing likewise; and that which is a good execution law now, in a State, may in a short time be found very unjust, as it relates to debtor and creditor, and require an amendment from the Legislature. Whenever this change is effecting by State legislature, for the benefit of suitors in the State courts, suitors in the Federal court, held in that State, ought to have the benefit of it.

Harmony between the Federal and State processes, it appears to me, is essential to the happiness of the people. A citizen of one State has a demand against a citizen of another State, for a sum of money, and sues for it in the Federal court, where he recovers a judgment. This debtor has a demand against one of his neighbors for the same, or for a larger sum, for which he sues, as he must do, in his State court, and recovers a judgment. Suppose the legislature of that State to have abolished imprisonment for debt, some time after the passage of the bill now before you, would it not be thought exceeding hard, that the one might be imprisoned by federal process to enforce payment, while the man thus imprisoned could not use the like process to procure a fund sufficient for his release? Adopt my amendment, and we will continue the harmony with which we commence without any farther legislation by Congress. Reject it, and in a short time we must legislate again, or discord will be produced, and with it heart-burnings and discontent.

A majority of us appear desirous to abolish imprisonment for debt, so far as safety to creditors will permit. Adopt my amendment, and you will, without farther trouble, continue this work of abolition to every extent it ought to be carried. The Legislature of each State must necessarily better know than we can, whether the character of the citizens, and the kinds of property they own, are such as will enable them, with justice to creditors, to blot from their legal codes the capias ad satisfaciendum. If they deny it in the State Court, it will be denied in the Federal Court likewise, and thus Imprisonment for Debt will be abolished in some States, where it can safely be done. In other States, where from the character of the citizens, and the kinds of property they own, the Legislature believe the ca. sa. cannot be discontinued without doing injustice to creditors, there, as it must be continued as to the State tribunals, so let it be as to the Federal.

I do not see that there is any reasonable ground for apprehension upon my plan. It can but rarely happen that the Legislature of any State will ever make laws on the subject of process to be used in the State Courts, which the Congress would not approve of, as a rule for the process of the Federal Court in the same State. We have, in the first place, the integrity of character of the members of those bodies. In the next place, they cannot disregard the interest of the creditor or the debtor who are suitors in their Courts; and we all know that much the largest proportion of debts sued for, of necessity, under our systems must be sued for in the State tribunals. Again: if, at any time, an unconstitutional law should inadvertently be passed there is the judiciary to check the mischief; and, in addition, Congress will always have the power to legislate upon this subject, and never will fail to exercise it, if any excess in State legislation should make it necessary.

I am unwilling, Mr. President, to weary the Senate, or fatigue myself, by longer addressing you at this time. The debates upon the other bill have, as I think, fully explained this subject, and I now claim the benefit of them in favor of my amendment.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that it was with reluctance that he differed with his friend from Tennessee, especially on a subject on which the experience of that gentleman was so much greater than his own, and still more in relation to a matter in which the new States had not received their share of benefit. It was proposed by this bill to place the States admitted into the Union, since the year 1789, upon a better footing than the others. It was his opinion that it could not be done in justice; neither was it possible to effect a system such as the gentleman contemplated. On a former occasion he had ob-timed the opinions of gentlemen from all the States in the Union, and there were no two that agreed; which would serve to show the difficulty, if not impossibility of any such plan. Congress could not pass any such law without interfering in some way. Therefore, the law was formed so as to take a middle course. It was impossible to give up all the power of the Federal Courts without involving the country in confusion. That power ought to be limited to the utmost; but it ought to exist. This act, if passed, would enjoin upon the United States to conform to the laws of the States, not only as they were, but as they might prove to be. The object of the law of '89 was to preserve the rights of persons coming into court—so far that act went. But it could not be expedient to submit that the laws, which each State might pass from time to time, should govern the Federal Courts. If Congress gave up the law of the United States to the different States, they ought to know what system they agree to, and not, by doing so, subject the jurisprudence of the country to everlasting change and uncertainty. He would suppose a case. A suit might be pending between an individual and the United States, and during the pendency of the cause the State Legislature might pass an act interfering with its decision, and calculated to stop proceedings until the next Session of Congress. Such interferences would overturn the rights of the Federal Courts. He was the last person who would give to the Federal Judiciary rights to which it was not entitled. He was, on the contrary, as much convinced as any man, that more danger to the powers of the States had been exhibited in the "signs of the times," during the last six years, than ever before. But he would sustain nothing that would go to overturn the legal and legitimate power of the Government, which ought to be guarded and preserved.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn until Monday.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up, and the bill to regulate process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789, being before the Senate, the question recurred on an amendment offered by Mr. WHITE, to strike out the word "now," and insert the words "may be."

Mr. VAN BUREN observed that, on Friday the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] happened to be on the floor, explaining his views on this amendment, when he [Mr. V. B.] entered the Senate—and he supposed, from the tenor of that gentleman's observation, that his amendment was, in its scope, co-extensive with the argument on the bill to abolish imprisonment for Debt, to which he alluded. I was, said Mr. V. B. in error; and the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, I now learn, does not attempt to take away the supervision of the Supreme Court of the United States but to adopt the laws of the several States in the Circuit Courts, under the supervision, as formerly, of the Supreme Court. The amendment would, perhaps, secure some provisions in favor of those States which they could not otherwise attain; and he had no intention to oppose the bill or the amendment, under their present aspect.

Mr. WHITE said that it was so far from his wish or design to press his bill upon the Senate, that he should not now urge it if the members had scruples as to its expediency. Though he was anxious for the passage of this bill, he did not wish to urge it against the judgment of any member, without giving ample opportunity for investigating its merits. He thought this measure of great importance to the New States, whose situation was peculiar, and had been desirous of being clearly understood upon it. But he was so unfortunate as to have been entirely misapprehended in the few remarks he had made on Friday. If any account was ever given of the few observations with which he thought it his duty to trouble the Senate, he hoped he might be represented fairly, and that they might be given to the public in the same manner as they were given to the Senate. He imputed, in saying this, no blame to any one. But such was the situation of the Reporters, under the present arrangement, that he believed it was not possible for them to comprehend the remarks of the members. He had been made, in a report in a newspaper printed in this city, to offer an amendment to regulate process in the States hereafter to be admitted into the Union. He might have been misunderstood by others, as he had been by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN] also. It was hardly necessary for him now to explain that the interpretation was an erroneous one.

Mr. BERRIEN remarked, that he hoped no gentleman felt desirous of pressing this bill, as it was highly to be wished that its provisions should be fully examined before it passed. It would be improper and impolitic to decide hastily upon a question of importance equal to that of this measure. Its design seemed to be to draw a broad line of distinction between the States admitted into the Union previous to the year 1789, and those admitted since that period. The result would be, that the new States would have the power to regulate process by Legislation, from time to time, subject to the supervision of the Supreme Court of the United States, while the old States would enjoy no such privilege. Why not, if this is a salutary provision, equalise, in this respect, the condition of the different portions of the country? In the old States no right existed to regulate process from time to time, by legislation. At first view, without having given the subject much consideration, it appeared to him an unequal and partial measure. He, therefore, wished an opportunity might be had to examine the subject farther than he, as yet, had enjoyed an opportunity to do. And to this end he would move to postpone it to some certain day, or to lay it on the table.

Mr. WHITE remarked, as nearly as our Reporter could hear, that he had no objection to the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia, and would accede to his proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. said, that he considered it his duty to oppose the bill, unless it provided to correct the usurpations which had been exercised by Circuit and District Judges in Kentucky—in fixing upon the State, execution laws, under the title of rules of Court. He would vote for the bill, if he understood that it provided to regulate the process of the United States' Courts by the laws of the States. He had thought, that, if Congress had confidence in the States, and believed that they could be trusted, the Federal Courts might be guided by the laws of the several States. There never did exist, since the creation of the world, a greater system of usurpation than that which had been practised in Kentucky, by the assumption of Judges, to pass execution laws. [He here alluded to the laws of Draco and Solon; but our reporter could not catch the manner in which they were introduced.] He cared not whether the laws adopted by the Judges were good or not. That was not the question. Whether good or bad, if forced upon the people in a tyrannical or unconstitutional manner, he should always raise his voice—he was going to say he should raise something else; but he would not—against them, in duty to himself and his constituents.

Mr. KANE said, that he should regret the postponement of this bill for a single day, and he hoped the gentleman from Georgia would not press a postponement. It was true, if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee prevailed, it would establish different regulations in the old and the new States. But this did not present an objection to the bill, of a serious nature; for, that distinction might easily be removed, by a modification of the motion, so as to make the operation of the principle general throughout the whole Union. He felt disposed to concur in the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and would cheerfully offer a motion to modify it, according to his suggestion. He did not believe that the framers of the law of 1789 had taken up the laws of the different States, then forming the Union, and entered into an examination of them, to aid in framing that act. Such a labor was not to have been expected. Had they examined those laws, and decided that they were all good and proper, they would have decided on the most palpable inconsistencies. Was it not more rational to conclude, that the national Legislature of that day had more confidence in the integrity of the States, than was felt by Congress at the present time? And if they did feel that confidence in the States, why should not the laws of the States, so far as it would be expedient, be now adopted? The present law, he thought, went far enough: it gave the Circuit Courts power to alter and amend the laws of process, passed by the State Legislatures; and to the Supreme Court of the United States, power to supervise and overrule them. It appeared to him sound policy that the Federal Courts, as far as they should agree with their rules, should be governed by the laws of the States. Wherever those laws were in hostility to their rules, it was in the power of the Courts to amend and correct them. If the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee prevailed, he would engage to introduce an amendment to make the application of the principle general to all the States. It was necessary that, in some shape or other, this bill should pass, more especially for the new States, which were, by the operation of adverse circumstances, deprived altogether of Circuit Courts.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that, if possible, this bill ought now to be decided upon. It was a measure which had long occupied Congress, this being the second or third session in which it had been discussed. The bill passed the Senate in its present form, two years since. The course now proposed was a middle one, and he saw no objection to it. It did not go the length desired by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON.] It did, certainly, as was stated from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] establish two different rules. This objection, however, would be removed, if an amendment could be introduced to make its operation equal in all the States. As to the State which he in part represented, he thought it would be acceptable, and considered as in no way interfering with the established Judiciary. He hoped that it would now be decided, in order to save time, and to satisfy those who were desirous of the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, spoke at some length, expressing a belief that it was never the intention of Congress that a member of a Court should have the power to pass process acts, make execution laws, or change the system of process in any of the States.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he had not the slightest objection to the progress of the bill. For himself, however, he desired a fuller inquiry into its merits and bearing. The gentleman from Illinois had certainly proposed an important alteration in the amendment, which he had declared himself ready to offer. But, however simple the question might be, still it was a question, and required the greatest deliberation. If they were to do away the inequality of its operation, and give to the old States the same provisions that were extended to the new, a difficulty remained. The power extended by the bill to the Federal Courts, was entirely illusory. Laws might be enacted to regulate processes, but they might be altered by the Supreme Court, and no limit was placed to this power of alteration. He thought that, if the system was adopted at all, the Supreme Court ought to be invested with a supervising power, with limitations—in the first place, from altering the march of suits, so as to make their progress more rapidly than the laws of the States allow; and, secondly, restricting the Judges of that Court from altering the principle of those laws in relation to final process. These objects he had in view in moving to postpone the bill, in order to give time for investigation. He concluded by moving to lay the bill upon the table; but suspended his motion at the desire of

Mr. McKINLEY, who rose merely to make a suggestion. He should be glad to delay the consideration of the bill. In the present form he should object to it, but if investigated further, he might agree to its adoption. His present impression was, that the powers proposed to be granted to the Courts could not be conceded without danger. He coincided in opinion with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the question was not, what were the intentions of the framers of the law of '89, but what were its effects? He should vote for a postponement.

Mr. WHITE observed, that it was true, as has been said by the gentleman from New York, that the operation of the principle would be unequal; but as a modification had been mentioned, he would say nothing further on that head. With deference to the desires of the gentlemen from Georgia and Alabama, he wished that the question to postpone might not be taken until that upon his amendment had been decided upon. It would in no way interfere with any delay that might be thought desirable, or with any other amendment that might subsequently be suggested. He thought the whole subject one of great importance; but he could not perceive how the general question on the bill could interfere with his amendment. Should it be adopted, he should willingly go the whole, and would vote for a modification by which the provision would be extended to the old States, as they were called. The only reason why the amendment offered by him did not extend over the whole ground, was, that he did not consider himself authorized to make any proposition for altering the condition of those States in which the system of jurisprudence had long been established. For that reason he proposed only to cover the nine States admitted into the Union since '89. These were his motives. If the question was taken, he should not oppose laying it on the table. He wished, however, that the question should be taken first on the amendment; which would not debar the gentleman from Kentucky or Alabama, from subsequently inquiring into the expediency of granting the power of supervision to the Supreme Court. If, however, the gentleman from Georgia persisted in laying the bill upon the table, he would acquiesce.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

LIEUTENANTS IN THE NAVY.

The special Orders of the Day then occurring in their order, the bill to increase the pay of the Lieutenants of the Navy, who shall have served ten years, was taken up.

Mr. HARRISON moved the postponement of the bill (being the next in order) for the gradual reduction of the duty on Imported Salt, on account of the absence of a Senator, who took an interest in the proposed measure; but, before any question was taken on his motion, he withdrew it, at the request of

Mr. MACON, who moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Executive business; which was concurred in, and, after remaining in secret session for a short time,

The motions of Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, and BERRIEN, being under consideration—

Mr. HARRISON said, that the more he reflected on the subject, the more he was convinced of the propriety of the amendment. On investigation, it was found that there were eighty-six who would be entitled to the advanced pay, in case the bill passed as it was reported, while there were sixty-four who had served seven years, and thirty-six who had served five years, and who would be excluded from the benefits of the provision for an equal number of years. The operation of the bill would, therefore, in his opinion, be hard and unequal; as it would be perceived that there were a number of lieutenants who would not be entitled to the increase, and yet who had served nearly as long as those who would have the benefit of this bill. Many junior officers were employed in the same service, and placed on an equal footing with those who were a few years their seniors; and the result would be, that, when they were in ports together, they would not be equal in respect to pay, and the one would be able to enjoy comforts beyond the reach of the other. This would be peculiarly galling to the younger officers, in cases where they should happen to mess together. All such causes of discontent and complaint ought, if possible, to be avoided; and he felt assured, if the bill should pass, its partiality, in this respect, would be severely felt. There could not possibly be devised a plan more certain to depress the spirits and wound the pride of a spirited officer, than this. Mr. H. said, he had determined to vote for the bill as it was reported. But he should, upon further reflection, do it with great reluctance, and only under a conviction that nothing better could be obtained: and he gave his friend from Maine fair warning, that, should the proposition to amend the bill not succeed, so as to include all the lieutenants of the Navy, in the proposal for an increase of pay, he would not cease to urge it with all his efforts, and would bring forward a proposition to that effect, until the junior officers should be placed upon the same footing as those who had served a longer term of years.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that he should not have expressed himself further upon this subject, had he not been misunderstood. It was considered by the committee, that, after long services in the Navy, at that time of life when the judgment was matured, and the officer likely to have formed connexions which would increase his expenses, it was merely equitable that he should receive an increased compensation. In the Army, after having served for such a space, an officer was entitled to a brevet rank, by the mere force of time. There was no such advancement in the Navy, and this additional compensation would supply, in a measure, its place. It was said that there were individuals as meritorious among the junior officers as among those who had served longer. This might be, and probably was, often the case. But, in the Army, no such principle as this was acknowledged, as an officer there received his brevet rank merely on account of the length of his services. The principle, on the contrary, was the same in the Navy as in the Army. A midshipman, for instance, was, after having served for a certain number of years, entitled to a warrant as post midshipman. This was given him by the force of time alone. He could not even be examined until a certain time had passed. So, in the English Navy, the surgeons were entitled to a certain increase of pay after a certain time of service, and depending on nothing else. The committee, however, did not rely entirely on theory, in relation to this subject. They had received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy upon this topic, in which he recommended that an increase of pay should be given to lieutenants who should have performed ten years of faithful service. This letter was not communicated to the committee until after they had reported this bill, with which it accorded exactly, and shewed that the views of the Department corroborated fully those taken by the committee. Since this bill had been before the Senate, a memorial from the surgeons of the Navy had been received, which was now under the consideration of the committee; and he thought it a distinct subject which ought to be allowed to stand on its own merits.

VOL. IV.—7

Mr. HAYNE said that the proposition of his friend from Georgia, to recommit the bill, with the design of providing for the surgeons of the Navy, was, he thought, premature. The whole subject of the medical department of the Navy was now before the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was very desirable that measures should be taken to induce men of talents and high character for science to go to sea in that department. The subject of compensation, it was true, would be a matter of grave consideration; but that did not embrace all the objects which the committee, in forming their plan on this subject, had in view. They had, therefore, reserved that subject to be provided for by a separate bill. As to the present bill, he wished it to pass for the benefit, and in consideration of the merits, of the lieutenants alone. And, while he was up, he would say a few words in relation to it. I agree, said Mr. H. with my friend from Ohio, that the present pay of this valuable class of officers is inadequate to their comforts or their services; and I do not agree with my friend from Maryland, in the motion which he has made. To the bill as it was reported, I will allow I had some objections. But I think that the increased compensation should not extend to all. To the elder officers it was due, in order that they might have the means of living according to their rank. The committee were of this opinion, sustained by that of the Department. So far he disagreed from his friend from Maryland, that he would not accept that gentleman's proposition, unless he should be convinced that the bill, as reported, could not be obtained. He thought, with the gentleman from New Hampshire, that, throughout the Navy, the pay ought to be arranged according to the time of service. His own opinion was, that the pay ought to be progressive; so much after five years' service; an increase after ten; and so on. He should be in favor of giving an increase of pay which would always induce the officers to perform their duty with zeal and fidelity. This would be done most effectually by fixing an advance of pay at a certain period, to be the reward of faithful services. He did not doubt that all performed their duties now; but he would ask, whether it could be supposed that an officer who had served twenty years had no more claim to gratitude and reward from his country, than one who had served only five years? It was not doubted that time and service would have ripened their talents. Time also generally changed their condition. Becoming older men, they naturally formed connexions, and probably had wives and families to support. It is true that, for a young officer, the pay is sufficient. I say, therefore, said Mr. H. that a necessity does not exist to increase the pay of all the lieutenants in the service. But, if it is allowed that the present pay is sufficient for the younger grades, I contend that it ought to be increased as a longer term of service fixes their character and increases their usefulness. In the Army, if length of service did not entitle the officer to an increase of pay, it gave him an advanced rank; and he believed, that, from the increased expense to which they were exposed at home and abroad, the older officers were entitled to further pay. But, if he could not get that, he was willing to take up with the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CHANDLER did not need the warning voice of the gentleman from Ohio to convince him that the measure would be persevered in. Mr. C. had expressed his belief before, and he now repeated it, that this was only one step towards a general system of high pay. No doubt it would be followed up until every officer in the Navy would share in the increase. The brevetted officers of the Army had been referred to. But he believed it would be found that they had no increase of pay in consequence of their brevets, unless they were given a separate command. If it were necessary that the pay of some of the older lieutenants should be raised, he did not see why the increase should also be given to the younger officers. If, however, the Senate should think differently, he should merely content himself to vote as he saw fit. But he believed the gentlemen who had charge of the bill were mistaken in their views in endeavoring to assimilate the pay of the Navy and Army.

Mr. HARRISON said, that the idea of the gentleman from New Hampshire was a mistaken one in relation to the brevet rank of the Army. Brevetted officers received no additional pay except in some particular instances. He knew an officer who received, during the last war, the brevet rank of major, and who never to this day received a farthing above his captain's pay. It was a grade which did not necessarily bring with it any additional emolument. The idea of it, in the English service, from which our Army borrowed it, was, that it was a part of a progressive promotion; and, during our late war, it was principally employed as a token of honor bestowed on officers who had distinguished themselves. As to our Naval officers, he would remark, that their situation required that they should support the appearance of gentlemen. When they go abroad, a comparison must take place between them and foreign officers, which is much to the advantage of the latter. They ought to be placed on the same footing, and be able to equal in appearance, and return the courtesies shewn them by foreigners. They had lived for many years on hope, and they began to fear that hope deferred was always to be their lot. He entirely agreed with the gentleman from Tennessee, in his remarks of yesterday, as to the comparative duties and pay of the officers of the Navy and other persons in the public employments. He believed they were deserving, and trusted their deserts would not any longer be neglected.

Mr. McLANE observed, that he was in favor of increasing the pay of these officers, but averse to doing it according to the time of service. It was admitted, on all hands, that the disparity between the pay of the Army and Navy was very great; and it was not pretended that that of the Army was too high. He did not suppose that, in fixing the pay of the officers of either, it was intended to remunerate them for actual services—that was impossible—but to cherish those men whose devotion to their country would be proved in the event of another war. The principle on which they acted was of a higher nature than to admit the supposition that their services and fidelity were to be bought for a price. The object, then, of the bill was to support these men honorably and liberally in time of peace, whose lives were to be risked, in case of a war, for our defence. Now, sir, said Mr. McL. if the officers of the Army do not receive too much, why should we not advance the pay of those of the Navy? I look upon the Navy as the most important arm of our national defence; and we ought to cherish it in the prospect of its future services. I do not intend to disparage the Army, nor am I insensible to its merits, or forgetful of the many brave officers it has produced. But I must say, that, from the peculiar situation of the country, the Navy is the most important branch of our war establishment. Yet this important branch of service is comparatively neglected. The officers of our Army are brought up in the Military Academy, and are then introduced at once into actual service. The young Naval officer must, on the contrary, educate himself from his own books, and depend on his limited opportunities for improvement. And, when he has toiled through all these difficulties, left in a manner to himself, and arrives at a higher grade, what does he receive? A sum, even if this bill should pass, much less than the pay of the Army officer, who has been educated at the expense of the Government. But it has been said, that he has a chance of sharing prize money. That, certainly was not the case during a peace; and, setting that consideration aside, he would repeat that this was not the principle on which they should be treated. They should be cherished and encouraged in a time of peace, so as to create the materials for efficient defence in war. Prize money was the reward of their own gallantry. It cost the country nothing, and was essentially the property of the captors. What is the object of sustaining these individuals in peace, at all? It is, that, when war comes, their gallantry may be at our disposal. What are you now asked to do? To raise their pay to an equality with that of the officers of the Army. And why should this increase be confined to those who have served ten years? To me, said Mr. McL. that class seem rather less entitled to it than the junior officers. The former have arrived at a point nearer promotion, if their services have been meritorious, and will sooner be made captains; while the latter have a long series of years before them of hard service, with little prospect of immediate promotion. If the object was to cherish the Navy, we ought, at least, to make the officers comfortable, and give them a genteel subsistence. These were the grounds on which he should vote for the bill; and, wishing to see the Army and Navy placed on an equal footing, he was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, to recommit.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that it was immaterial to him what course the bill took. As to that portion of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, which related to the pay of the surgeons, he thought it superfluous, as the subject was about to be reported upon by the Committee on Naval Affairs; and he understood their object to be, to change the whole system. As to the proposition to place all the lieutenants on the same footing, as to pay, he would observe, that there was this difference between the officers of the Army and Navy: The rank of those in the latter service was the same in their separate grades. It was not so in the former: a captain, for instance, whose commission bore a certain date, and who has served a certain number of years, ranks as a major by brevet; yet the pay of a captain does not increase according to his brevet rank. But he apprehended that the Senate could not consider the proposition to advance the pay of all the lieutenants without revising the whole system; and, if that was done, regard ought to be had to the recommendations of the individual at the head of the department. And he had already confined his recommendations to the lieutenants who had served ten years. He, therefore, was in favor of the bill as it stood. The gentleman from Ohio had mistaken him, Mr. W., in supposing he was of opinion that the brevet rank entitled an officer to an increased pay. He had only intended to argue that it was a distinction which operated as a stepping-stone to promotion, and was confined by the mere force of time. The gentleman from Ohio being a military man, he had not thought it necessary to explain minutely his views on this head.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that the clearness with which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] had treated this subject yesterday, obviated any necessity on his, Mr. B.'s, part, to say much upon it. But, as to his proposition, he would say one word. A number of the lieutenants of the Navy had presented to the Senate a memorial, appealing, not to the generosity, but to the justice of the country, in a manner which ought not to be neglected. The bill now before the Senate had come from the Committee without a report. By this bill, the prayer of the petitioners was not granted; it was passed by, and a distinct proposition made, in such a manner as to cut off a large number of meritorious officers, in the same grade, from a participation in the benefits to be conferred by the measure. It was not his object to oppose the bill, but to obtain a recommitment, in order to ascertain whether the lieutenants of the Navy had not been raised to a rank requiring the performance of a duty, and the assumption of a responsibility, for which they had not been rewarded, and for which their present pay was inadequate. It had been shewn that they were placed on a different footing from officers of the same rank in the Army; but it had not been shewn why this disparity should exist. What, he would ask, is the object of pay to those who serve in the defence of their country? Is it to tender a certain amount of purchase money for certain specific services? Or is it to enable these officers to enjoy the intercourse of polished life? He thought we need not go so far, but stop at the simple declaration that it was given as an expression, on the part of the Government, of the value of their services. The object of his motion was to inquire, whether their rank ought to place their compensation on an equal footing with the lieutenants of the Army; and, if so, that it might be given to them. The committee had reported a bill by which the increase of compensation would only be given to those who should have served a certain number of years; yet it was not shewn that this would place them on the same footing with the captains of the Army. No one would doubt the truth of the remark of the gentleman from Delaware, that the Navy ought to be cherished. It was his own sentiment also; and, from that feeling, he was desirous of inquiring into the merits of their case, in order that they might be placed in a situation equally advantageous with that enjoyed by their equals in rank in the military service. As to that portion of his motion which related to the surgeons, he had not the slightest objection, since the explanations that had been made by the gentlemen from New Hampshire and South Carolina, so to modify his proposition as to leave that subject to the specific consideration of the committee. But he was still desirous of pressing the other portion, as the motion of his friend from Maryland did not meet the whole object which he, Mr. B., had in view.

Mr. HAYNE said, that this proposition was different from that of his friend from Maryland. He had not been prepared to meet it, because, until now, he supposed that, apart from the subject of the surgeons, the two motions were similar. The object of the gentleman from Georgia was to equalize the pay of the lieutenants with that of the captains of the Army. He would merely state the effect of this measure. The addition of pay, should this motion prevail, would be twenty dollars per month, while the bill proposes to give only ten. On the relative expediency of these propositions the Senate would decide. The pay of a captain of the Army was now 1,081 dollars; that of the lieutenant of the Navy, with the increase proposed by this bill, would be 960 dollars; so that there still remained a distinction between their pay of 121 dollars. Whether it would be proper to go so far in the increase of the compensation of the lieutenants, he would leave to the Senate, contenting himself with this explanation.

The question was then put on Mr. BERRIEN'S motion, as modified by him, and it was rejected without a division.

The motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to amend the bill by striking out the words "who shall have served ten years as such," so as to make the increase of pay applicable to all the lieutenants of the Navy, was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that he acquiesced in the propriety of the remark of his colleague, that all the officers of the same grade ought to receive the same pay. He would now submit an amendment which would, he thought, equalise the compensation of the officers of corresponding rank in the Army and Navy. He would move to insert in the first section these words: "and, after ten 'years' service, each lieutenant shall receive an additional 'sum of ten dollars per month, and one additional ration 'per day.'" If this amendment were adopted, it would make the emolument of the lieutenants of the Navy who had served ten years, the same as that of a captain of the Army. It needed not to be stated to the Senate, that the services of these officers were arduous in the extreme, and that their rank exposed them to expenses which their present compensation would not enable them to bear. He hoped that the Senate would agree with him, that such long services and deprivations merited the increase which he proposed to give them.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, if he understood the gentleman, his intention was, first to raise the pay of all the lieutenants ten dollars per month, and then to raise it ten dollars more at the end of ten years' service. He was entirely opposed to the proposition.

The motion of Mr. CHAMBERS was then negatived without a division, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1828.

LIEUTENANTS IN THE NAVY.

The bill to increase the pay of Lieutenants in the Navy was read a third time.

Mr. MACON made a few remarks upon the bill, in the course of which he observed, that it was not a time to increase the expenditure of the Government, as, in the part of the country where he resided, money was never scarcer, nor times harder, than now. He had observed, that it was always a good time to raise compensations, but never a good time to reduce them. He should say no more than that he should vote against the bill.

The question then occurring on the passage of the bill, the Yeas and Nays were asked by Mr. BATEMAN, whose call being sustained, the bill passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Bouigny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson of Ky., Johnston, of Lou., Kane, King, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Sanford, Silabee, Smith of Md., Tyler, White, Willey—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bateman, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Hendricks, Macon, Parria, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith of S. C., Thomas, Williams, Woodbury—13.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill making appropriations for the completion of the Cumberland Road from Bridgeport to Zanesville, in Ohio, and to cause a survey to be made of the route of the same, from Zanesville, to the Seat of Government in the State of Missouri, was taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS did not suppose that it would be necessary, or that the Senate were disposed, to go into an argument on the principles of the bill. To press such remarks at this period would be needless and impolitic. It had been the policy of the Commissioners to let parts of the road remain in an unfinished situation; and this bill provided for the completion of twenty-three miles, terminating at Zanesville, which had been left in this condition. He did not think it necessary to argue upon the obligation of Congress to give this appropriation. That, he believed, had been fully established on former occasions. It was now necessary that the work should progress speedily, as the road, to a certain extent, had been made, and in its partly finished state would suffer damage, if the work were not gone on with.

Mr. CHANDLER inquired what amount of the two per cent. on sales of public lands had been applied to the construction of this road.

Mr. RUGGLES said that it would be difficult to answer the question. In 1807, the law had passed, authorizing the application of two per cent. on the sales of land, to the construction of the road. This two per cent. on the actual sales made in Ohio, had already been absorbed, and a large sum besides. But he did not consider Congress restricted in this matter. It was a great National work, and had been acted upon as such, and appropriations had been made to carry it on independently of the two per cent. The road had now gone beyond the Ohio river, and was progressing towards the State of Missouri, into which it would in a few years penetrate. To stop, seemed now out of the question. The Commissioner of the Land Office had made a statement of the amount of the two per cent. on lands in the State of Ohio, which would be about two millions when all the lands were sold. When this sum would be realized, he did not know. It was not his computation, but that of the General Government. The law had been passed to carry on the work to Zanesville: and this appropriation was only to complete what had been begun under that law. He did not suppose there would be any opposition to an appropriation for such an object—as the time for opposing it, if ever, was at the first agitation of the measure. The greater portion of this great national work was completed, and would only require some care on the part of the Superintendent. It had been done in the best manner, and was covered with stone not over four ounces in weight; the surface had become consolidated, and made a firm and durable road. There was a balance of the work, of about twenty miles, from Bridgewater to Zanesville, yet to be completed, and, for that, this appropriation was to be made. The labor must be done gradually, as, if the stones were immediately covered with earth, they would settle and make holes. For this reason, Congress had, formerly, made such appropriations as the different stages of the work required. But it was now necessary to provide a sum sufficient to complete the road, and to cover all the little repairs that would be required. This section of the road was through a clay soil, and was very difficult to be worked upon, so as to form a solid and permanent work. The advantage of the road would be found to be very great; and one fact might be mentioned in relation to its effects as felt by the Government itself. Formerly, on this route, the mail contractors received eighty dollars a mile, while at present, they contract to carry the mail for thirty dollars—making a saving of fifty dollars. He hoped the bill would not meet with opposition that would require an elaborate debate upon it; and the time of the Senate might be spared.

Mr. CHANDLER was not satisfied with the answer given. He wished to know how much had been received and expended, that they might know what to depend upon hereafter.

Mr. BRANCH made some remarks in opposition to the bill, and reflected on the manner in which appropriations had been distributed among the several States.

Mr. COBB said he had once discussed this subject; and he had no desire to do it again: But he could not refrain from noticing a document which lay on the table, and which gave an enormous sum as necessary for the repairs of the road. It stated that it would cost only four hundred thousand dollars if repaired on the M'Adam's system. If what had been done, already, required so large a sum for repairs, was it not incumbent on the Senate to consider what the repairs of the road, when extended to the Seat of Government of Missouri, would cost? And also the continual charge, for repairs, of the projected road from Maine to New Orleans. Now, sir, said Mr. C., what enormous amounts will it not require to keep these great works annually in repair. Why do not the friends of the whole system establish toll gates, and make those who travel upon the road pay for it? As it is now, we, after having made it, are obliged to support it, ourselves. If the friends of the project have it in their power to make the road, why not make use of their power to pay the expenses of its repairs? Congress has been going on for years in its lavish expenditures on this object; and now the effect of its extravagance was beginning to be made manifest. Mr. C. said he hoped an inquiry would be had into the estimates and expenditures for this object; and he believed it would be found that the latter had, in every instance, exceeded the former.

Mr. HARRISON said, that he would not take to himself any portion of the imputation of uncharitableness, which had been alluded to by the gentleman from North Carolina, because he had never refused to vote for any appropriation, for purposes similar to this, let them be in what part of the Union they might. Let any rational project be brought forward, and he would cheerfully vote for it. The gentleman from North Carolina seemed to blame the Western States, because internal improvements had not been made in his State. But, said Mr. H., we could not originate any measure of the kind, because we did not know the localities. In all these questions it was necessary to inquire whether the work was, or was not, a national one. Let that question be decided, and he believed the gentleman from North Carolina might be sure of the aid of all the Western members. The State of Ohio was now constructing a great National Canal, to which she looked for highly beneficial results. She did not derive any great benefit from the Cumberland road, and had not asked much aid. The United States at large would derive more good from it by far, than his State, or indeed the Western States separately. It was a national object, highly valuable to the General Government, under many considerations. It enhanced the value of the public lands, and accelerated the progress of settlements upon them. It was, also, one of the great links by which this country was bound together. Had the gentleman from North Carolina known the country before the road was commenced, and seen it latterly, he would have been at no loss to feel the importance of this work. Formerly, when a person went to the Western country, it was looked upon as though he had cut himself off from the world. Instances frequently occurred of aged individuals who went early to the West, returning to visit their friends before they died, who never expected to see them again. All this was now changed; the communications had become frequent and easy; and not only old family connexions were renewed, but new alliances were frequently formed, having a tendency to unite with a kindly feeling the distant portions of the country. My friend from Georgia, said Mr. H., says that we of the West are the cause of saddling the Government with a vast expense for the construction and repair of the road. In reply, I can only say, the advantages are equal to the expenditure. He did not think it necessary to argue the constitutional question, which he agreed with his colleague had long since been settled: and in conclusion, he would again assure his friend from North Carolina, that he would give his cordial aid to any measure which should be proposed for the benefit of that State.

Mr. BRANCH made some further observations in opposition to the general principle, and remarked, that he hoped the question would be discussed on its proper grounds—the constitutionality of such appropriations; and expressed a hope that the time would come for stopping the progress of this tremendous exercise of power.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he never had supposed that Congress took upon itself the right of making internal improvements, or had aided any project not authorized by the States, as was intimated by the gentleman from North Carolina. On the contrary, he recollected that a gentleman from Virginia had formerly brought forward a resolution that each State might make such internal improvements, within its own limits, as should be deemed expedient; and that, in those cases, if the Government of the United States had any funds to spare, they might be applied to aid those States in carrying their projects into execution. In pursuance of this resolution, said Mr. S. we have gone on and subscribed for stock in various works of internal improvement; but never without the consent of the States. The Cumberland road was commenced during the administration of Mr. Jefferson; and Congress had gone on, appropriating for its progress, until it had nearly arrived at Zanesville. The work had been done in a most substantial manner, and was not surpassed any where—certainly not equalled in the United States. And now a small appropriation is wanted to complete it as far as it has gone; and are we to stop short? Why, sir, it is a great national work, which will be spoken of in the history of our country, as one of the means which a wise Government made use of to draw together the distant sections of this vast nation. But it is argued that the two per cent. on the sales of public lands will not cover the cost of the road. And suppose it will not; are we to relinquish a great national work on grounds like these? Certainly not. And while this complaint is made, Congress is taking the very course to prevent the construction of the road out of the two per cent. by giving away the lands all over the Western country, and thus taking the surest means of destroying that fund. If this system of donations is stopped, the means afforded by two per cent. on the sales of land may prove adequate to the work. But, otherwise, it certainly cannot. Much has been said about the expense of keeping the road in repair. But, if it is so great a burthen, why not give it up to the States through which it runs? Maryland passed an act agreeing to take the road, if the United States would cede it to her. But Congress refused to cede to her the 30 miles that runs through her territory; and since Congress was averse to giving up the road, he hoped they would allow it to progress. The expenditure was nothing in comparison to the object.

Some gentlemen, said Mr. S. have complained that their States have received no benefit from the system of internal improvement. Well, sir, some things are useful to some parts of the country and not so to others. The West do not want fortifications, while the Atlantic States do. And two fortifications are now erecting in the State of North Carolina. It is true that these works cannot come under the term of internal improvement; but they are something. And did not Congress give a sum of money, a year or two since, for the Dismal Swamp Canal? I know that the gentlemen from Virginia spoke and voted against it; but I dare say they chuckled when it succeeded in spite of their constitutional objections. Congress had also subscribed to make a Canal from the Chesapeake to the Delaware; indeed they had given to every portion of the country, where it was wanted, their assistance; and doubtless would act favorably on the project presented yesterday, by the gentleman from Alabama. [Mr. S. here enumerated several other works, among which was the deepening of Savannah river, to which Congress had lent its aid.] And so we have gone on, to clear harbors, make roads, canals, &c.—and shall we now stop, and refuse to complete less than 30 miles of the Cumberland Road? He would not believe that work was to end here. He knew that North Carolina wanted assistance. She had an iron bound coast, and he was glad that she was about to become a commercial State. He did not hear the speech of the gentleman yesterday, [Mr. BRANCH] but that gentleman showed him the memorial of his People, previous to presenting it, and he [Mr. S.] told him that a bill drawn up upon it, would pass the Senate. To every part of the country, where it was needed, improvement ought to be extended, and he [Mr. S.] should never withhold his vote where it could be beneficially used.

Mr. MACON said that the powers of the Government were limited. But by implication and construction you go on and make the Government harder and harder to manage, and create jealousies and heart-burnings among the People. The Government is now a very complicated machine, and every new power, makes it more complicated. If he was not mistaken, there was a gentleman present, who proposed a road in the Cherokee Nation. Every thing now is national or anti-national. Formerly, they were divided into Federal and anti-Federal. And, said Mr. M., I suppose this will be a Federal road, because it is made by the Federal Government. The gentleman from Maine has alluded to the two per cent. on sales of lands, which was to have been applied to the construction of this road. But that was when the lands were at two dollars an acre. Since that time, they have been reduced to $1 25; and there was another bill before the Senate, which proposed to reduce that still lower. Besides, we are continually giving those lands away. I remember, said Mr. M. the gentleman who formerly introduced the bill to fix the price at the present minimum; he said he would go no farther—that gentleman has since been a minister to a foreign court, and is now unfortunately dead. But so we go on, doing more and more to make the Government a complicated concern, and still going astray from its original design. It had been said by gentlemen who supported this bill, that the constitutional question had been settled. But he thought it would never be settled until it was fixed. And when that time came, by common consent, there would be no more talking about it. How long was it before Congress granted the money for the Delaware Canal? The debate upon it was long and obstinate—sufficiently so to show that the constitutional principle was not so fully settled as some gentlemen supposed. I always thought this road made by unconstitutional means. And I don't agree on this head with the gentleman from Kentucky, who complains of the operation of the Courts in his State. On that point I go with him. He, like all of us, disputes the powers of Congress, where they go against him. I never doubted, said Mr. M. that a good road was a good thing. I say amen to that. I am willing to give the two per cent. to the States, to make their roads; and then I wish to have done with them. I don't want that Congress should have any thing to do with such works as this in the several States. Let them do them themselves. I have often heard of great National works, and that they were free from tolls to all the People of the country. I know it is a very pleasant thing to travel over a fine road for nothing. But I should like it better had it cost the Government nothing; but been made by the enterprise of the States. He believed that, in former times, People had less change to pay their tolls with than they have now. I don't believe that we can bind the country together by legislation, unless we adhere to the Constitution. And the more you stretch the Constitution, the more you create heart-burnings among the different States; because the People never will believe that they are treated alike; and they can't be, in a country so large as this is. What is to be the result of this straining of the Constitution? Look at your table; nearly ready to break down with applications for the extension of our supposed powers to roads, canals, and every description of works. Let Congress adhere to the true meaning of that instrument, and they will get rid of these difficulties. Here you see a great and rich State coming forward, with a petition, and stating that they are poor and want assistance. This is always the strain. I read all these documents, or, if I leave out any, they are the petitions and memorials of the manufacturers. Sir said Mr. M. we are in the fair way to destroy this Government, and to ruin the country. Such will be the case when the infringements upon the Constitution have gone a little farther. I wish to adhere to its letter and its spirit. Let me say that a vote against any assumed power does nothing. The only case which I know, that was settled in the negative, was the secession law. I am nearly done; and I did not mean to have said a word on the subject, and I do not believe I should, if an allusion had not been made to the Constitution. If you go on in your present career, and destroy the Government, what will your State Governments do? They will set about looking up another secession law, and then consolidation will follow. The Federal Government has established gaming shops. I mean the banks and lotteries; and in these and other games, our liberties and our Constitution are likely to be gambled away.

SENATE.]

Cumberland Road.

Mr. TYLER expressed the hope, on his rising, that the Senate would experience no alarm at the circumstance of his having taken the floor. He did not rise to go into a constitutional discussion. He rose only to tender to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] who had just addressed the Senate, his thanks for the remarks he had made, and to correct him in one particular. He begged leave to premise, that there was no member of that body whom he held in higher respect than the gentleman from Maryland. If I had been for the first time engaged in the investigation of this subject with a view to arrive at satisfactory conclusions, the gentleman would have convinced me, [said Mr. T.] of the inexpediency, apart from the unconstitutionality, of exercising this power to make roads and canals. The gentleman, sir, has visited the representation on this floor, of many of the States, and sustained by the Honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] has represented them as yielding to the allurements presented in some local scheme. He has portrayed them as voting for the exercise of this power, whenever the State they represented was interested in the scheme proposed. He has paid his respects, among others, to my honorable colleague, [Mr. TAZEWELL] who is not now in his place, and while he does him the justice to admit, that he voted against the appropriation of $150,000 to the Dismal Swamp Canal, represents him as chuckling and rejoicing at the fact of its passage. [Here Mr. SMITH explained.] I should be happy, could I believe that I misapprehended the gentleman. I am certain that the gentleman intended no disrespect to my colleague. Far from it. He felt it his duty to express the thorough conviction, that no local benefit or temporary expediency could ever lead that gentleman to do other than regret, what, in his conscience, he should believe violatory of the Constitution. Gentlemen might represent, in as brilliant colors as they might please—paint with the most glowing pencil, the benefits of any scheme, (and he knew that all the treasures of rhetoric had been employed in embellishing this usurpation over roads and canals)—and yet, sir, if it was unconstitutional, it was inexpedient. The preservation of the Constitution was the height of expediency. That instrument was the charter of American liberty; destroy it, and that liberty was gone; sap it by gradual encroachments, and its destruction, in the end, is rendered as certain as if it was assailed by the bayonet.

But, sir, apart from this, the gentleman has satisfied me of the utter inexpediency of exercising this power. Is it true, that it operates so powerfully on Senators even, selected, as they are presumed to be, for their gravity, their wisdom, their attachment to the Constitution, their elevation, above the mere ephemeral policy of the hour, their indifference to the agitations of party; is it true, that this allurements of State interest causes them to embrace it without stopping even to glance at the Constitution, the charter of their rights, and those of the States? If it be so, it is time to arrest this monstrous evil. Gentlemen, after this, in vain will present to my acceptance, arrayed as it may be in all the finery in which their imaginations can clothe it, this power, however fair they may represent it. I shall only be able to regard it as an old wrinkled hag, corrupted and corrupting. Sir, said Mr. T. all will concur in the importance and necessity of guarding against the accumulation of patronage in the Executive hand. That patronage will never fail to be exercised for ambitious and time-serving purposes. I mean, sir, to make no charge against the present Administrators of the Government; I seek to awaken in the discussion of a grave question, no party-feeling; I should thereby only disappoint my own object. Will the members of this body continue longer to exercise a power which, according to the showing of the gentleman from Maryland, may be used so directly as a bribe upon the several States? If it can operate here, surely it is not presuming too much to suppose that it may exercise its influence elsewhere. What an electioneering weapon do gentlemen thus place in the hands of this government!

Virginia has been, over and over again, reviled, and efforts have been unceasingly made to ridicule her for her advocacy of principles at war with the latitudinarian principles of this day. And yet, Sir, what fruit has been the result of a departure from the cause she has untiringly maintained? May I not boldly challenge an investigation into this subject? Congress incorporated the Bank of the United States. It was done from the best of motives, I admit. The war left us with a flood of paper money, which there was no inclination, and but little ability, to redeem in specie. The great object of incorporating this bank, was to use it as an instrument to bring about specie payments; and yet, in this the country was wholly deceived. It was used as the instrument of speculation and stock-jobbing. I have a personal knowledge upon this subject, arising from the fact of my having been deputed, along with others, on a committee appointed by the other House, to investigate its actual condition. The report of the committee will justify what I say. It stood on the verge of bankruptcy; and the government, no longer relying upon it to accomplish the object of its incorporation, had to coerce the payment of specie, by a resolution requiring all duties and taxes to be paid in specie. It had parted with the great body of its resources, and injudiciously deputed an agent to England to procure specie, which was no sooner procured than it was again wanting. Its operation has served, in an eminent degree, to cripple the state institutions, without affording any corresponding benefits. I cannot, sir, part from this subject without paying to Mr. Cheves the tribute which is due to him for his after management of that institution. He has thereby justly acquired for himself the character of one of the most enlightened financiers. His self-denying policy, and thorough understanding of banking principles, has given to the bank the power and influence it now so unhappily enjoys. He said that he did not mean to dwell longer on this subject. He would pass on to that which gave rise to this debate. The gentlemen from Maryland and from North Carolina had given a picture of its practical operation, which admitted of no addition. Thus, Sir, the door was fairly opened, and this government threatened, as on the Missouri question, to assume a new attitude. Forgetful of its actual powers, it sought to usurp the powers of the people themselves, in the efforts here made to fasten on the people of Missouri a Constitution which they did not approve. Thus is it always with power—ever accumulating, and ever seeking fresh pretexts for its enlargement. Mr. TYLER disclaimed all intention, in any thing he said, to awaken an unpleasant emotion in the breast of any one who heard him. He would not question, that gentlemen, with whom he at that day differed, were actuated by as honest views and convictions as governed himself. His motive in adverting to this topic, could not be misconstrued. He did it to show the dangers of construction, the evils which had sprung from adopting the commentaries of modern politicians, in place of the plain wording as the instrument itself. But, Sir, what can I add to what has fallen from the venerable gentleman from N. Carolina? [Mr. MACOX.] He has shown, most satisfactorily, the evils by which we are now surrounded. Local interests are consulted; and, hence, your table is loaded with memorials, speaking a language which thrills to the heart of the patriot, wherever uttered. The power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, for objects specifically enumerated in the Constitution, has been tortured from those objects, and devoted to the purpose of advancing sectional interests. Thus, Sir, has the Government succeeded in awakening a spirit at war with the permanency of our institutions. This is a feeling engendered, which has the effect of arraying State against State, and brother against brother. These are the bitter fruits of latitudinous construction, to counterbalance which, no good, however great, will ever be found to be sufficient. No, Sir, nothing can atone for an alienation of feeling on the part of the People towards one another and towards this Government. I must believe, then, that the gentleman from Maryland is mistaken, in ascribing to my colleague secret pleasure in the enactment of the law making an appropriation to the Dismal Swamp Canal. My colleague could not have esteemed that as a boon, which assisted in sapping the foundations of this Government. I will answer positively for Virginia, in relation to this subject. Her constituted authorities would have rejected, without one moment of hesitation, the largess, had it been offered to them, and they would have been sustained in such rejection by the People. Let our mountains still uplift their untamed peaks to the clouds—let us have to wade through the mire of our roads, and brave the mighty floods of our streams, in the best way that we are able—yet we will not barter the Constitution of this land for any boon which may be offered; in violation thereof, we will not be tempted to countenance a temporary expediency, for that great, and prominent, and safe policy of preserving the Government, as it came from the hands of those who made it, and, thereby, of perpetuating the blessings of liberty to our posterity.

Cumberland Road.

I owe you an apology for having occupied your time thus long. When I rose, I had no intention of saying so much; but I throw myself upon the importance of the subject for my apology. He could urge much more upon it, but he had probably said too much already. Let this Government avoid all interference with the internal affairs of the States. Let it revolve in its own orbit, leaving the State Governments to revolve in theirs, and no imagination, however vivid, can paint the glories which await us as a nation—but, let it go on, as it has of late gone on, addressing itself to local interests and feelings, and thereby engendering feuds and animosities, and our destiny may easily be foretold.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said he did not intend to impute inconsistency or want of principle to the Senators from Virginia, in the course they had taken in relation to the Dismal Swamp Canal. He merely intended to imply that, although the Dismal Swamp Canal would benefit their State, such was their ideas of the Constitution, that they would not advocate it.

Mr. MACON said, that this system, thus far, had shewn how much the great men who projected it, were mistaken, in their ideas of making its effects uniform throughout the country. Such a thing could not be. Gentlemen were mistaken altogether, if they thought that, by making laws, they could bind the people together. When any part of the country believes that it has not its fair share of this power, it becomes discontented. And if ever the country was ruined it would be from this cause.

Mr. BENTON said that this bill provided for the completion of a section of road already begun; as a mere question of expediency he should suppose that the Congress ought to finish what had been commenced. He saw no necessity for drawing into this discussion the question of the powers of Congress to make Internal Improvements; because this road had been in progress for a quarter of a century—and because it was made under a compact which had induced every successive Congress to approve it, and make appropriations for its continuance. As to the question whether Congress had this right, it was easily settled. It is said that two per cent. was reserved from the sales of lands for the completion of this work, and it was argued that no appropriations ought to be made beyond the amount arising from that provision. But, on the other hand, the friends of the road contend that Congress was bound by a strong moral obligation to complete the work. Such an obligation rested on every land-holder to make roads, by which access could be had to them. And the best roads had generally been made by the owners of land either to them or through them. Now, said Mr. B. in the States through which this road is to run, after it crosses the boundary of Ohio, the United States is the sole land-holder, and is bound, both by interest and by equity, to make a road, to render these lands accessible. There were other considerations which imposed this duty on the General Government, which would not be operative on an individual landholder. The United States is paying no taxes on her lands; and is exempted altogether from the necessity of making improvement upon them; and besides, the advantage derived from this great work had been much greater than the expenditure. At the time at which the compact was entered into by the United States and the Western States, it was found that donations of lands were really, instead of donations, exorbitant sales—because the increase of the taxes was very great. The United States derive great advantage from the accession which the population of those States were rapidly gaining, and which was much increased by the roads which the people of the States were continually making by their own labor. These roads and bridges were made to improve the access to the lands of the United States, and in the whole plan the General Government was largely the gainer. Thus it will be seen, that the labor and enterprise of the people of the West on their plantations, roads, bridges, &c., are redounding to the interest of the United States: for, whenever a project is started for a road or a canal through the public lands, their value becomes immediately enhanced in a very considerable degree. I think, said Mr. B., that sufficient has been said to show that the United States is bound to make this road, both on considerations of justice and policy; and that this bill stands upon the very best footing.

Mr. COBB would trouble the Senate with but a few remarks. The gentleman from Maryland has observed, among other improvements, that something had been done for the Savannah river. As I voted for that appropriation, while it is well known that I am not a friend to the system, I deem it proper to explain my motives. The object of that appropriation was, to remove obstructions placed in the Savannah river, during the Revolution, to defend the City from the enemy. In this case, then, there was an obligation, on the part of the government, to make this appropriation and I think I can point to a similar object in Maryland, in which the aid of the General Government was obtained. During the late war certain vessels were sunk in the harbor of Baltimore, to prevent the British flotilla from attacking the city; and he believed that, since the peace, these vessels were raised at the expence of the Government. He did not mention this to find any fault with it. It was as it should be. And why? Because the Government had assumed the right to obstruct the harbor for the common defence: and was bound, when they were no longer necessary, to remove those obstructions. And, therefore I think, said Mr. C. that there is no difference between cases of Baltimore and Savannah. Now, Sir, said Mr. C. to take up the subject before us, I did think, and I do still think, that there is a great distinction between this and other objects of Internal Improvement. In the House of Representatives, on a former occasion, a resolution had been introduced against the objects of Internal Improvement. Another resolution was offered, and which succeeded, which gave the power to the United States of making appropriations in aid of projects commenced by the different States. To him the power of appropriation appeared much more dangerous than the other. He should say nothing further upon the general question; but he could not see one tittle of reason in support of the right of an individual State to grant a power to the Federal Government which was not to be found in the constitution. And giving to Congress the power of appropriating money, was far more dangerous than to admit the original power itself of the General Government to make Internal Improvements, independent of the will or permission of the States. In this respect he agreed entirely with the gentleman from Virginia, who had, a short time since, addressed the Senate. The power to raise money and appropriate it was not less important than it was restricted: and every exercise of it ought to be strictly within the terms of the grant in the Constitution. This was a subject of great jealousy when the Constitution was adopted. The most populous States were jealous of every power of which they divested themselves in granting them to the General Government; and it was expressly declared, that every power which was not given to the General Government, by the Constitution, was retained by the States, and could not be wrested from them. It is scarcely necessary, [said Mr. COMB] that I should go into a further detail of my opinions upon the constitutionality of this question. They have often been declared before, and have now been presented to the Senate in a manner merely incidental, as I probably should not have opened, my lips had it not been for the remarks, which I have already noticed, of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, observed, that he did not know whether the sinking of the vessels at Savannah, during the Revolution, had been done by the direction of the General Government, or whether those obstructions had been placed there by order of the State authorities. He recollected, however, that the Legislature of Georgia passed a law, many years since, levying duties on the tonnage entering the harbour of Savannah, to be applied in clearing out the obstructions to the navigation of that river. And he also recollected, that, when the act of Congress passed, the Legislature of Georgia repealed those duties. He agreed that, both in the instance mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia, of the hulks sunk in the harbour of Baltimore, and also in the case of Savannah, it was perfectly proper that the proposition, for the removal of those obstructions, should be made by Congress. [Mr. S. then stated some circumstances relative to the removal of the vessels sunk in the harbor of Baltimore, which were inaudible to the Reporter.]

Mr. BRANCH then made a few remarks in opposition to the bill, and expressed a desire that the constitutional question should not, in any similar case, be lost sight of. In regard to the hulks in the river Savannah, he observed that this obstruction took place previous to the adoption of the Federal Constitution: and that their removal was more incumbent on the General Government, than the completion of any plan of internal improvement that came within his knowledge.

Mr. EATON said he did not think there was time to argue a constitutional question at this late hour. Whether Georgia had received too much or too little from the General Government, he did not pretend to say. He wished to consider this subject more thoroughly than he had time to do now, and he therefore moved an adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1828.

PENSIONERS.

The bill from the other House, making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, which had been reported by the Committee on Finance, with an amendment, having been taken up—

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that he had been ordered by the Committee to move to amend the bill, so as to strike out the appropriation of $236,000 in addition to the unexpended balance of $564,000. But, after the bill had been reported, some doubts were entertained by the Committee whether the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated ought to be considered in the appropriation for this year. In order to receive satisfactory information on the subject, a letter had been directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who had in reply transmitted a report of the Chief Clerk of the Pension Office, by which it appeared that the sum spoken of as an unexpended balance, was that sum which should have been expended in 1828, and which would be paid over to the pensioners in 1829, in the same manner as the Navy fund was disposed of. It was, therefore, considered by the Committee, that the 564,000 dollars remaining in the Treasury, was not, in reality, an unexpended balance; but that it would be called for in the course of the year 1829. He thought the subject would be better illustrated by the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, than by any other means. [The Secretary then read the letter.]

Under these circumstances, it would be seen that the Committee would have been justified in reporting the bill without an amendment. But, on further consideration, it appeared doubtful whether a sum, not expended out of the appropriation of 1827, could be applied on that to be expended in 1828. The statement of the Clerk of the Pension Office was, that, if all the pensions came in during the year, it would require $1,200,000 to pay them. The Committee thought it better to bring the question before the Senate; and, as the Department was ready to take the responsibility on themselves, they were willing to let them have it.

Mr. BRANCH made some remarks, in which he explained why he differed from the Committee.

Mr. HARRISON said, that he had been informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that an unexpended balance had been increasing for the last two years, until it amounted to $564,000, and that it would probably be sufficient for the expenditure of this year. He thought, with the gentleman from North Carolina, that the expenditure should not be larger than was necessary.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, the matter was before the Senate for its decision. For the information of the gentleman from Ohio, he would ask the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. [The letter was then read by the Secretary.]

Mr. PARRIS said, that he did not see how the balance could have been accumulating, as had been observed by the gentleman from Ohio. He [Mr. P.] understood that, after two years, all unexpended balances were carried to the surplus fund. He thought with the Committee, that it would not be safe to depend on the balance alone; and he would state the effect of doing so. Suppose certain pensioners should apply, who had not claimed their pension in 1828. They cannot obtain it afterwards. At any rate, he would not alter the measure so as to cause the least inconvenience. Congress was only the pursers to deal their stipend to these men, and they must have it. The case was a very simple one. By adding the unexpended balance of last year, the nominal amount was swelled; but it had nothing to do with the real appropriation. It appeared that the unexpended balance remained in the Treasury for the payment of those distant pensions, which had not yet been claimed, and which were scattered through distant parts of the country.

Mr. McLANE said, that he thought, with the gentleman who had just sat down, that the form of this bill was not material, as regarded its operation on the Treasury. The only object that could be had, in this matter, was, to pay promptly the old pensioners who would apply, and for whom the appropriation was made. They ought not to be put to inconvenience. Before another year, they might be beyond the reach of the necessities which their pensions would supply. If they do not apply, it is still in the Treasury; and the policy had always been observed of allowing it to remain there, for their use, when their applications should be made. But it appeared that the appropriation, if this amendment pass, will be totally inadequate. The Senator from Ohio is in error. This $64,000 dollars was not an accumulating balance, because the balance of the former year went to the surplus fund.

[Mr. HARRISON explained, that he had not used the word accumulating, but had stated that the amount of the balance had increased, being larger than it was at the end of any former year.]

Mr. McLANE resumed. He did not intend to misrepresent the gentleman from Ohio. He believed the amount totally inadequate. The Clerk of the Pension Office estimated that 1,300,000 dollars would be required to pay all the pensioners that might apply this year. It was not probable that all would apply—but they ought to be provided for. The surplus now remaining arose from many pensioners having failed to apply for their pensions. On a former occasion, in consequence of making the fund remaining from a previous year a part of the appropriation for the invalid pensioners, it fell short upwards of 100,000 dollars, which Congress had afterwards to make up. He was, therefore, averse to diminishing this appropriation. It was worth while to know how these unexpended balances were created. The pensions might remain uncalled for from various reasons. The pensioners might be sick at home, or it might be difficult to send for it. The moment they were able, they would empower some agent to receive it; and Congress ought to be provided against such application. If the appropriation was not made, the Committee would have done their duty, and the responsibility would rest upon the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON expressed himself satisfied with the letter read by the Secretary. Rather than that one of these veterans should suffer in any way, he should vote for the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that there seemed to be a want of information on this subject. The Clerk of the Pension Office reported that a larger sum than had been proposed was wanted. It was, he thought, better, therefore, to get further information from the head of the Department; and he would move to lay the bill on the table; but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. BRANCH, who made a few remarks.

Mr. COBB said, he believed the Chairman of the Committee on Finance was about to give more than the Department asked for. The Secretary said, that but 800,000 dollars was wanted, and it seemed that there was now an unexpended balance. Why should Congress give more than was needed? He was willing to vote for filling the blank with 800,000 dollars, and that appeared by the documents to be enough.

Mr. BRANCH moved to fill the blank with 800,000 dollars.

Mr. PARRIS hoped the question would be divided. He did not wish to touch the unexpended balance, but allow it to go, when the period arrived, to the surplus fund. He did not wish Congress to touch what they had no right to.

Mr. McLANE rose to make one remark. He understood the gentleman from Maine [Mr. CHANDLER] to say, that the answer to the letter of the Committee had been received from the Clerk of the Pension Office, and not from the Head of the Department, who was applied to. Mr. McL. would state to the gentleman, that these estimates were not made out by the Secretary of the Treasury, but by the Heads of the several Bureaus, by whom they are transmitted to the Secretary. He made this explanation, merely to show that the information had been received through the proper channel, and that no censure could be cast on the Head of the Department.

Mr. CHANDLER did not suppose that any neglect was complained of. He only went on the ground that, if information was wanted, they had better apply for it to the Head of the Department. He did not intend to impute censure to any one.

Mr. KING thought there was some error in this matter; and if it was referred to the proper Department, that error would be corrected. He supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury had no more to do with the estimate than any other officer. He, as the Head of the Department, transmitted the estimates made out by the Clerks of the different bureaux. Mr. K. thought the application ought to have been made to the War Department, under which the Pension Office was placed. It appeared to him that, until the Secretary of War had an opportunity of revising the appropriation, it would be improper to act upon it. At the same time, he could not but express his opinion that the appropriation was not by any means inadequate. Under these views of the subject, he moved to lay the bill on the table; which was agreed to.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The unfinished business of yesterday having been resumed, the bill to complete the Cumberland Road from Bridgeport to Zanesville, in Ohio, and to provide for the survey of the same from Zanesville to the Seat of Government of Missouri, was taken up.

Mr. EATON had very few remarks to make. He considered that many gentlemen had argued erroneously upon this subject, because they had predicated their remarks on wrong facts and data. In addressing the Senate, he should depend on facts alone. Whatever the opinions of gentlemen might be on the abstract question of the constitutional power of Congress, this was not a case in which that question could be legitimately agitated. The bill now before the Senate proposed nothing more than the fulfilment of a contract on the part of the United States, entered into many years since, the early stages of which had gone on uninterruptedly. The mists of constitutional scruples had been newly raised, and thrown around this object at a time when they could be least expected. He should say nothing on this head, because, in his opinion, it had nothing to do with the original compact by which the United States agreed to complete this work. He intended to show what that original compact was, and that it was a mistake, in which some of the friends of the measure partook, that the two per cent. fund, so often mentioned, had anything to do with the agreement between the contracting parties. As far back as 1802, the plan was commenced, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, than whom no man was more scrupulously regardful of the exact letter and meaning of the Constitution: for, said Mr. E. although I would not bow down in humble admiration of any man whose talents and virtues do not entitle him to the high character of a patriot and statesman, yet it is no humiliation to look up with reverence to the name of Jefferson. In the year 1802, Ohio was admitted into the Union; and in the act which sanctioned her admission, it was provided, that "one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying in said State, sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the sale, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the roads shall pass."

Thus it will be seen, that the law agreed that Congress should make roads to and through the State. If the words were not clear, the question might be made to rest on the subsequent acts of Congress, in which the same provisions were made in favor of Indiana, Missouri, and Illinois. But there they stood in the law, utterly unquestionable as to their purport and bearing. Of what benefit to Ohio, he would ask, was the completion of the Cumberland Road through Maryland and Pennsylvania to the borders of the Ohio? That did not fulfil the stipulation that it should pass through Ohio, which had been agreed upon. And what did she stipulate—what did she give as an equivalent? She stipulated that she would not, in consideration of this promised extension of roads to and through her territory, exercise her sovereign power to tax the domain of the United States lying within her borders.

And now (said Mr. E.) let us look at the extent of the public domain in the State of Ohio, at that time; and I think it will appear that the fund to be applied by Congress to public works far exceeds the expenditure. He would state a few facts in support of this position. From the year 1802 to 1815, six millions of acres had been surveyed, and, supposing that half that amount has been surveyed since, and the whole to have been sold at the Government price, here is a fund of nearly twenty millions of dollars. Here, then, is a contract in which the United States are bound to do one thing, and the State to do another. The State performs its portion of the agreement, and the United States is bound to apply five per centum on these sales. This fund would amount, on sales of twenty millions, to one million. Therefore, the statement that the fund had been overdrawn already, was certainly not correct. Subsequently to the act of 1802, the direct action of the Senate had been had in favor of extending the Cumberland Road still farther west. We find nothing more upon the subject until 1806, when Congress again took up the subject. They did not then subscribe to the principle that Congress was authorized to make a road without the consent of the States. But it was admitted that, if that consent was obtained, it was a constitutional exercise of power for Congress to authorize and complete the work. And this principle was sanctioned by Mr. Jefferson, in consenting to the passage of the bill. [Mr. E. now here read a passage from a report made at that period.] The President was there authorized to ascertain whether the States in question were willing to acquiesce in this exercise of power. That having been ascertained, Congress went on to make appropriations for the work. Therefore, Mr. E. considered that no violation of the Constitution has ever taken place in the laws passed by Congress for the continuance of the Cumberland Road. If Congress had a right to admit new States into the Union, and also the right to subject those new States to any conditions not hostile to their Republican character, then this compact was a valid one, and the faith of the Government was solemnly pledged to advance in the plan which they had commenced.

When Virginia ceded her western territory to the United States, she ceded the right of sovereignty and proprietorship. Afterwards, when Ohio knocked at the door, Congress was in possession of the power to make any stipulations and conditions that they might think necessary. They then said to Ohio, "Forbear to tax the public lands, and we assure you that a substantial road shall be made, joining the waters of the West with the ocean."

Is there any gentleman present, [said Mr. E.] who will not grant that it was a great consideration to unite the two extreme portions of this country by a substantial means of friendly and commercial intercourse? The Western States were then important, and are fast becoming vastly powerful and wealthy, and claiming their full share of attention from the General Government; and was it not a strong measure of expediency to seek out and carry into effect a plan for drawing their interests closely to the Atlantic States?

The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. MACON,] has said, that it is vain to legislate on the affections of the People, and that a stronger influence must be exerted to draw them together. But, [said Mr. E.] to my mind, there can be no stronger bond of union than that which arises out of a community of interests. This is produced by a free exchange of products, and a continual course of business transactions carried on between the inhabitants of the different sections; and such measures, Mr. E. believed, must be adopted, to make the citizens of this extended continent one People. A perseverance in such a policy would soon do away all fears of discord and disunion.

There was another point of view in which every friend of his country would look upon this work. We are now no more secure against the occurrence of a war than at any former period of our political existence. Should it come again, the safety of the country must, in a degree, depend upon the West. He did not say this, because he thought the Western People were better soldiers or more patriotic than those of the East. But we of the West have no frontier that is assailable to a foreign enemy; and while the soldiers of the Atlantic States will be called from point to point to defend the coast from the attack of an enemy's fleets, the soldiers of the West will form a strong reserve to aid in all emergencies: for they are always ready. I do not say this, proceeded Mr. E. with the positive prediction that they will be wanted—but they may be—and your reliance on them may be most confidential. Then, I ask, will it not be of vital importance to have the means of rapid and easy communication between the West and the East? Will it not be essential to have the means of bringing together the whole physical energies of the country? and should we not, then, justly blame any previous neglect that should have thrown obstacles in the way of such an important concentration?

Let us suppose, for instance, that New-Orleans were again threatened; would she not look again to the soldiers of the West for defence? Yes, sir, and she would not look in vain. Once the Western riflemen have already beaten back her assailants; and they are ready to do it again. The drafts must be exorbitant indeed, that shall absorb the courage and intrepidity of our forest soldiers.

Wise statesmen will look forward to changes and emergencies. We may think that we can take care of ourselves; but the time may come when we shall need assistance. Against such a juncture it is our duty to provide. In peace to prepare for war, is an American maxim, which experience has shewn us cannot be to often repeated or too closely followed.

But said Mr. E., this road is important in a fiscal point of view. The reduction of the price of conveyance of the mail had been correctly stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ROSSLES.] It was also of great importance as to individual expense, and the facility it gave to our internal commerce. He recollected the time when goods carried from Philadelphia to Ohio cost ten dollars per hundred weight. It was now reduced to reasonable charges. Cannot gentlemen see that this fact is of great importance in a commercial relation? as, in proportion to the facility of carriage, the amount of transportation would increase. Commerce, exterior and internal, was extended by such means.

This work, then, is a great national object. You made a contract with the State of Ohio, which you are bound to fulfil, and which, also, if my arguments have not failed, you are deeply interested in carrying into effect. The advantages which she would have derived from the receipt of the taxes on the public domain, would have been far greater than those she will reap from the road: for she could have employed it better than it has been employed. The road now wants repair. That it must be made no one doubts; yet it has often been proposed in vain. Indeed, in every instance where this road has been discussed we of the West have fought for it inch by inch. In other States 2 per cent. has been devoted to roads and Canals, and 3 per cent. has been taken by the States. But in Ohio the whole amount has been paid to the Government, so that she is under no obligation to the United States—which constitutes for her a very strong claim to share in the advantages to be derived from this road, and strengthens the equitable title which she derives from the compact entered into when she became a sovereign and independent State.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that he had yesterday asked how much had been received, and how much expended from the fund to be applied from the sales of public lands on the Cumberland road. The gentleman from Tennessee supposed that nine millions of acres had been sold, which would produce one million of dollars to be appropriated to the making of the road. Well, ~~or~~ we have already expended upwards of 1,800,000 dollars. And I ask, said Mr. C., whether we have not done our share of the contract? and whether we are to go on after the 5 per cent. fund is expended? if so he should vote against the bill. If he understood the gentleman from Ohio yesterday, it was true that some expenditure had been made beyond the amount of proceeds from the sales of Public Lands; but that there ought to be a little surplus left to repair the road. For his part Mr. C. did not see how Congress was bound to make the repairs to the road. He thought they ought to go no farther; and he therefore moved to strike out the appropriation of $180,000, and insert $80,000. This he believed would be enough to complete the road as far it yet had gone—and if it were not stopped here when it had been carried through Ohio, there were other Western States who would also look to having it carried through their territory. If this was to be the case, he was willing that Congress should make it as well as it could be made with the five per cent.—and no better.

Mr. EATON observed, that if the gentleman from Maine would look at the report upon the subject, he would find that contracts had been made for the completion of the Road to Zanesville, about 30 miles from Bridgewater; and if he succeeded in striking off one hundred thousand dollars from the appropriation, only sufficient would be given to finish 13 miles; and all that had been done on the remaining portion would have been entirely thrown away.

Mr. CHANDLER then withdrew his motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that when he addressed the Senate yesterday, he had been anxious to avoid discussion, or entering into a consideration of the Constitutional powers of Congress. He should chiefly confine himself, at this time, to replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, in relation to the 3 per. cent fund. It must be known to every gentleman in the Senate, that the constitutional power has been settled by every Congress for upwards of twenty years. He did not, therefore, consider it necessary to touch that portion of the argument.

He had said yesterday, that Congress had agreed to make the road from Bridgeport to Zanesville; and, in pursuance of that agreement, that the contractors had gone on in the progressive stages of the work, so that, at this time, 21 miles of the road were in an unfinished condition. If the motion of the gentleman from Maine had prevailed, it would have destroyed the project for this year at least—because 80,000 dollars would have done comparatively no good.

The discussion of this subject yesterday took a wide range, embracing the Constitutionality of the measure. He had no disposition to follow the example, or now to answer the arguments of gentlemen who opposed the bill; but should call on them to sustain their positions in a future debate. The gentleman from Maine did not, however, participate in these objections. He seemed desirous of obtaining information in relation to what he called the "two per cent fund." This information, said Mr. H. I will endeavour to give him. The gentleman from Tennessee did not notice the fact of a law subsequent to the compacts with some of the Western States, which divided the five per cent. and applied three per. cent. to the construction of roads within the State, and two per cent. to the making of a main road by the United States, through the State. Whether the sum arising from the two per cent. would, in the end, defray the expense of the road or not, he could not say. Thus far, probably it had not. But the country through which the road had already passed was the most difficult section of the whole. Farther West the soil was better adapted to the work, and it could be done cheaper. The grand question is, whether this was a great national work, in which the whole Union was interested. If this was the case then it ought to be progressed in. And the compacts had, as far as compacts could do it, established the right of the United States to make roads through the States.

I hope, said Mr. H. to be allowed to appeal to the gentleman from Virginia, who favored the Senate yesterday with his ideas relative to internal improvements, the tariff, &c. I would ask him what he would do with the powers of the Constitution—for it is scarcely to be supposed that they were given for no purpose—and if Congress has not the power to make a road or a canal, it has no right to exercise those constitutional powers at all. But this was going farther into the constitutional question than he had intended. To revert again to the two per cent. there was no doubt that in Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri, it would exceed the expenditure upon the road. It was not to be supposed that it would be applied beyond the limits of the States in which it was collected. For instance, the fund raised in Maine would not be applied to a road leading to the West. And here he would make another explanation. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Cobb] had also made some inquiries as to the manner in which the estimates made before the work commenced had tallied with the expenditure. The estimates made by Mr. Shriver were remarkably correct. But in some instances, the difficulties of the route, the hilly nature of the country, and other obstacles, had caused the expenditure to exceed the estimates. He made this declaration frankly, because he did not wish that a measure based on just principles, should reap advantage by concealment. The tract of country through which the road was now progressing, was the worst through which it would pass. It was a broken, hilly country, resembling the mountainous districts of Pennsylvania and Maryland. But the plains of the States beyond the Ohio, to Mississippi, were far less difficult, and would call for small appropriations.

The gentleman from Georgia says, also, that the road wants repairs, and asks why its advocates do not propose a measure for the erection of toll gates upon it. But, sir, are we responsible for the condition of the road? Have we not endeavoured, for years, but in vain, to fix upon it toll gates, to provide, in this way, for its regular and permanent repair? And has not the opposition to this measure universally come from those very same gentlemen who oppose the appropriations to carry on the work? There is, said Mr. H. a bill now before Congress, the object of which is to provide for the erection of toll gates, and we shall see, when it is taken up, whether the gentleman from Georgia will go with us in its favor.

In conclusion, Mr. H. remarked, that the Cumberland road, was a stupendous work, which could never have been completed by the efforts of the several States. It peculiarly required the direction of the General Government, for it could no more be expected of the States, that they should construct roads for the national welfare, than that they should build ships of war or erect fortifications. Pennsylvania never would have been induced to make this road. She would rather have turned her attention and resources to local improvements; and so it would have been with every other State. In every point of view, the road was of great importance. It had already saved the country near half a million, and had, by the encouragement given by it to agriculture, increased the wealth of the country to an amount far greater than the sums that had been expended in its construction.

Mr. COBB said, that he believed it had been admitted yesterday that the expenditures had overgone the estimates, and that sufficient had not been granted. I asked, said Mr. C., why gentlemen did not go the whole, and, if they could make the road, why they did not also erect toll gates? The gentleman from Indiana replies to me, and says that a bill for that purpose is now before the Committee on Roads and Canals. He also calls on me to say whether I will support the bill.

Why, said Mr. C., I told the gentleman yesterday that I would not. I said, then, that I was entirely opposed to the system on constitutional scruples; and I now inform the gentleman that he will find in me a steady opponent, whether to measures for the construction of the road, or measures for its repair.

Mr. HENDRICKS said a few words in reply.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, was unfortunately opposed to appropriations for this road, and not only this, but to appropriations by Congress for all roads, not excepting military roads, the constitutionality of which he doubted. The gentleman from Indiana says that we have repeatedly settled the question; and that it need no longer be agitated. But I think not. It is true that Congress has appropriated for these objects from year to year, under one pretext or another; but I never supposed it was designed that we should continue, from year's end to year's end, to give large sums for these objects. 180,000 dollars was given towards this road; and 30,000 dollars for surveys. I know that the road is very convenient for people coming from the West, and do not doubt its great advantages to the States through which it runs. But my principle is, let every State make its own roads; and, if they reap advantages, let it be from their own industry and perseverance. This would be far more consistent and creditable than to ask, from session to session, appropriations of money from Congress.

It is a little curious, said Mr. S., to observe the grounds upon which these repeated demands are supported. The friends of the road tell us, with very grave aspect, that we have made the road so far, and now it would be unjust not to make it a little farther. They argue as if our having gone thus far entailed upon us the obligation of still proceeding ad infinitum. Their reasoning seems to be, that, having put "our hands to the plough," we must, on no consideration, look back, but that the whole Western country must be intersected by this road at the expense of the whole country. It is true that two per cent. was granted towards making a road of this description: but I ask if there is any thing in the compact with these States which stipulates that the road shall be 80 feet wide, or that it shall cost 14,000 dollars per mile?

The gentleman from Tennessee said, in the course of his remarks, that, in a body like the Senate, he should depend upon facts. That is just what I have always endeavored to do. Well, sir, it is said that the two per cent. will pay for the completion of the road. I ask, will it be possible that it can defray the expense to which the Government has already gone? Will it pay 14,000 dollars per mile, and 636 dollars per mile as salary to the superintendent? I believe not. I believe that, at the time the road was first projected, had it been proposed to pay 636 dollars per mile to the superintendent, it would have prevented its construction. I know not what the superintendent does, or what he has done, but I know that the pay appears to me enormous. Of all public objects, perhaps none are more efficient in promoting the expenditure of public money than such a work as this. And that seems to be its principal recommendation.

It is said, in the report of the superintendent, Mr. Caspar W. Wever, that it is a very bad policy to build roads and let them go to decay. And he goes on to state that that great monument of the munificence of the Government—the Cumberland Road—had nearly gone to decay. The appropriation of money, he says, has been made, but little good has been effected in making repairs. I should like to know whether the money appropriated has ever been applied effectually. I should think not; for every year we have applications for the repair or the improvement of this road.

Such are the declarations of your engineer. He tells you that your great and splendid road is in ruins. Look at the papers on your table, and any one will easily be convinced that a quick decay has come upon this road before the plans of its advocates are half completed. Different methods have been recommended to keep it in repair. It has been recommended to build it with stone, and cover it with gravel; but all will not do. It is swept away by the torrent. And it is now proposed to cover it with iron. Gentlemen smile; but it is so. [Mr. RIVES said not iron but metal.] Well, sir, I will look at the report. It is there recommended that the road be graded at an angle of five degrees, and covered with metal of a good quality. It is true, it is not explained what kind of metal this is to be. But, if I understand the English language, it may be gold or silver, as it is pretty clear it cannot allude to lead.

[Some one here remarked, that, by the word "metal," was meant "limestone."]

Mr. SMITH. This is the first time I ever heard that limestone was a metal. However, it may be so in the Western country. The new projects of the engineers were continually occupying the attention of Congress. These engineers are also taking a large proportion of the money of the United States (whether metal or not.) Upwards of sixty of these gentlemen are now in employment. And any Senator who will look at the documents on his table, will be convinced that it is money thrown away. And we still go on, laying stone upon stone, and heaping metal upon metal, as I sincerely believe to no practical effect beyond the distribution of the public money to men who want it.

I am not disposed to deprive the People of the West of any of their rights, or interfere in their convenience. More especially would I avoid interfering in the peculiar public benefit to which the gentleman from Ohio so gallantly alluded in the debate of yesterday. He said that alliances were formed by means of the convenience afforded by the Cumberland Road, between the young people of the different sections of the country; and that it was the happy instrument in causing many happy marriages. But, I would ask, if we are to pay so dear for these alliances? Poets have sung to us that bolts and bars cannot confine true love—and yet, forsooth, our modern lovers must have a smooth road paved with "metal of a good quality," to bring them together. This was a cold and phlegmatic kind of love, and he believed no lady would consent to give her vote for it.

I believe that the road has been as injurious as it has been expensive. But gentlemen also tell us that it is a war road. I hope not. I hope that, although we do not show much love towards each other, we shall not go to war. I have heard of no alarming enmity existing between the East and the West. Yet you have been expending the money of the Government on a war measure. Sir, we suffered sufficiently during the last war; and yet you are no sooner comfortably settled in the enjoyment of peace, than you prepare for war at a great expense. This is a principle which is continually cried up in this country, but I do not agree to it.

But, again: it is said that the making of this road was guarantied by a compact between the United States and the Western States; and the gentleman from Tennessee has read us the act. Well, sir, admitting this is the law; if its operation is injurious or inexpedient, why is it a solemn compact more than any other law? and why may it not be repealed if it is an improper law? In relation to Ohio, it seems that the compact is already fulfilled. The road has not only gone through the State, but surveys have been made as far as the State of Indiana. I recollect, also, that, having authorized a survey, it was completed, but not happening to hit the seat of Government of Indiana or Missouri, (I have forgotten which,) it was abolished, and a new survey ordered. If there was a compact by which Congress was obliged to make a road to and through the State of Ohio, I do not mean to go farther, so far as depends upon me. Nor do I believe that the continuance of this road into Missouri, Indiana, or Illinois, is incumbent on Congress, or is authorized by the Constitution. I said I would not touch on this Constitutional question; nor need I to do so. There is yet another point of defence, in which the friends of the bill flatter themselves they are well sustained. It is, that this road is made under the power given by the Constitution to regulate commerce. Some of the gentlemen seem to go entirely upon this supposition. If this argument be admitted, where will the system stop? Will it not branch off to the Northwest Territory, or go to Santa Fe? In either case, it could be doubly defended by its friends, as a war road and a commercial road. How fallacious, however, is the policy, if we take it on the former ground, of opening a road of eighty feet in width into an enemy's country: for, if it is a war road, I presume we are going to fight Mexico. But, I ask, are they a warlike people? are we not in profound peace with them at the present time? To these questions I presume it will be answered, that we are not in hostility with Mexico, but that the road is to be a commercial one. And so we see that, whether one way or another, the friends of the road have always a ready defence. We are to have a road eighty feet in width from Cumberland to Santa Fe, built of stone and paved with metal; that part, I presume, nearest the Mexican frontier, with gold from the mines of Mexico. And then, sir, do you suppose these gentlemen are going to be satisfied? Not at all. New projects will start up, and new attentions be seized upon, to keep up the flow of money from your Treasury into the pockets of engineers, contractors, &c. But, suppose that, at some future period, the work should stop; then Congress must turn about and expend twenty millions to repair what they have already done.

On every consideration that has presented itself to me, I am opposed to this system of expense. Are the Representatives of the People willing to pay, in the time of peace, a subsidy for the purposes of war? A subsidy for the encouragement of commerce, or a subsidy for the establishment of post roads? I believe they are not. These sentiments I have offered to the Senate as the ground upon which I opposed the bill.

Mr. NOBLE said he would bear testimony to the humor with which the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina had been characterized; although, at the same time, he must differ from him in point of fact, and in many of the arguments upon which his witticisms had been founded. He did not know what kind of love it was with which the gentleman from South Carolina would look upon the people of the Western States. Love, he had always understood, regarded the happiness of its object; and he did not know how the gentleman could suppose that the people of the West could be happy, or even comfortable, without roads. But, if the gentleman had any desire to promote that love which teaches to do justice to our fellow citizens, he thought his course upon this bill would have been a different one. I have read somewhere, said Mr. N., that all poets were fools, but that all fools were not poets; and I begin to believe it is true. If we speak of poetical affairs, please to allow me to have my own ideas. I believe poetry and novels to be the most injurious things in the world. If the gentleman from South Carolina wishes to increase that love which would induce us to give to each other whatever rights we are entitled to, he would see this measure in a very different light. If you will do away the designs of the sage of Monticello, then you will strike at the root of that love and fellow feeling upon which the prosperity of this country depends. It was under the auspices of that great man, the father of Virginia—although the gentleman from Virginia, who spoke yesterday, says that he had rather wade in the mud than make good roads to travel upon—that this great work was first set a-going. He was no violator of the Constitution, and understood its construction probably as well as men of the present day.

Now, sir, by a compact with these Western States, Congress is bound to do this work. The Government cannot avoid it; its pledge has been given, and it must be done. Mr. Jefferson saw how those States were situated. He saw that there was no outlet towards the East to that country lying on the Western waters, and that, in case of a war, the two sections of country would not be in a situation to help each other. If Mr. Jefferson had not set on foot this plan, those rugged rocks which I clambered over when a youth, would have remained, and the face of the country would still have been darkened by those endless forests through which I used to follow the paths of the Indians; for we never should have settled that country—we could not have done it—if it had not been for this road. Now, sir, will any man pretend that Congress shall not agree to the compacts which it has made with those States? Does any man believe that such a compact was unconstitutional? If he does, I will refer him to the fourth article of the second section of the Constitution, where it is laid down that new States may be admitted into the Union, and that Congress may make rules to regulate their admission. Is there any thing clearer than that? While those States were yet territories, the United States had the sovereign power over them: but when they were admitted into the Union, sovereignty over their territory vested in them. And when you offered to make a road through those new States, what would have been the effect if we had refused to accede to the conditions? But what did we do? We agreed to the compact, sir. We gave you a consideration for the benefit you were to bestow upon us. We got nothing; nor do we want any thing gratuitously. No time is fixed for the fulfilment of this compact; and, consequently, the present time is the only proper one.

Will you, then, after making a compact, refuse to do what you promised to those States who have been struggling for years in the forest, extending your dominions, and guarding your frontiers against the depredations of the savages? Why did Congress originally make this agreement? I'll tell you why, sir. It was, that we might have all the communication with the commercial cities that our talent, our wealth, and our enterprise, entitled us to. Sir, you can't stop the progress of civilization. Do all you can, the Western world has got the start of you, and will defy illiberality to overtake it or stop its progress. You may make us wade in the mud, and swim our rivers and creeks, by refusing to aid us in making roads and canals; but it will not do. It is out of your power to keep down the enterprise of our citizens. I ask you to pass this bill, the principle of which was advocated by the Sage of Monticello, and defended in the councils of the country by Mr. Madison. I have also a resolution in my hand, offered by a gentleman who was late a member of this body, the honorable Mr. RANDOLPH, in the House of Representatives, on the 10th January, 1812, which I will read to the Senate.

SENATE.]

Cumberland Road.

[JAN. 23, 1828.]

Mr. N. then read the following :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ the regular Army of the United States, when not engaged in actual service, and when, in his judgment, the public interest will not thereby be injured, in the construction or repair of fortifications, roads, canals, or other works of public utility."

Whether the author of this resolution still adheres to his former opinions or not, said Mr. N., I do not pretend to say. And I would ask the Senate, if the statesmen of Virginia, of the present day, need be referred to as a standard of faith on this subject. I could also allude to the great report of Henry St. George Tucker, but I need go no farther. Every part of the country, at that time, seemed to think that the Western States had a right to this road. We are told now, however, that it is an unjust and unconstitutional project; that a great deal of money has been spent; that the road is good for nothing; that it is out of repair, and all this. The gentleman from Virginia has been particularly warm in his attack upon the constitutionality of the work. But, when we come to the idea that Virginia is the only safekeeper of the Constitution, let me tell the gentleman that the whole of the western part of the State of Virginia is in favor of it. I only ask you to assist those who were struggling in the forests during the last war, without roads and without assistance. I ask you to fulfil the compact you have deliberately entered into, that you may keep your faith and your consciences clear, and that the West may not have cause to complain of the injustice of the Government.

Mr. RIDGELY said, that the argument, in his opinion, had gone farther than the subject warranted. He thought, that, when the Senate considered coolly the objects of this bill, they could find no reasonable ground upon which to oppose it. He saw no reason why it had become a constitutional question. In support of this, he referred to the acts of admission of the Western States, and quoted that portion of the law by which the United States obligated itself to give up a twentieth part of the proceeds of the public lands for the purpose of making roads, with the consent of the States through which they were to pass. Another act was passed, in the year 1803, which provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should pay three per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to such person as was appointed by the Legislature of each State, to be applied, under their direction, to making roads within the States: and that the remaining two per cent. should be applied, under the direction of Congress, to making roads to and through the said States. Thus we ascertain what has been done with the five per cent. originally granted. Afterwards, a bill passed, during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, and which was approved by him, appropriating thirty thousand dollars for laying out a road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to some point on the Ohio river, in compliance with the compact. Another section of that law authorized the President to obtain the consent of the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland to the passing the road through their respective territories. This law provided that the sum appropriated should be paid out of the two per cent. fund; and, if that were not enough, out of other moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated. This was done: and thus, by repeated laws of the same nature, the road has been made to the State of Ohio. Then came the State of Indiana; and I will ask gentlemen to look at the law admitting her into the Union. It will be found that the same provision is made as in the case of Ohio. Five per cent. is granted for the purpose of making roads to and through the State; and the same compact, it will be found, has been acceded to by the other States subsequently admitted into the Union. What, then, is the object of the bill now before the Senate? It is not, solely, to complete the road through the State of Ohio, but gradually to progress with the surveys, and lay out the road, in compliance with the compact with Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. How can there be any objection to complying with these terms? How can gentlemen reconcile a failure, on the part of the United States, to justice or to public faith? The compacts were entered into with those States while they were yet Territories: they were submitted to the Territorial Conventions, and were agreed to. It was no hasty piece of work; it was done deliberately, and repeated to each State, so as to show that the policy of the measure was deemed worthy of being followed up from year to year. I ask, then, what objection can we offer to the fulfilment of these agreements? I ask more—if the faith of the United States is not pledged? I do not know but the two per cent. on the lands sold has been expended; but, at any rate, that fund is to be applied by Congress. The bill first passed was to locate a road from Cumberland to Wheeling. The bill now before us has nothing to do with that. It is grounded upon the act of 1825, entitled "An act for continuing the Cumberland Road from the town of Canton, on the Ohio, opposite Wheeling, to the Muskingum, at Zanesville." In pursuance of the compact entered into on the admission into the Union of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, the bill of 1825 was framed. The second section provides for the appointment of a commissioner, and the third for the appointment of an impartial person, who shall, together, complete the examination and surveys to the Seat of Government of the State of Missouri. Subsequently to that act, an act of the 28th March, 1826, appropriated one hundred and fifty thousand dollars towards the work, and last year another act appropriating one hundred and thirty thousand was passed. The several appropriations to this part of the work amounted to four hundred and thirty thousand dollars. This might look like a large sum of money. We will admit that fact. But it is to comply with a contract in which the Government have entered, and he doubted not, that, even were it not so, it would be more than paid for by its beneficial effects upon the country at large. And, let me ask, said Mr. R., if, by these roads through the unsettled parts of the country, the United States does not greatly enhance the value of its public domain? The very road itself has such an effect. The work has been progressing beyond the Ohio river for four years, and he neither considered it just or proper to break off from a work that had been progressed in thus far, and the obstructions to which had been mostly removed. The first section of the road, between the Ohio and Zanesville, might be considered as finished. On the second section it was but partially made; and he thought that, if the road was to be stopped at all, it should not be done until that portion of it upon which money had been expended, should be completed. He thought the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had misquoted and misunderstood the letter of the Superintendent of the road, Mr. Wever. [Mr. R. then read some passages of Mr. Wever's letter, in order to support the opinion which he had just expressed.] It was to be supposed that Mr. Wever understood his subject; and he estimated the cost of the completion of the road to Zanesville, at one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. The bill appropriated the sum of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, in order to enable the engineers to go on with the surveys beyond the Muskingum river. And now, sir, said Mr. R., after the United States, considering themselves bound by the contract with the Western States, have done so much towards this great work, I will ask if they are to close their hands, and, to a certain extent, render useless all that they have already done? I hope not: I hope the work will progress. I own not a foot of ground in any of these States, and reside in a different quarter. I look upon the laws passed on the admission of those States into the Union, as comprising a pledge on the part of the United States which, by withdrawing the work, at present would be violated in a most unjustifiable manner.

Mr. HARRISON said, he had intended to reply to his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. SKIPEE,] but it had been so ably done by the Senator from Delaware, that he would not at that late hour trespass upon the Senate, further than to ask the yeas and nays on the question of engrossing the bill.

The call being sustained, the question was taken, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, McKinley, McLane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas—25.

Mr. MACON then rose, and offered the following resolution, remarking that it was his object to give up the road to the several States through which it had been constructed; and also to give up all the product of the two per cent. as well as the money that had been advanced, so as to get rid of the disputes which annually occupied Congress on this subject:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the States through which the Cumberland Road passes to the Ohio river, whatever claim, if any, the United States may have to the same; and that the said committee also inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the States concerned, the claim of the United States to the whole of the five per cent. reserved from the sale of the public lands in the United States.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, 1828.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MACON, authorizing an inquiry into the expediency of relinquishing the Cumberland Road to the States through which it passes, was taken up.

Mr. CHANDLER suggested to the gentleman from North Carolina, whether it would not be better to amend the resolution, so as to provide for the giving up of the contract on the part of the States, should Congress relinquish the Road?

Mr. MACON said, that his object, in offering the resolution, was to cover the whole ground, and allow the Committee to decide upon the details. His design was to get rid of the whole subject, and the debates that so frequently occurred upon it. The inquiry of the Committee would be directed to the manner in which this would be done.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that he rose merely to remark that the Western States would hardly be averse to doing away, unconditionally, the compacts, because their interest would be greatly promoted by it. Without saying a word on the subject of the five per cent. or the two per cent. of which so much had been said, the compacts which this resolution proposed to modify, were the only impediment in the way of the right of soil, and of taxation by the States, in reference to the public lands within their limits. There was an inquiry, however, suggested to his mind, which he would offer to the mover of the resolution, and which might save the Judiciary Committee the trouble of its investigation. It was this: If the compacts made by Congress with the States are valid at all, can they be changed by Congress without the consent of the States? As a single member, regarding no other consideration than the interest of the State he represented, he might be in favor of relinquishing the compacts altogether; because, without the compacts, they would be entitled to the public lands; but the case presented was one in which he had no power to act. If the resolution had any object, it appeared to him that it was to dispense with the exercise of the power of Congress to make roads and canals, because such power was not found in the Constitution. But if the Constitution gave to Congress the right of making compacts with the several States, and of stipulating to expend two per cent. of the sales of public lands, in making roads and canals in the States, for the benefit of the new States, surely the constitutional power to make roads and canals cannot be denied. If such compacts could be made according to the provisions of the Constitution, how can it be argued that Congress has not the power to fulfil their conditions? As a member of one of the new States, he would not agree to any modification of these compacts; because he maintained that such modification could not be made without the consent of both of the contracting parties—the States and the Union. What, said Mr. H., is the whole case? You have engaged to make, for the new States, roads and canals, on condition that they will neither tax nor sell the public lands within their limits. The Senator from North Carolina, and others, say, We have undertaken to do what we have no constitutional power to do, and the resolution proposes to release Congress from that obligation, without releasing the States from their prohibitions against sale and taxation. If you wish to be released from your obligations in reference to the compacts, release the States also. Do the compacts entirely away. You either have no constitutional power to make the compacts, or you have power to fulfil them—have power to make roads and canals.

Mr. FOOT remarked that, if any thing could have convinced him of the propriety of agreeing to the resolution, it was what the gentleman from Indiana had just said. He was more and more convinced of the necessity of an inquiry into the whole subject, more particularly into the amount of the five per centum and the two per centum, devoted to this object. It was a matter of investigation and inquiry only, for the Committee, and the importance of the subject entitled it to that notice.

Mr. MACON said a few words, which the Reporter could not distinctly hear.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, he thought he could name a case in which the gentleman from Indiana gave his vote for a similar measure. He alluded to the bill allowing the State of Ohio to sell the sixteenth sections of land reserved for the benefit of schools. The same authority had also been given to the State of Alabama. Now here was an infraction of a compact; but he had heard of no complaint in regard to it. If Congress could break a contract in one instance, was it bound to adhere to it in another? He believed that no part of our compact with the new States ought to be more religiously observed, than that by which we granted the sixteenth sections of land to the use and benefit of schools. Yet Congress had passed a law giving the right to the States of selling them. On the compact now under consideration, he thought that gentlemen had packed a great deal more than it could bear. Was it not far more important, in the new States, to provide for education, than to make roads? Every body knew the necessity of roads; but education was of far greater importance. And so much so was it considered by the Government that the provision of land for that object had the effect, in a manner, to coerce them into a sufficient encouragement of schools. This provision had, however, been deserted in some of the States where the lands had been sold, and the proceeds converted into bank stock. These were instances where the compacts of Congress with the States had not been considered so difficult to break as gentlemen now seemed to think them.

Mr. HENDRICKS had not risen for the purpose of opposing the consideration of the resolution. It merely authorized inquiry, and to that he could have no objection. He had merely intended to answer the questions put by the gentleman from Maine, and to propound the question to the Senate, whether, if the compacts were constitutionally made, Congress could be wanting in constitutional power to fulfil them. The great difficulty seemed to be—and upon this the arguments of gentlemen against Internal Improvement seemed to be founded—that Congress had no right to make roads and canals. No one, however, attempted to deny that they had the power of making compacts. And he would remark again, that, if they had the constitutional power to enter into compacts for the construction of roads and canals, they, as a natural consequence, had the constitutional power to make those roads and canals.

In what he had said, he did not wish to be understood as entering at all into the argument of constitutional power. That might be necessary on another occasion, but was not on this.

Mr. KANE said, that the argument on this question had extended, in his opinion, beyond any reasonable limit. He would briefly state what he thought was the true light in which this proposition appeared. The compacts between Congress and the States could be dispensed with and set aside only by the consent of Congress and the States assembled in convention. The conditions of the agreement had been acceded to in Territorial conventions, and an alteration could only be ordered in a similar meeting. One word to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH.] He supposed that the compact had been broken by authorizing the sale of the School Reserves in Ohio. But this was not the case. The subject was argued in this body; and it was argued that the interests of education would be advanced, if the State was allowed to sell the lands. How was the compact violated by this sale? The worth of the lands was not the less devoted to the objects of education. It was not supposed, when those reserves were made as a school-fund, that it was always to remain in the land, which was of but little value. The sixteenth sections were not always farmable, and it would have been useless to retain them, where they brought in no income. The only question was, at the time, whether this land-fund should be converted into a money-fund, and it was considered best that it should be so converted. Therefore no compact was violated; whereas the object of the reserve was more fully secured.

The resolution was then agreed to.

The report of the Judiciary Committee, adverse to a resolution relating to the erection of proper buildings for the United States' Courts, and for the preservation of the records, was considered: on which

Mr. PAIRIS observed, that, had he enjoyed an opportunity of communicating to the Committee his information on this subject, he thought they would have made a different decision, so far as related to one part of the subject—the preservation of the records. As to the erection of buildings for the use of the Courts, he did not know that it was absolutely necessary, but it surely was so to preserve the records. He had heard, but a short time since, of a fact in support of providing for the records, as, in one of the largest districts in the country, that of Massachusetts, the archives of the Court narrowly escaped destruction by fire. He therefore moved that the report lie on the table; which was agreed to.

The bill making appropriations for the completion of the Cumberland Road from Bridgeport to Zanesville, in Ohio, and to continue the survey of the same from Zanesville to the Capital of Missouri, was read a third time and passed.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The bill for the relief of the surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army was taken up, when Mr. WOODBURY moved to fill the blank with 1,100,000 dollars.

Mr. WOODBURY rose and said, it has become my duty, Sir, as Chairman of the Committee who reported this bill, to explain the origin and character of it. I regret that this duty has not devolved upon some able representative of the interests of the petitioners; but I regret it the less, as my colleagues on the Committee possess every quality of both the head and heart to advance those interests, and will, no doubt, hereafter, be seconded by an indulgent attention on the part of the Senate.

Who, then, Sir, are the venerable men that knock at your door? and for what do they ask? They are not supplicants for mere favor or charity, though we all know that nothing but the proud spirit which helped to sustain them through the distresses of our revolution, has withheld most of them from reliance for daily bread on the alms provided by the present pension act. No, Sir; they come as petitioners for their rights. They come as the remnant of that gallant band, who enlisted your continental army; who disciplined its ranks; who planned its enterprises, and led the way to victory and independence. Confiding in the plighted faith of Congress, given in the form of a solemn compact, they adhered to your cause through evil report and good report, till the great drama closed; and they now ask only that the faith so plighted may be redeemed. Amid the wrecks from time and disease, during almost half a century, short of 250 now survive, out of 2480, who existed at the close of the war. Even this small number is falling fast around us, as the leaves of autumn; and this very morning a gentleman before me has communicated the information that another of the most faithful among them has just passed "that bourne whence no traveller returns." It behoves us, then, if we now conclude, in our prosperity and greatness, to extend relief, either from charity, gratitude, or justice, to do it quickly.

My great anxiety is, in the outset, to prevent any misapprehension of the true grounds on which the appropriation is founded. Throughout the whole inquiry, there is no disposition to censure the motives or policy of the old Congress. They adopted such measures as the exigencies and necessities of the times forced upon them; and now, when those exigencies have ceased, it is just, as well as generous, to give such relief as the nature of the case may demand.

A very great obstacle to the success of this measure heretofore has been a prevalent opinion, that these petitioners are seeking compensation merely for losses sustained, on the depreciation of continental money, and certificates received for their monthly wages; whereas, from their first memorial in A. D. 1810, to the present session, they have invariably rested on the non-performance, by Congress, of a distinct and independent contract. All the losses on their monthly wages they bore in common, and are willing to forego in common with many in the walks of civil life, and with the brave soldiers under their command. This is the plain and decisive reason why none but officers are embraced in the present bill. The contract on which they rely, was made with the officers alone; and gallant and unfortunate as were the soldiers, the officers have endured, and will continue to endure, without repining, still severer sufferings from the worthless money and certificates received for their wages; because those losses were perhaps too large, and too general, in all departments of life, ever to warrant the expectation or practicability of complete remuneration.

I have said severer sufferings on this account by the officers, because the money received for wages before A. D. 1780, worth only one dollar in the hundred, was, to the officers, the only means to purchase camp equipage and clothing, that were furnished to the soldiers out of the public arsenals; and because the soldier often received besides liberal bounties, both at home and from Congress.

Let it then be distinctly understood, that, notwithstanding this disparity against the officers, no such losses or depreciations form any part of the foundation for this bill. A moment's attention to the history of that period will show the true ground of the appropriation. After this unequal pressure had continued nearly three years—after the officers had sustained their spirits during that trying period under such disadvantages, by the force of those principles that led them at first to join in the pledge to the cause, of “their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor,” after their private resources had become nearly exhausted in supplying these wants their country was unable rather than unwilling to satisfy, there arose a state of things which led to certain proceedings by Congress, in relation to half pay.

The prospect had nearly vanished, that any honorable accommodation could be effected with the parent country. The contest seemed likely to become more severe, and to be protracted for many years; and it was obvious that many of the officers, thus impoverished and disheartened, must actually resign in order to provide themselves with decent clothing, and to maintain their families, and secure any subsistence for advanced life, or that they must receive some assurance of future indemnity, if they continued in service, and abandoned every thing else to sink or swim with the military destinies of their country.

It was then that the resolve of May 15, 1778, granting half pay, for only seven years, to all who continued in service till the close of the war, was passed.

This short period of half pay was dictated rather by the wants of Congress to provide a longer one, than from an impression that it was, in truth, sufficient, or in accordance with any similar system in the armies of Europe. Hence, a committee, May 24th, 1779, reported a resolution, allowing half pay for life to the same class of officers, and justly grounded it on the great risks they were called to encounter, on their great sufferings and sacrifices of youth, ease, health, and fortune, in the cause of their country. But the want of resources in Congress induced them to postpone the subject, and, on the 17th of August, 1779, to urge upon the respective States the expediency of adopting such a resolution, and of pledging for its fulfilment their State resources. The power of the States over those resources was much more effective than that of the confederation over the States. But such were the general gloom and despondency of the times, that not a single State except Pennsylvania complied with the recommendation. The currency continued to depreciate more and more, daily: the officers, in many instances, were utterly unable, by their whole pay, to procure decent apparel: treason had penetrated the camp in the person of Arnold: Charleston had been surrendered: Lincoln captured: Gates defeated at Camden: the Southern States overrun by Cornwallis: our soldiery had become discouraged: and the great military leader of the Revolution had become convinced, and had urged with his usual energy upon Congress, that the adoption of this resolution was almost the only possible method of retaining the army together. Under such appalling circumstances, Congress passed, on the 24th of October, A. D. 1780, the resolution, which I will now take the liberty to read:

“Resolved, That the officers who shall continue in the service to the end of the war, shall also be entitled to half pay during life; to commence from the time of their reduction.” (1 U. S. Laws, 688.)

This, with one or two subsequent resolutions, explaining and modifying its provisions as to particular persons, constitutes the great foundation of the bill under consideration. The promise was most solemnly and deliberately made: the consideration for it was ample, and most honorably performed by the officers; and yet, on the part of Congress, its stipulations have, in my opinion, never, to this day, been equitably fulfilled. As to the binding effect of the compact on Congress, nobody can pretend to doubt. I shall, therefore, not waste a single moment in the discussion of that point. But I admit that the officers were first bound to perform the condition faithfully, of serving to the close of the war, however long or disastrous. Did they do it? History and tradition must convince all that, through defeat as well as victory, they clung to our fortunes to the uttermost moment of the struggle. They were actuated by a spirit and intelligence, the surest guarantees of such fidelity. Most of them had investigated, and well understood, the principles in dispute, and to defend them had flown to the field of battle, on the first alarm of war, with all the ardor of a Scottish gathering, at the summons of the fiery cross. And it is not poetry, that one of my own relatives, an officer long since no more, when the alarm was given at Lexington, left, for the tented field, the corpse of his father unburied:

“One look he cast upon the bier, Dashed from his eye the gathering tear,”

and hastened to devote his own life to the salvation of his country. In the same duty—in performing their part of the compact, to serve faithfully to the close of the war, these petitioners endured the frosts of winter, often half sheltered, badly fed, badly clothed, and badly paid. God forbid that I should exaggerate. The naked truth is stronger than any coloring of fancy. We have the authority of their commander, that they were, at times, in such a condition as to be unable and ashamed to receive their friends; but never, I believe, loth to face their enemies. Their paths were sometimes marked by their blood—their courage and constancy tried by frequent alarms, by ambuscade, and the pitched battle, but they never faltered: and when, towards the close of the war, neglect on the part of Congress, as to their monthly wages, might have justified, under most circumstances, disquiet and distrust; and when, at Newburg, they were tempted with the insidious taunt, that if, relinquishing their arms, and retiring home with the promises made to them unfulfilled, they would “go, starve, and be forgotten;” yet they disbanded in peace, and expressed their “unshaken confidence in the justice of Congress.”

Washington himself declared, in substance, that, by means of this resolve, the officers were inspired to make renewed exertions; to feel a security for themselves and families, which enabled them to devote every faculty to the common cause; and that thus was an army kept together, which otherwise must have dissolved, and we probably have been compelled to pass again under the yoke of colonial servitude.

For all this fidelity to the performance of their part of the compact, the officers have been duly thanked by many Congresses, and applauded by the world. They have occupied a conspicuous niche in toasts, odes, and orations, and some of them have animated the canvas, and breathed in marble.

But has the promise to them of half pay ever been either literally or substantially fulfilled? That, sir, is the important question. I answer not literally, by any pretence, from any quarter. No half pay, as such, has ever, for any length of time, been either paid or provided for one of the petitioners. Almost as little, sir, can there be a pretence that it has been substantially fulfilled. No kind of fulfilment has been attempted, except in the commutation act, passed March 23d, 1783.

That act grew out of objections, in some of the States, to the system of half pay as a system, because not strictly republican in theory, and because every thing of a pension character had become odious by its abuse in some Governments, in the maintenance of hirelings who had performed secret and disreputable services.

Some of the officers, being anxious to remove any formal objection, petitioned Congress for a commutation or change in the mode of indemnifying and rewarding them. No opposition had been made to the amount or value of the half pay, and, therefore, as appears in the commutation act itself, the officers expected, if a change took place, a full "equivalent" in value to the half pay for life.

[Mr. W. here read the act from 1 U. States' Laws, 687.]

But, instead of such an equivalent, Congress gave, by that act, what was far short of an equivalent, whether we regard the particular ages at that time of these petitioners, or their average age with the other officers, or the period they have actually since lived. Congress gave only five years' full pay to the youngest in the line, and just as much to the eldest; treating the officer of 25 as not likely to live any longer than him of 70; and subjecting the former to take for his half pay, which he was entitled to for his whole life, of probably 35 years, the same small sum bestowed on him not likely to live over 10 or 14 years.

If we look to the average age of all the officers at that time, the commutation was still inadequate. That age was probably not over 30; none have pretended to consider it over 35; and on all observations, in similar climates, and all calculations of annuity tables, such persons' lives would be likely to extend beyond 30 years; and thus their half pay for life be, on an average, worth the gross sum, in presentii, of at least seven years' full pay. Any gentleman can test the general accuracy of these results, by a reference to Price's Annuity Tables, and to Milne on Annuities. In England, Sweden, and France, it will be seen that a person of 30 years of age is ascertained to be likely to live 34 more; and of 35 years of age, to live about 28 more. An annuity for 34 years is worth a fraction more than 14 times its annual amount, if paid in a gross sum in advance; and one for 28 years, only a fraction less than 14 times its annual amount. So that seven years' full pay is as near a fair commutation for the half pay for life, taking their average ages, as can well be calculated, or as is necessary for the present inquiry.

Again: If we advert to the real facts, as since developed, these petitioners, had the commutation act not passed, or not been at all binding, would now receive twenty two instead of five years' full pay, as they have survived, since the close of the war, over 44 years.

Congress, as if conscious that the pressure of the times had driven them to propose a substitute for the half pay for life, not, in any view, sufficient or equivalent, as regarded the younger officers, who alone now survive and ask for redress, provided in the commutation act, not that each officer might accept or reject it at pleasure, but that it should take effect, if accepted within certain periods not exceeding six months, by majorities in the several lines of the army. The most influential officers in any line are of course the elder and superior ones. To these, as a general rule, five years' full pay was a fair equivalent; and by their exertions the commutation was accepted by majorities in most of the lines, and no provision ever afterwards made for such officers as were either absent or present, and dissenting.

No evidence can now be found, however, of any acceptance, even by majorities, in any of the lines, till after the expiration of the six months prescribed. But a report of the Secretary of War, dated Oct. 31, 1783, (8 Journals of Congress, 478,) enumerates certain lines and individuals, that had then signified their acceptance. It would be difficult, as might be expected, to find among the individuals named one who still survives. Those, then the youngest and now surviving, must have felt deeply the inequality proposed; and if most of them had not been absent on furlough, by a resolve of Congress, after peace was expected, probably even majorities in the lines would never have been obtained. The certificates were made out for all, without application, and left with the agents: no other provision was made for those entitled to half pay, and it remained with the younger officers to receive those certificates or nothing.

But it is most manifest that Congress had no legal right to take away from a single officer his vested half pay for life, without giving him a full equivalent; or, to say the least, what the officer should freely and distinctly assent to, as a full equivalent. It would be contrary to the elementary principles of legislation and jurisprudence; and a majority of the lines could no more bind the minority on this subject of private rights of property, than they could bind Congress or the States on questions of politics. This point need not be argued to men, who, like those around me, have watched the discussions and decisions in this country the last quarter of a century. But no such individual assent was asked here: it was indeed declared to be useless for any minority of individuals to dissent: the commutation not having been in any view a full equivalent, individual assent cannot fairly be presumed. The subsequent taking of the certificates was merely taking all that was provided, and all they could get, without any pretence that they took it as a full and fair equivalent. And hence it follows that, on the lowest computation, two years' more full pay are necessary to make any thing like a substantial fulfilment of the compact on the part of Congress. In truth, 20 years more would be less than the petitioners could rightfully claim now, if the commutation act had never passed; or if the position was clearly established that the commutation act, as to them, was, under the circumstances, entirely null and void. To say that such a transaction, resorted to under the pressure of the times, and finding no apology except in the security and necessities of that pressure, should not be relieved against when the pressure is over, and our means have become ample, is to make a mockery of justice, and to profane every principle of good faith.

But consider a little farther the history of those proceedings, on the supposition that the five years' full pay was an ample equivalent to all. Was it either paid or secured to them in such manner as to become any thing like a substantial fulfilment of the promise? Though the act allowed Congress to give the officers money or securities, and though these last might be in the form prescribed for other creditors, yet the act contemplated giving them money or money's worth, else it doubly violated the former engagement to give them half pay for life. The very nature of half pay, or of any commutation for it, implies that it should be actually paid, or so secured as to raise the money whenever it becomes due. They were here intended as means for immediate maintenance or business to those who, by peace, would be thrown out of their accustomed employment and support. This is too plain for further illustration; and, in conformity with these views, Congress forthwith effected a loan in Europe, and paid in money all the foreign officers entitled to the commutation. But how were the petitioners treated? They did not obtain a dollar in money, and even their certificates were not delivered till six or nine months after their right to half pay accrued; and when received, so far from being secured by pledges or requisitions rendering them valuable as money, the officers could not obtain for them in the market over one-fifth of their nominal amount. The receipts given for these certificates truly omitted to state that they were in full payment of either the commutation or the half pay. By such means, these petitioners, to supply the then existing wants of themselves and families, which was the legitimate object of both the half pay and its commutation, in fact realized only one instead of five years' full pay, or only two years' half pay instead of half pay for life.

[SENATE.]

If this was a substantial fulfilment of the promise to them, I think it would be difficult to define what would have been a defective, delusive, and unsubstantial fulfilment. But it has been suggested, that the petitioners might all have retained their certificates till afterwards funded, and in that event have escaped loss. Can gentlemen, however, forget that the very design of half pay was to furnish daily food and raiment, and not a fund to be deposited in bank for posterity? and that, though the use of a portion of it, if all had been paid at once, might have been postponed to a future period, yet their necessities utterly forbade most of them from not resorting, forthwith, to a single year's pay, which was the entire value of the whole certificate? It is another part of the distressing history of this case, that if, on the contrary, every officer had retained his certificate till funded, his loss on it would have been very near one-third of its amount. But on this point I shall not dwell, as its particulars are more recent and familiar. It will suffice to recall to your minds, that the provision made for the payment of these certificates in A. D. 1790, was not by money, nor virtually to their full amount, but by opening a loan, payable in those certificates, and a scrip of stock given for them on these terms: one third of the principal was to draw no interest whatever for ten years; and all the interest then due was to draw thereafter only three per cent. Without going into any calculations of the value of different kinds of stock, under different circumstances, it is obvious that such a payment or security was not worth so much, by nearly a third, as the money would have been worth, or as scrip would have been worth for the whole then due on six per cent. interest.

It is true that this loan was in form voluntary; but it is equally true that, as no other provision was made for payment, no alternative remained but to accept the terms. Hence, if the officer sold his certificate from necessity, he obtained only one-fifth of the amount therein promised; or, if he retained it, he obtained only about two-thirds of that amount.

What renders this circumstance still more striking, we ourselves have in this way saved, and reduced our national debt below what it would have been, many millions of dollars—from 13 to 15, I believe—and yet, now in our prosperity, hesitate to restore what was taken in part from these very men, and, when not from them, taken from others on account of their speculations on these very men, and their associates in arms. It was at the time of the finding thought just, and attempted by some of our ablest statesmen to provide some retribution to the original holders of certificates for the losses that had been sustained on them—to provide in some way a partial restoration. But the inherent difficulty of the subject, and the low state of our resources, prevented us from completing any such arrangement, though we were not prevented from saving to the Government, out of those very certificates, and similar ones, ten times the amount now proposed for these petitioners.

On this state of facts, then, I hold these conclusions. That what is honest, and moral, and honorable, between debtor and creditor in private life, is so in public life. That a creditor of the public should be treated with at least equal, if not greater kindness, than the creditor of an individual. That when the embarrassments of a debtor give rise to a mode of payment altogether inadequate to what is justly due, and this kind of payment is forced upon the creditor by the necessities of either party, the debtor ought, when relieved from his embarrassments or necessities, to make ample restitution. That it is the dictate of every moral and honorable feeling to supply the deficiency; and especially should the debtor do this where the inadequacy was more than four-fifths of the whole debt; where the debtor, by a part of the arrangement, saved millions to contribute to his present prosperity; and where the debt itself was, as in the present case, the price of blood lavished for the creditor, the wages of those sufferings and toils, which secured our present liberties, and fill the brightest page of glory in our country's history. The great military leader of the Revolution has given his sanction to this measure, in the strongest terms, when, calling to mind the lion hearts, and eagle eyes, that had surrounded and sustained him in all his arduous trials, and reflecting that they, not soldiers by profession, nor adventurers, but citizens, with tender ties of kindred and friendship, and with cheering prospects in civil life, had abandoned all to follow him, and to sink or swim with the sacred cause in which he had enlisted, he invoked towards them the justice of his country, and expressed the fullest confidence, that "a country rescued by their arms will never leave unpaid the debt of gratitude."

It is not to be forgotten, that a measure like this would remove a stain from our history. Its moral influence on our population, in future wars, for wars we must expect, again and again; its consonance with those religious as well as moral principles of perfect justice, which, in a Republic, are the anchor and salvation of all that is valuable; its freedom, I trust, from political prejudice and party feeling—all strengthen the other reasons for its speedy adoption.

Nor have the imputations against it, as a local measure, been at all well founded. What is right or just in regard to contracts, is right without regard to the residence of individuals, whether in the East, the West, or the South. But, independent of that consideration, these venerable worthies, though once much more numerous at the North than elsewhere, have since followed the enterprises of their children, and pushed their own broken fortunes to every section of the Union. It is impossible to obtain perfect accuracy as to their numbers and residence. But by correspondence and verbal inquiries, it is ascertained that 4 or 5 survive in New Hampshire, from 30 to 35 in Massachusetts and Maine, 5 or 6 in Rhode Island, 5 in Vermont, 16 in Connecticut, 20 in New York, 12 in New Jersey, 18 in Pennsylvania, 5 in Delaware, 12 in Maryland, 33 to 38 in Virginia and Kentucky, 10 to 12 in Ohio, 12 or 15 in the Carolinas, and 5 or 6 in Georgia. As, by the annuity tables, something like 250 ought now to be alive, the computations have been made on a medium of 230 between the number ascertained and the conjectural number.

The question, then, is of a general, public nature, and presents the single point, whether, in the late language of an eloquent statesman of New York, these veterans shall any longer remain "living monuments of the neglect of their country."

All the foreign officers, whose claims rested on the same resolve, were, as I have before stated, promptly paid in specie; and their illustrious leader, Lafayette, by whose side these petitioners faced equal toils and dangers, has been since loaded with both money and applause. Even the Tories, who deserted the American cause, and adhered to one so much less holy and pure, have been fully and faithfully rewarded by England: and it now remains with the Senate to decide, not whether the sum proposed shall be bestowed in mere charity, however charity may bless both him that gives and him that takes; nor in mere gratitude, however sensible the petitioners may be to the influence of either; but whether, let these considerations operate as they may, the officers should be remunerated for their losses, on those broad principles of eternal justice which are the cement of society, and which, without a wound to their delicacy and honest pride, will, in that event, prove the solace and staff of their declining years.

I shall detain the Senate no longer, except to offer a few remarks on the computations, on which the sum $1,100,000 is proposed as the proper one for filling the blank. Various estimates, on various hypotheses, are annexed to the report in this case; and others will doubtless occur to different gentlemen. But if any just one amounts to about the sum proposed, no captious objection will, I trust, be offered on account of any trifling difference. It is impossible, in such cases, to attain perfect accuracy; but the estimates are correct enough, probably, for the present purpose.

The Committee have proposed a sum in gross, rather than a half pay or annuity, because more appropriate to the circumstances of the case, and because more acceptable, for the reasons that originally gave rise to the commutation.

On the ground that these officers were, in 1783, justly entitled to two years' more full pay, as a fair equivalent for half pay during life; and there being 230 of them of the rank supposed in the report, their monthly pay would be about $30 each. This, for two years, would be $720 each; or $165,600 due to these petitioners at the close of the war, over and above what they then received certificates for. The interest on that, for 44 years, would be $437,184, which, added to the principal, make $602,784.

If to that be added what they lost on their certificates by depreciation, which, at four-fifths, was $331,200, and the sum, without any interest on the depreciation, amounts to $933,984, or, with interest, to more than a million and a half; or, if the depreciation be considered seven-eighths, as it really was, the sum would be still larger. On the other hand, if nothing be allowed for depreciation on the certificates, but one-third be considered as lost in funding, that one-third, in A. D. 1791, would be about $204,240, and interest since would swell it to $645,434, which, added to the two years' pay not received, and interest on that pay, makes the whole $1,248,218.

Another view of the case, which seems to me the most technical, and which steers clear of any difficulty about the loss either by depreciation or funding, will lead to about the same result as to the amount. It is this. On the ground that seven years' full pay was the smallest sum which, in A. D. 1783, could be deemed a fair equivalent for the half pay for life, then the petitioners got certificates for only five-sevenths of their half pay; or, in other words, five sevenths of their half pay was extinguished and paid. The other two-sevenths, then, has annually accrued since, and will continue to accrue while the petitioners survive. This two-sevenths being $51 42 per year to each officer, or $11,826 to these officers, would amount at this time to $520,344; and the interest accruing on it during only 35 years, would make it exceed the $1,100,000 proposed. The amount is fairly reached by this view of the case, without a single cent for either depreciation or loss in funding, and thus does not indirectly touch a single fact or principle upon which a similar allowance could be made to any body besides these officers. Gallant, and meritorious, and suffering, as were the soldiers, and none could be more so; worthy and affectionate as may have been the surviving widows; and distinguished as may have been many of the officers' heirs for filial and generous devotion to smooth their declining years; they all stand on their own cases and merits. None of them have been referred to the Committee who reported this bill; and they can all be provided for otherwise this session, or hereafter if thought proper. Let the present appropriation be tried first on its own grounds, and then by subsequent amendments of this bill, or by new bills, let an appropriation for other classes of persons be also tried on its own grounds. All I ask and entreat is, that if, either in strict law or in justice, whether grounded upon the original defective commutation, the depreciation of the certificates, or the loss in funding, any member is convinced that the sum proposed to these officers is a fair one, that he will first consider the case of the officers, and support this motion. If any think a different sum more proper, I hope they will propose that sum in due time, and thus let the sense of the Senate be fully expressed upon one case at a time, and upon the only case now duly before us. In this manner only can any thing ever be accomplished.

The amount of the sum now proposed cannot be objected to on the grounds that doubtless caused the losses and sufferings which we are now seeking to redress. The country, during the Revolution, and at its close, would hardly have been unwilling to bestow twice the amount, had its resources permitted. But now, such have been our rapid advances in wealth and greatness, by means of the rights and liberties the valor of these men contributed so largely to secure, that the very public land they defended, if not won, yields every year to our treasury more than the whole appropriation. One-twentieth of our present annual revenue exceeds it. A fraction of the cost of the public buildings; the expense of two or three ships of the line; one-tenth of what has been saved to our national debt in the funding system; a tax of ten cents per head on our population, only a single twelvemonth; either of them would remove all this reproach.

But, whatever might be the cost, I would say, in all practicable cases, be just, and fear not. Let no illiberal or evasive feeling blast the hopes of these venerable patriots. Much longer delay will do this as effectually as a hard hearted refusal; since the remains of them are almost daily going down to the city of silence. Either drive them then at once from your doors, with taunts, and in despair, or sanction the claim. So far as regards my single self, before I would another year endure the stigma of either injustice or ingratitude to men like these, I would vote to stop every species of splendid missions; I would cease to talk of Alleghany canals; I would let the capitol crumble to atoms for want of appropriations; and introduce retrenchment from the palace to the humblest doorkeeper.

It has formerly been said, that if these officers are relieved, so must be those of the late war. But, deserving as were these last, the cause in which they fought required much inferior sacrifices; they were not contending under the stigma of traitors, liable to the halter; they were liberally and promptly paid; and whatever small depreciation may have existed in the treasury notes taken for their monthly pay, it was infinitely less than the losses sustained by these petitioners on their monthly pay, and for which they neither ask nor expect relief.

One other consideration, and I will at this time trouble the Senate no longer. The long lapse of time since the claim originated has been objected formerly to its success. But what honest individual shelters himself under a statute of limitation, if conscious that his promise has not been substantially fulfilled? Under such circumstances, it is no defence, either in the court of conscience, or in a court of honor; and Congress have often shown their liberality in waiving it, where expressly provided to bar an application.

Here no express bar has ever been provided. Before their first application, the officers waited till A. D. 1810, when old age and infirmity rendered them more needy, and when many years of prosperity had rendered their country more able. However numerous, and technical, and evasive, may have been the objections since interposed, let it not be forgotten, that, in performing their portion of the compact, however neglected as to food or wages, they never were heard to plead excuses or evasions, however appalling the danger, whether roused by a midnight alarm, or invited to join a forlorn hope.

Like others, too, it may be imputed to them in derogation, that they were "military chieftains." But if, as such for a time, they did, like others, nobly help "to fill the measure of their country's glory," so, like others of that class, they have often distinguished themselves in forums, cabinets, and halls of legislation.

Whatever "honor and gratitude" they have yet received, is deeply engraven on their hearts; but they now also need—and they ask, only because they need—the additional rewards of substantial justice.

It remains, Sir, for us, whose rights they defended and saved, to say whether they shall longer ask that justice in vain.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that no man could have a higher respect than himself for the worthies of the Revolution; and if the soldiers, as well as the officers, were included in the provisions of the bill, he should probably vote for it. But he wished to make some inquiries. In the first place, it appeared, that these officers had been paid by the commutation, which they accepted, and by which they received five years' full pay. The Chairman of the Committee, however, says, that they did not accept these conditions, because it was decided upon by a vote, in which those opposed to it had no opportunity of refusing it. But I would inquire, whether the chairman has any means of ascertaining who voted for, and who against it. For, certainly, if an officer did vote for it, he ought to abide by his vote. And if he voted against it, and yet accepted it, he was equally bound to be content with it.

Mr. C. was adverse to any exclusive provision like the present. He thought the soldiers equally entitled to reward with the officers; and was of opinion that the former fared much harder than the latter. He was therefore against giving the officers in preference to the soldiers who fought by their side.

He would ask another question. He wanted to know why, if the officers now surviving had an equitable claim upon the Government, the widows and children of those who have died since the Revolution, had not an equal claim? And why, said Mr. C., if justice is to be done, should it not be general in its application? He did not believe justice required this bill; impartial justice, at any rate, would not be done by it. He knew the danger there was in saying any thing against Revolutionary claims. But he wished to be just before he was generous. He had seen enough of this kind of partial legislation, and desired that an end might be put to it. If this was to be the beginning, he wished to know where they should end? If the whole subject must be acted upon, he wanted to take up the whole at once, when he should vote accordingly.

Mr. WOODBURY, in answer to the inquiries made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. CHANDLER] in relation to the votes of the officers for receiving the commutation, begged leave to repeat, a little more in detail, the curious piece of history that existed as to the acceptance of the commutation act. It required the lines of the Army, at the farthest, to give their acceptance within six months from the time of its passage. There was no evidence that it was accepted by any one individual, or line, until after the expiration of six months from that time: and the only evidence of any acceptance, at any time, by any line, was a report from the then Secretary of War, showing that some of the lines, and not all of them, had accepted. [Mr. W. here read the Secretary's report, showing which of the lines had accepted, together with some select corps and individuals.] He intended to mention, when he was up before, that the older officers, who individually accepted, received the full equivalent, as to the amount of the certificates; because they could not expect to live long, and five years was a fair and liberal commutation for their half pay. But with the subordinate and younger officers, the case was different; they could fairly calculate on living longer than the others, and by every estimate made by annuitants on the probable duration of life, they were entitled to a commutation for a longer period than the five years. Besides, a great portion of the younger officers had gone home on furlough, when the question was decided in the lines; peace was daily expected, and they had been permitted by a vote of Congress, to visit their families, so that they were not present when the vote was taken. In relation to the other question asked by the gentleman, as to why the widows of the deceased officers were not provided for by the bill, he observed, that they were not considered the proper objects either of the charity or justice of the old Congress; but only their husbands. The half pay and commutation were personal, and for personal services. Neither were the widows the legal heirs of their husbands, and entitled on that ground; though if they were, it would be utterly impossible, such was the number of heirs, the claims of creditors of the deceased, and the length of time and difficulty of evidence on this subject, to provide for them. But he, for one, and he could speak also for his colleagues in the committee, was not disposed to be less charitable or gallant to the widows, than the gentleman from Maine. He would be perfectly willing to give to the widows of the surviving officers an annuity for the short period of life yet remaining to them. This, as they did not probably exceed 100, and the annuity should not be over one third half pay, would not amount to much, not probably to more than sixty thousand dollars in a gross sum, as they could not be expected to live more than ten years longer. The sum provided for in the bill would be sufficient to cover their claim, as a deduction was to be made for all that had been paid to officers under the pension act. With respect to that class of soldiers who were entitled to $80 bounty at the close of the war, he would be perfectly willing to include their claim, and the sum in the bill would be sufficient also for that purpose. But he had protested, in his argument, against any construction being given to pay those officers on any other ground than that of contract—about the half pay: they did not make any claim on account of depreciation of the certificates they received for their monthly wages: and hence, faithful and brave, and commendable, as were the soldiers, they could not claim to be included in the bill for depreciation in their monthly wages.

It had just been supposed that if this bill passed, a most enormous sum of money would be paid to each of those officers. But such was not the fact. It had been ascertained, that there were at least about two hundred officers now living; and taking two hundred and thirty as the basis on which to make an estimate, there would be only about $4,300 paid to each individual—whereas, if the commutation act had not passed, they would justly be entitled to more than three times that sum.

Mr. BRANCH said, that he had listened with great pleasure to the able exposition of the Chairman of the Committee, [Mr. WOODBURY.] His feelings were warmly enlisted in behalf of those Revolutionary worthies; for he too felt grateful for their services and privations in the cause of their country. He had labored to be convinced of the propriety of voting this appropriation for the few surviving officers, to the exclusion of the private soldiers; but his mind was still in doubt. It was fair to presume, from the laborious investigation of the gentleman who had just addressed the Senate, in his usual forcible manner, that all that could be said in their behalf, was contained in the argument just delivered.

If doubts exist when one side only has been heard, are we not justified in asking for further time for reflection and examination? For that purpose he had now risen. He presumed many Senators felt like himself.

The Chairman had set out by addressing the justice of Congress, and basing the claim on the strict letter of the compact, which he boldly asserted could not be resisted. He concluded by making a pathetic appeal to the liberality and patriotism of gentlemen. He, [Mr. B.] was fully

Persuaded, that the two arguments did not fit; they could not stand side by side; they were irreconcilable with each other.

If the officers are entitled, according to the strict letter of the compact, then there is no propriety in attempting to rouse our feelings, and enlist our sympathies in their behalf. Let justice be done, at all hazards. Again, if their claim is a legal claim, then it is abundantly manifest, that it must survive to their legal representatives; and we are under as strong obligations to provide for the widows and orphans of the two or three thousand who sleep with their fathers, as the two or three hundred who happen to be now in existence. He was also inclined to believe that the claims of the private soldier of the Revolutionary war, rested on as solid a foundation as those of the officers, for they too had suffered by depreciation. He never would consent to place the officer, who had reaped the laurels of victory, on a different foundation from the private soldier, who stood by the flag of his country, stimulated alone by patriotism. That he might have time for reflection and examination, he moved that the bill be laid on the table, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. HARRISON rose to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRANCH,] whether his object would not be equally well attained by moving an adjournment. That would give him ample time to investigate the report of the Committee, and fully inform himself on the subject. The gentleman proposed making this bill the order of the day for Monday next; but he would state, that there are many important bills the orders of the day, about that time, with which this might probably come in conflict. He would further state, that there were several of the officers now in the city, awaiting the decision of Congress, in regard to their claims. He therefore hoped the gentleman would consent to an adjournment, in order that the bill might not be delayed.

Mr. BRANCH then withdrew his motion.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25, 1828.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the General Government was read the third time.

Mr. KING inquired of the Chairman of the Committee whether the Government had not sent a Minister to Colombia; and, if so, why an outfit was not found in the appropriations?

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the bill had been reported by the Committee of Finance, as it came from the other House. He thought it rather extraordinary, that no appropriation had been made for the object mentioned by the Senator from Alabama. On reference to the estimates, he also found no notice made of an outfit to the Minister at Colombia.

Mr. PARRIS moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee which reported it, that they might inquire whether a person appointed in the manner in which the Minister to Colombia had been, was entitled to an outfit.

Mr. KING objected to the recommitment, as so much time would be consumed by such a course.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, also made some further explanations; when Mr. PARRIS withdrew his motion to recommit.

The question then occurred upon the passage of the bill, on which a desultory debate arose relative to the outfits of Chargé d'Affaires.

Mr. HAYNE made a few remarks on the matter—the purport of which was, that Secretaries of Legation, appointed Chargés, were entitled to outfits. Even in the case of John A. King, who was deputed by his father, it was allowed; and it was a general practice to give an outfit whenever the individual, by an appointment, changed his situation so as to be subjected to greater expenses.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, thought this principle ought to be settled at this time, if possible. He considered that no distinction had existed between a Chargé d'Affaires appointed by the Government, and one deputed by the Minister. The reason 'or this was, that the same change of circumstances, calling for an increase of expenditure, took place in the one case as in the other.

Mr. EATON read the law of 1806, the words of which were, that an outfit should be paid to every Minister or Chargé d'Affaires, "going from the United States"—and from which he argued that, unless they went from the United States, they were not entitled to it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, opposed the construction put by Mr. EATON upon the words of the law.

Mr. EATON replied in support of his previous argument.

Mr. KANE said, that this question was suddenly presented to his mind, but he would not agree with his friend from Tennessee in the application of the law to the precise case presented. Is a Chargé d'Affaires appointed by the President and Senate, residing at the time of his appointment out of the United States, entitled to an outfit? This is the question for decision. It is contended by the gentleman from Tennessee, that the act of 1800 applies the outfit to a person "on his going from the United States." And as this person did not go from the United States, but resided at a foreign court, he is not entitled to the outfit. Were these words intended to fix the time when the outfit should be paid, or do they constitute a condition, without which it cannot be paid? As the reason of the payment applied equally to this case and to one where the individual proceeded from the United States, Mr. K. said, he felt disposed to believe that particular word referred to the time of payment only.

Mr. KING read a list of the different Secretaries of Legation appointed to be Chargés, to show that no one so appointed by a Minister, and who had not received a commission from the Government subsequently, had been allowed an outfit.

After some further remarks by Messrs. JOHNSTON, of Lou. MACON, BELL, and HAYNE, the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The bill providing for certain Surviving Officers of the Revolution then came up, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON said, he rose to reply to the question put by the Senator from North Carolina to the committee which reported the bill before the Senate. He was asked why the committee had selected 300 or 400 out of the Revolutionary officers to receive the beneficence of the Government. He could easily shelter the committee for what they had done, under the order of the Senate, which had referred to them the particular case of the officers, and no other. But, as he had nothing to conceal in relation to his sentiments on this subject, he would say, without hesitation, that no other description of Revolutionary claims should have been mingled with those which the bill provided for, by his vote. The other Revolutionary claims which had been referred to, addressed themselves to the gratitude, the honor, and, he would add, to the interest of the nation; for it was certainly the interest of every nation to discharge claims thus supported. In addition to these, however, the claims now presented rested on the basis of unfulfilled compact—of violated law. This was the ground taken by the committee, maintained by their report, and, in his opinion, established beyond contradiction, by the able argument of their chairman. If this view was correct, the two subjects were so distinct that they ought not to be blended. But does this evince, upon the part of the committee, any disposition to reject or disregard the claims of the private soldiers of the Revolution? No. Let my friend from North Carolina, said Mr. H., bring in a bill to make a further provision for this remnant of the most patriotic army that the world ever saw, and he will find, that, go as far as he may, I will not be behind him in voting them effectual relief. But this is an entirely different matter; the committee have told you that it can be supported upon principles of law, recognised by your courts of justice. Look, Sir, said Mr. H., upon the committee, and see of whom it was composed. With the exception of myself, who, in cases of this kind, requiring legal investigation, could give them little assistance, where would you go to find four men,* upon whose legal opinions, deliberately formed, the nation might rest with more perfect security? The august tribunal, your highest judicial court, now in session in another part of this building, would pay the utmost respect to their opinions, and would long hesitate before they would pronounce one in opposition to such authority.

I cannot think it necessary to attempt any further elucidation of that part of the argument of this case which places it upon the ground of a legal claim, and not of a gratuity. Indeed, it would be presumption in me to attempt it, after the Senator from New Hampshire. I shall, therefore, content myself with a single remark, in answer to an objection made by the Senator from Maine. He asks if the acceptance of the commutation certificates for five years' full pay by the officers is not sufficient evidence of their acquiescence in the proposition made by Congress. A satisfactory answer, is, I think, to be found in the actual value of the commutation certificate at the time that it was issued. The chairman of the committee has stated it at one fifth of its nominal value. I have, however, received information from one who had the best means of knowing, and which accords with what I have always before heard, that it did not exceed one-tenth, i. e. ten per centum. The amount of the commutation certificate for a captain being $2,400, its value in the market would then be $240, which is precisely the amount of a single year's half pay. Now, would any one, having common sense, make a bargain of this kind, to receive a single year's half pay in lieu of half pay for life? Observe, I pray you, Sir, this commutation certificate was a very different thing from the certificates given to both officers and soldiers for the pay due to them. As the Government had not the means of discharging that debt, the claimants had no alternative but to accept the evidence of the debt, whatever might be its real value in the money market. The claimants of the half pay had an alternative—i. e. that of adhering to their claim of half pay for life; and this it was so obviously their interest to take, rather than the other, that it cannot possibly be supposed that the taking of the commutation certificates for five years' full pay from the officers when they were lodged, and which was worth only one year's half pay at the time, was considered by them as a relinquishment of any further claim. Even such of the officers as were obliged to raise money for immediate use, would not have touched these certificates if they had conceived that such would be the effect of taking them; because they could have sold their claim for half pay for life for a larger sum than they could obtain for the certificate. In other words, they could get more for their claims by dealing with the speculator than with Government.

It would hardly be considered fair, at this distant period, to ask the friends of this bill to show that a proper equivalent was given for this extraordinary concession upon the part of the Continental Congress to the officers of the Army. It would be sufficient for us to prove, that the compact was made by the competent authority, acting in behalf of the American States. But as insinuations have been made, not here, but elsewhere, impeaching not only the magnanimity, but the patriotism of the officers, in forcing the Government into the measure of promising them half pay for life, I think it proper to give a short account of the origin of this measure, and the influence which produced its final adoption. This is due, not only to the officers, but is necessary to a proper understanding of the merits of the case.

The commencement of the fourth year of the war (1778) brought with it no encouraging prospect of its speedy and successful termination. The gigantic project of the enemy for cutting off the communication of the Eastern with the Middle and Southern States, had, indeed, in the preceding year, been entirely defeated. But although astonished at the unlooked for intelligence of the capture of a numerous, gallant, and well appointed army, the British ministry were neither appalled nor disheartened. If another attempt was made to conciliate, it was attended with the most vigorous exertions to achieve by arms what could not be obtained by negotiation. Germany, that store-house of armed men, was ransacked for hirelings to wage war upon a distant, and, to them at least, unoffending People. The guards of their King were put in requisition. The dock yards and the arsenals resounded with the din of warlike preparation for the sea as well as the land. Information of these events were carried to America. It produced, it is true, no disposition for submission. But it was far, very far, from producing measures corresponding to the crisis which was approaching. The enthusiasm which had distinguished the five years of the war, and which had given rise to efforts and to results so glorious, had, in a great measure, subsided. Languor and imbecility pervaded every department connected with the supplies for carrying on the war. The very circumstance which should have aroused both the General and State Governments to greater exertions, seemed to produce an effect the most opposite. The rumors of an acknowledgment of our independence by the powerful kingdom of France had reached this country early in the year of which I am speaking, and was confirmed by the actual arrival of a treaty, offensive and defensive, in the month of May. It was received, as it ought to have been, with the greatest demonstration of joy. But, unfortunately, it produced an opinion in those who administered the Government, if not with the people themselves, that their emancipation was put beyond the reach of contingency.

The effects of this fatal security was immediately felt by the army. The amount of its supplies, before scanty, partial, and inefficient, was now almost entirely suspended. It is most fortunate for the liberties of the country, that the calm and discriminating mind of the Commander in Chief was not led away by these deceitful appearances. He saw that the contest was yet to be protracted; that many bloody conflicts were to be sustained; and that a successful issue was only to be looked for by new and great sacrifices upon the part of the People, for effecting an entire renovation in the condition of the Army. This opinion was formed from a knowledge of the character of the British Ministry, and the immense resources at their disposal. He also knew that the assistance which we should receive from our allies would be measured by the efforts which we should make to sustain ourselves. And if even this should not be the case, the idea was not to be borne, that the freedom of his country was to be exclusively achieved by the army and treasure of an ally, and that ally a despotic king. These views were pressed upon Congress in repeated remonstrances; and all the resources of his mind, and the great influence of his character, were put in requisition to make them effectual. Such at length they were, and the usual course of calling for aid upon the State authorities was adopted. For the most part, however, these calls were not more successful than that of Glendower on the spirits of the deep. The hope of relief being thus repeatedly disappointed, the sufferings of the Army seemed at length to have reached its utmost point, and its immediate dissolution to be apprehended. I beg leave, said Mr. H. to read a part of several letters of General Washington to the President of Congress, describing the situation of the officers at this period.

[The extracts of the letters of Gen. Washington, here read by Mr. H., described, in the strongest terms, the situation of the officers, destitute of the common necessities, and even of decent clothes.]

Such, Sir, [said Mr. H.] is the official account of the Commander-in-Chief, of the situation of that Army, upon which the fate of America was to depend. It was my fortune, said Mr. H. to be associated, in the early period of my military service, in the Northwestern Army, under the command of Generals St. Clair and Wayne, with many of those who had served in the Revolutionary Army. From those veterans I have often heard minute particulars of their situation, known, no doubt, to the Commander-in-Chief, but which could not well enter into his official letters. What think you, Sir, of a mess consisting of four or five officers, unable to furnish, from their common wardrobe, a decent suit to a comrade, who was to mount the honorary guard of their beloved Commander! One tolerable shirt alone, the property of the mess, and that performing the round of service to them all. The first Captain under whom I served, the late Colonel Kingbury, of Connecticut, than whom Sparta nor Rome ever produced a better soldier, informed me, that he joined General Washington's Army with a portmanteau filled with clothing, which, becoming the common property of his brother officers, was soon so reduced, that the portmanteau was dispensed with, and the remains of his wardrobe stuffed in a stocking, and carried in the knapsack of a soldier. It must be remarked, however, that all the officers were not in this destitute condition. Some of them were men of fortune, others had wealthy relations, who furnished them with every necessary. And this made those who were without any such resources (which was the case with the great majority of the platoon officers) much more discontented with their condition. At the very time when the officers of the highest grades were disputing for rank, the elevation of a Captain to the rank of a field officer, was, in many instances, no longer regarded as an advantage, because it brought with it a demand for additional expenses and equipments for the new character which he was called upon to support, and which he had not the means to supply, without exhausting the sole resources upon which his family depended. The younger officers, upon whom the glow and glitter of military life, the pomp and circumstance of war, make so strong an impression, shrunk from the gaze of the stranger, or even of his brother officers, as, in tattered garments, he slowly and mournfully took his post for the duties of the grand parade—a scene upon which the accomplished officer delights to exhibit himself, and which, in all armies, will present a true picture of its discipline and its efficiency. This degrading state of the officers of our Army became known to the enemy, and was a subject for their mirth and ridicule. In a little poem which I have once seen, and which is attributed to a British officer celebrated for his accomplishments, but more for his tragical end, and the sympathy which he excited amongst his enemies, the baggage found, or supposed to be found, upon a bat horse, the property of one of our most distinguished Generals, is thus described:

"His horse that carried all his prog—

"His military speeches—

"His cornstalk whiskey for his grog—

"Blue stockings and brown breeches."

This could not have been a true description of the wardrobe of the distinguished officer who is named in the poem, who was a man of fortune, and amply provided with every thing suitable for his rank; but I do not at all doubt that the blue stockings and brown breeches were to be found in the portmanteaus of many others.

Amidst such a complication of difficulties and embarrassments, without the means of decent support, destitute of clothing, the means of equipment which the Army regulations required, the ridicule of their enemies, and of every passing stranger, is it at all to be wondered at, that the officers were disgusted at the service, and that they should think of leaving it? Nor could they believe that their services were much appreciated by a Government, which would make no effectual effort to rescue them from the most abject penury and want. It is true that Congress became at length alarmed at the destructive consequences which must follow the secession of the veteran leaders of their troops, and were seriously and intensely engaged in discovering the means of averting it. The case was too pressing and urgent to be relieved by the usual requisitions on the State Governments, which were always slowly, and never effectually, answered. It seemed, indeed, to them, without a remedy. But a wiser head, acting under the impulses of a heart whose every other passion was absorbed in the love of country, was deeply engaged upon this important subject. We read, sir, of the sages, the lawgivers, and the heroes of Greece. It is the peculiar fortune of America to have produced a citizen who united all those great characters in his own person. In the recesses of his tent, he nightly meditated the means of saving his Army from dissolution, and his country from ruin. The knowledge of General Washington was derived not so much from books as from observation. He knew man as he is, not as he may have been described. With the sources of action in the human bosom he was intimately acquainted, and it opened at once to him the remedy for the disorders which prevailed. The means of relieving the wants of the Army, by an advance of money, was neither in his power, nor in that of Congress. But a remedy could be found in renovated hope—to be realized, indeed, at a distant and uncertain period, but being guaranteed by the solemnly pledged faith of the nation, would be subject to no contingency but a failure on their part to accomplish the object which had been committed to their valor. The scheme adopted by the Commander-in-Chief, to which I have alluded, was that of giving half pay for life, at the end of the war, to the officers who should continue to serve to that period. His first recommendation of this measure is to be found in a letter to the President of Congress, dated at Valley Forge, April 10th, 1778, which I beg leave to read:

"It may be said by some, Sir, that my wish to see the officers of this Army upon a more respectable establishment, is the cause of my solicitude, and carries me too far. To such I can declare, that my anxiety proceeds from the causes above-mentioned. If my opinion is asked with respect to the necessity of making this provision for the officers, I am ready to declare, that I do most religiously believe the salvation of the cause depends upon it; and, without it, your officers will moulder to nothing, or be composed of low and illiterate men, void of capacity for this or any other business. To prove this, I can with truth aver, that scarce a day passes without the offer of two or three commissions; and my advices from the Eastward and Southward are, that numbers who had gone home on furlough, mean not to return, but are establishing themselves in more lucrative employments. Let Congress determine what will be the consequence of this spirit.

"Personally, as an officer, I have no interest in their decision, because I have declared, and I now repeat it, that I never will receive the smallest benefit from the half-pay establishment; but as a man who fights under the weight of a proscription, and, as a citizen who wishes to see the liberty of his country established upon a permanent foundation, and whose property depends upon the success of our arms, I am deeply interested. But, all this apart, and justice out of the question—upon the single ground of economy and public saving, I will maintain the utility of it: for I have not the least doubt, that, until officers consider their commissions in an honorable and interested point of view, and are afraid to endanger them by negligence and inattention, no order, regularity, or care, either of the men or public property, will prevail.”

Frequent recommendations of the same character, [continued Mr. H.] followed in that and the succeeding year. In the beginning of the year 1780, this measure was again pressed, and declared to be the only one which would preserve the Army from dissolution. This, sir, is the language of one of these letters:

“I have often said, and I beg leave to repeat it, the half-pay provision is, in my opinion, the most politic and effectual that can be adopted. On the whole, if something satisfactory be not done, the Army (already so much reduced in officers by daily resignations, as not to have a sufficiency to do the common duties of it) must either cease to exist at the end of the campaign, or it will exhibit an example of more virtue, fortitude, self denial, and perseverance, than has perhaps ever yet been paralleled in the history of human enthusiasm. The dissolution of the Army is an event that cannot be regarded with indifference. It would bring accumulated distresses upon us; it would throw the American people into great consternation; it would discredit our cause throughout the world; it would shock our Allies. To think of replacing the officers with others, is visionary.”

In conformity to these recommendations, sir, (continued Mr. H.) Congress adopted the measure of giving to the officers who should serve to the end of the war, half pay for life. Before I proceed, sir, to show the effects of this measure upon the Army, I ask leave to read a few sentences from the book I have in my hand, to show how entirely the sentiments of General Washington accords with those of another great military character, as to the effects of poverty and straitened circumstances in the officers, upon the discipline and efficiency of an Army. It is the opinion of Marshal Saxe, sir, who, speaking of the French Army, in the reign of Louis XV. reduced by the diversion of its funds to other objects, to a situation similar to that of the United States' Army in the Revolution, thus expresses himself:

“For, what vigor in command, vigilance in the service, exactness in duty, emulation and desire to instruct one's self, or gentleman-like behaviour, can be expected from a man who is ever discontented with his profession? constantly employed about means to subsist in it, or to give it up? and waiting with impatience for the moment of quitting it to advantage? Distress of circumstances of course renders the mind stupid, and abases the soul. It extinguishes courage, and infallibly benumbs all the talents. In a word an officer ought to live by the sword, and expect his fortune from it. A point of view, therefore, must be offered to him, whose chances are powerful enough to make him sacrifice the present to a future chance, that flatters his ambition.”

I have thus, sir, shewn the origin and progress of this half-pay system. That it was a measure of general Washington's urged by him for two years, and adopted by Congress, after the greatest deliberation. Well, now, sir, with regard to the effects of this measure upon the Army. That it was in the highest degree beneficial, and entirely realized the expectations of its author, could be proven by referring to the different positions in which the hostile armies stood in relation to each other before and after its adoption. The weakened, inefficient Army, kept together only by the personal influence of their leader, was enabled to assume the offensive character, to block up the more numerous, well-founded, and well-appointed forces of their enemy, in their principal depot; and, at last, to be found worthy compeers of the veteran regiments of France, in the last and most glorious achievement of the war. But, sir, I will produce better testimony on this subject than can be procured from any other source. It is the opinion of General Washington himself, expressed in his own words. In a letter to the President of Congress, after the conclusion of the war, upon the subject of the claims of the officers for half-pay and referring to a communication made by him on the same subject, in the year 1780, he thus expresses himself:

“That, in the critical and perilous moment, when the last mentioned communication was made, there was the utmost danger that a dissolution of the Army would have taken place, unless measures similar to those recommended, had been adopted, will not admit a doubt. That the adoption of the resolution giving half-pay for life has been attended with all the happy consequences I had foretold, so far as respected the good of the service, let the astonishing contrast between the state of the Army at this instant, and at the former period, determine. And that the establishment of funds, and the security of the payment of all the just demands of the Army, will be the most certain means of preserving the national faith and future tranquility of this extensive continent, is my decided opinion. By the preceding remarks, it will readily be imagined, that, instead of retracting and reprehending (from further experience and reflection) the mode of compensation so strenuously urged in the enclosures, I am more and more confirmed in the sentiment; and if in the wrong, suffer me to please myself with the grateful delusion. For, if, besides the simple payment of their wages, a further compensation is not due to the services and sufferings of the officers, then have I been deceived indeed.”

These documents, Mr. President, [said Mr. H.] are conclusive. They show the influence which this measure of granting half pay to the officers had upon the success of our revolutionary struggle, in the opinion of one who, of all others, was best entitled to judge—that it was that alone which prevented the dissolution of the Army, and restored its discipline and its energy. And to that discipline and energy those victories are to be attributed, which resulted in the establishment of our liberties. That glorious event, then, the independence of America, is to be distinctly traced to the compact made by the Revolutionary Government with the officers of their Army. It has, I think, been satisfactorily shown, that the obligation it imposed has never been completely discharged, which it is the object of the present bill to perform. And upon what ground, sir, is its rejection to rest? Is it to be found in the character of our government? What! a Republic, which is supposed to be founded on public virtue, to refuse to perform its contracts, solemnly and deliberately made! To shelter itself under its power, against a claim which its equity and its justice would have obliged it to discharge! Or, will you refer your defence for its rejection to the character of your People? Assemble them, then. It is a tribunal to which the friends of the bill would be delighted to appeal. Bring together the yeomanry of your country—tell them that this claim is founded on a resolution of Congress, passed in a gloomy period of the Revolution, upon the urgent recommendation of the Father of his Country; that to it he attributed the ultimate success of our arms, and the establishment of their liberties: and if they do not direct you to discharge this obligation, even if it would require the last dollar in the Treasury, then I am mistaken in their character.

If General Washington was correct in attributing to this half-pay system the success of our arms, what measure has ever been adopted, in the whole world, which has produced so much benefit to the human race? See, sir, this extensive and happy country. Ten millions of souls enjoying liberty, unrestrained by every thing but laws, which themselves have made, and alterable at their will. See the influence of our Revolution upon the country South of us. A whole continent redeemed from the most slavish tyranny. Look at its effects in Europe. A constitutional government in France and in Spain, the bars and bolts of the Inquisition broken, its portals thrown down, the horrible mysteries of its dungeons exposed to the detestation of the world. Sir, where is it that the effects of the valor of the memorialists have not been felt? Even the stupid Turk gazes with wonder and amazement at the influence of a principle of which he had never heard, and could not be made to comprehend, until it had converted a nation of slaves into a nation of heroes. I am aware, Mr. President, [said Mr. H.] that the private soldiers of the Revolution have a right to claim a full share of the reward for all these glorious results, and no one is more willing to accord it to them. I look back, with no little satisfaction, to the efforts I made in support of their pretensions in the year 1818. I have always considered that act of the Government as not sufficiently extensive in its operation. I am at this moment willing to extend it so as to embrace all the revolutionary soldiers. And, permit me to say, sir, that I would go further than the Senator from New Hampshire, to provide the necessary funds for that object, than the one contemplated by this bill. I would not only suspend the progress of Internal Improvements, in which I am more interested than the gentleman is, but I would suspend the completion of the fortifications—and make the defences of his own Portsmouth, and my own native James River County, of the breasts of freemen, instead of ramparts of earth and masonry. But, Sir, I resist the mingling of this peculiar claim of the officers, on account of their half-pay, with that of the soldiers and officers, as recognized by the law of 1818, as I would then have done the uniting the former with the latter; because, in their nature, they are entirely different.

When a great act of public justice is to be performed, Mr. President, I do not look at the cost for any other purpose, than to ascertain whether the Treasury can furnish the amount. Money is, in my opinion, always well spent when it is employed to support the honor and character of the nation, and to disseminate correct principles amongst the People. It is by these, and these alone, that a republic can be supported. Whenever we refuse to do any thing which duty and honor requires us to perform, on account of the money it will cost, it will be evidence of an approaching event, which I cannot even think of without horror. Pass, then, this bill, sir, and it will establish a principle which, in any future wars you may wage, will prove your shield, your helmet, your spear, your protector, and your avenger. Let gentlemen look around them and see who are their memorialists—the Ogdens, the Reeds, the Stewarts, and the Gibbons; yes, sir, Major Gibbons, who led one of the forlorn hopes, at the storming of Stony Point, and only lost seventeen out of the twenty which composed his command—himself, I believe, and the other three, wounded.

For my own part, sir, I never see one of those men without feeling the highest respect and gratitude, as well for the services they rendered my country, as for those which I have individually received. To their valor I consider myself indebted that I am a freeman; that I am a member of this august body; though last, not least, that one connected to me by the nearest and dearest ties of natural affection, did not expire on a gibbet.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose to notice an error, which might as well be corrected. It was stated in the report of the Secretary of War, to which allusion had been made, that the line of Maryland consented to accept the commutation. This he believed was not the case; and that the officers never consented. He was convinced that the Army under General Greene had no share in the acceptance of the commutation. Mr. S. had communicated last year with Major Howard upon this subject, who said that those officers were never consulted. He had also conversed this morning with General Reed, who confirmed his impression that the Maryland line did not consent to receive the commutation. They, therefore, could never, in fact, have come under the provisions of the commutation law. It was true, that when they came home from service, they found that the law had passed, and that they must take the commutation or nothing. The alternative was, to take it or starve—and it was not unnatural to suppose that they chose the former. This was the case with the whole Maryland line.

Mr. S. here spoke at some length of the privations suffered by the officers of the Revolution. He observed that, at the funeral of Major Howard, upon the coffin was placed a soldier's coat, with something like epaulettes on the shoulders, which he had worn during his service for want of a better one. The Government found the soldiers in coats, but the officers were necessitated to purchase theirs, and often, having none, were fain to take a soldier's coat instead. I do not intend, said Mr. S. to dress up the misfortunes of the Army for the sake of effect. These facts are matters of history, and do not need embellishment. The few words which I shall offer in defence of these claimants, will be grounded on the belief that the faith of the Government is bound to relieve them. A solemn agreement was entered into with them by the Government. They fulfilled faithfully their part of the obligation—and they now come here, not to ask your gratitude, but to claim a right.

He had never heard a clearer exposition of facts, or a stronger array of arguments, than was made by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] yesterday. Yet it had been said, that the soldiers ought to be included in the provisions of the bill. He was of a different opinion. The soldiers were far better provided for than the officers, and they were now enjoying pensions larger than their pay when in actual service. Four-fifths of the soldiers of the Revolution were now on the pension list, at eight dollars a month, while their pay when in service was only six and two-thirds. He believed that there were very few, if any, who were entitled to pensions, who had not received them. As to Maryland, he did not think there were five soldiers of the Revolution in that State who did not draw pensions. They were well provided for; and, as far as related to the soldiers, this country had wiped away the stigma which had been always thrown upon it by monarchical Governments, that Republics were ungrateful. He hoped Congress would do so in this case.

It had been asked why the provisions of this bill were not applied to the widows and children of those officers who had died. The reply, said Mr. S. which I make to that question, is, that we cannot do all that we might wish to do—but let us not, therefore, fail to do all that we can—and in doing this, let us select those individuals whose claims upon the Government are the strongest. I shall say no more—my object in rising being only to correct the error in the report of the Secretary of War relative to the officers of the Maryland line, and to state that those who accepted the commutation, did it from necessity.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that, as the gentleman from Maryland had alluded to him, he would make a few remarks in reply. He wished this subject stripped of all extraneous matter, and of all other considerations than those which rightfully belonged to it. How, then, does the matter stand? The gentlemen who advocate the bill say that it is no gratuity. They say that every officer was entitled to his half pay for life, and that the commutation was forced upon them, they never having consented to it, except in some instances; and that the compact was not fulfilled by that act. But, said Mr. C. I contend that the compact has been fulfilled by the acceptance of the commutation offered, and that no further claim exists. If they contend that there is an equitable title, then, I say, that the heirs of such as accepted the terms, and who have since died, are equally entitled to the sum now proposed to be paid. He never knew that the death of the creditor destroyed the debt, and he believed it was equally binding in one case as the other. If the bill were to pass in its present form, it would be partial in the extreme.

The gentleman from Ohio had read several letters from General Washington, to show that he considered these individuals to have a claim on the Government. But, if General Washington was of that opinion, would he not have acted under it? I ask, said Mr. C. in what instance General Washington, who was always the soldier's friend, came forward and stated that the Government owed these officers any thing which had not been paid? He never did; and, therefore, the conclusion was a fair one, that he did not consider that they were entitled to any thing, and that their compact had been fulfilled. He [Mr. C.] did not doubt that such was his opinion.

These officers were certainly entitled to great respect, and to the gratitude of the country; and no man more cheerfully awarded them than Mr. C.; but he did not wish to be carried away by his feelings. He desired to do justice. If the country owed them any thing, let it be paid to the utmost farthing. He wished their claim, however, to be satisfactorily established, in the first place. Far from feeling any hostility towards these applicants, he was induced by many considerations to feel favorably disposed towards them. His early associations led him to look with great respect upon the patriots of the Revolution, as he lost his father in that struggle, who, although not on the continental establishment, was no less a patriot.

Mr. PARRIS remarked that, unless provision were made for the soldiers of the ranks, as well as the officers, he should not vote for the bill. The sufferings of both were equal—there was no difference in their privations, and the same provisions ought to be extended to both. He, therefore, proposed to recommit the bill for the purpose of adding an amendment; which he read. [This amendment was pronounced, on the next day, to be out of order.]

Mr. VAN BUREN said he hoped the bill would not be re-committed. It would create an injurious delay—while, if there ever was a case in which a legislative decision ought speedily to be made, it was this. The bill ought not, therefore, to be re-committed, so as to place it behind the other business. He thought the Senator from Maine might reach his object without recommitting the bill; and Mr. V. B. considered the best method would be, to offer an amendment to the effect proposed.

Mr. FOOT believed that there was one amendment pending, so that another would not now be in order.

Mr. WOODBURY said that if the blank were first filled with the sum proposed, or whatever amount the Senate might decide upon; or, if the present motion were rejected, the gentleman from Maine could then attain his object, by moving to amend the bill by adding a section. The gentleman would recollect, that the bill had been before a Select Committee, and he believed, after they had once reported upon the subject for which they were appointed, they became defunct, and had no longer power to act upon it.

The CHAIR corrected Mr. W. The committee were not discharged from acting upon the bill until it should have been disposed of.

Mr. PARRIS said that the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire did not reach his object. He wished that the amounts due to the soldiers should be ascertained by the committee. It was not possible for him [Mr. P.] to draw a section that should embrace the amount of the depreciation which they suffered. As he could not frame an amendment which would comprise all his objects, he desired the recommitment of the bill.

Mr. FOOT thought that, to fill the blank with a certain sum in the present state of the question, would operate to exclude all other amounts. He was of opinion that the extent and number of the objects to which this bill was to apply, ought first to be settled, and then the sum proposed to fill the blank could be fixed upon with precision.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that another and perhaps a better method to reach the object, would be, by a separate appropriation. The only question now is, will we pay the sum which has been proposed to the officers of the Revolution? And this question, he thought, stood entirely separate from any other class of individuals. Appropriations for other objects could be made in additional sections, after the blank in the first section had been filled.

Mr. FOOT believed that, if the blank were filled, it would prevent provisions from being made for any other class of claimants. As to the ground on which the chairman had rested these claims, he was of opinion that, if it was a good ground, the legal representatives had the same claim to relief as the surviving officers. He therefore hoped that a recommitment might be had, and that the consideration of the bill might be deferred, that they might see what amendments the committee would see fit to propose.

Mr. BERRIEN thought the delay proposed would operate unjustly and injuriously upon the prospects of the bill. Let us, said Mr. B., look at the circumstances under which this measure stands. The committee was appointed to inquire into the merits of these claims. They have done so; and the bill is now in a fair train of debate and examination. It is proposed, at this juncture, to recommit the bill—and for what? Why, because it may influence the vote of some gentlemen, by giving a pledge to provide for another class of claimants.

But, said Mr. B., supposing the blank to be filled with the sum now proposed. Are gentlemen pledged by their vote on this question? Can they not afterwards bring forward their amendments, and should they fail of obtaining their adoption, may they not vote against the bill on its final passage? He saw no objection to such a course, and he thought the question was, whether it would be just to delay the bill for this purpose.

Mr. VAN BUREN asked the reading of the proposition made by Mr. PARRIS; which, having been complied with, Mr. V. B. said that it ought not to be adopted. It went infinitely beyond the object proposed by this bill, which was, to liquidate a debt to one class of individuals, who, having been promised half pay for life, had never received an equivalent for the benefit thus held forth in expectation. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine proposed to settle—not the certificates of commutation alone—but all the accounts of the Revolution. Mr. V. B. thought that the gentleman had taken an incorrect view of the subject, and trusted his motion would not prevail.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the bill was postponed until Monday, and made the order for that day.

MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1828.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to graduate the price of the Public Lands having been taken up for consideration—

Mr. HENDRICKS said, it would be remembered that, at the last session, he had submitted an amendment to the bill, which, with the bill itself, was made the order of the day for a subsequent period of the session; that, owing to the pressure of other business, the Senate was prevented from the further consideration of the bill, and no opportunity was afforded, during the residue of the session, for presenting his reasons in support of the amendment then proposed.

The same bill had again been offered for consideration, and he thought it his duty to avail himself of the present opportunity, to offer the same amendment. He trusted that it would be unnecessary for him to assure the Senator from Missouri, that it was in no spirit of hostility to his bill, that he offered this amendment. Should it meet the favorable reception of the Senate, it would accomplish much more than the bill in its present shape, would be more acceptable to him than the present bill, and, if it should not be adopted, the question could then be taken on the bill as reported. He proposed to strike out the fifth section, and insert the following:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the preceding sections of this act shall be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to the Territories only.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the public and unappropriated lands within the limits of the new States, shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded and relinquished in full property to the several States in which the same may lie, on condition that such States shall not, at any time hereafter, put such lands into market at a lower minimum price than shall be established by law for the sale of the public lands in the Territories: and on condition that the Indian title to lands within the limits of any State, shall hereafter be extinguished at the expense of such State."

The amendments being stated,

Mr. H. said: Some exposition of the amendments proposed, will probably be expected of me, and I will ask the indulgence of the Senate, while I attempt to give, as briefly as I can, my reasons in support of them. A document heretofore referred to, as one which might be expected to give much light on this subject, has been laid on our tables, and the statements and calculations therein contained, give us a good historical view of the public lands, from the commencement of the Government to the present time. I will not, however, weary the Senate with its details, for all statistical views of this subject aloof, we have grand and unerring principles to conduct us in this discussion, in which, if borne out, we shall the less need arithmetical calculations, and, without which, those calculations, however plausible, would be entirely insufficient.

It has long been my opinion, that the best interests of the Union imperiously demand a change in our land system; and I have long seen the injustice of the present system towards the new States. Both these opinions seem to be gaining ground every where. The balance of the Constitution is lost in the present state of things. The attention of Congress is engrossed, in legislating, specially, for the new States, to the partial neglect, at least, of its own general concerns; and the equality, sovereignty, and independence, of the new States, are lost in their object and humiliating dependence on the Federal Government.

No Senator from the new States can but have observed how frequently, within the last few years, opinions have escaped members from all parts of the Union, that it would be better the public lands were ceded to the States, on just and equitable conditions, than that the Councils of the Nation should be teased and distracted with the local policies, and municipal legislation, necessary, under the present system. So frequent were these remarks, during the first session at which I had the honor of a seat in the Senate, that the time seemed to have arrived, when this proposition ought to be made; and, with that view, a few days before its close, a resolution was introduced by myself, calling for the document before alluded to. This document, sir, it was my intention, should no other member move in the business, to make the basis of some such proposition as that now before the Senate. Nor was I alone in the opinion, that the time had arrived when this proposition should be made: for, a few days after the adoption of the resolution referred to, a Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL] laid upon your table a resolution, expressing the abstract opinion, that it was expedient for the United States to cede and surrender to the several States the public lands within their limits. This proposition was what I had long wished to see. It came from the right source—from one of the old States; and from that State, too, whence the Federal Government had derived its title to most of the country Northwest of the river Ohio, and East of the Mississippi. This proposition I hoped to have seen renewed at the last session, and clothed with whatever details the mover had thought proper to submit to the Senate. But, learning that it was not his purpose to renew his proposition, I determined on the measure myself, and seized the occasion of the present bill, then under consideration, as a proper one.

The amendment submitted, Mr. President, is not burdened with detail. The proposition is a plain and simple one, encumbered with but two conditions: for, if correct in the principle at the base of this measure, that the equality and sovereignty of the new States require that these States should have the control of the public lands within their limits, then it would be unjust to attach many, or hard conditions, to the cession: for the power of attaching onerous conditions includes the right of refusal. You might easily attach conditions such as the States could not accept.

The bill proposes a graduation of the price of the public lands, applicable alike to the States and Territories; and provides, that, after the lands shall have been many years in market; after all the good shall have been sold, and the bad and worthless reached the minimum of 25 cents per acre, that the residue of worthless lands shall be relinquished to the States. The amendment proposes that the whole system of the bill shall apply to the Territories only, and that the lands in the States shall forthwith be ceded to the States in which they lie. One condition of the amendment is, that the States shall not put those lands into market at a lower minimum than shall be established by Congress, for their lands of equal value in the Territories. This is to provide, that the Legislatures of the States, who will always know more of the wants of the People than we can know—who will always be more disposed to put their lands into the hands of the industrious poor, on terms more favorable than this Government—and who will know better than we can know, when to give pre-emption rights and donations to actual settlers—may not undersell, and render the hundreds of millions that would still belong to the Union, in the Territories, of little value. It is to provide that the States may not hereafter do, what this Government would not consent should be done, in regulation of the price.

The other condition is, that the Indian title to lands within the limits of the States shall be extinguished, hereafter, at the expense of the States. This provision seems necessary, because, by the Constitution, the treaty-making power is vested in the President and Senate, and would have to be employed in our negotiations with the Indians. Any details about Land Offices, Surveys, &c.

would be useless. The States would establish their own land offices, and regulate the surveys as they might think proper; and, in the Territories, the system, with the principle of graduating attached, would remain as at present.

But, Mr. President, I am not vain enough to suppose that, in this proposition, I shall have luckily hit on that which will be most acceptable to the Senate. In relation to the terms, which are equitable and just, and on which the lands should be ceded to the States, we are as liable to hold a great variety of discordant opinions as on any other subject; and the abstract proposition, on which, perhaps, a large majority are agreed, is in danger of being lost by the discordance of its friends. If, however, we shall unfortunately come to no union of opinion at the present time, still I hope that the discussion will be useful, in the comparison of opinions, and the development of views; and that, if not at the present, at some future day, it may aid in coming to some satisfactory conclusion.

This Union is, in theory, formed of sovereign, equal, and independent States. In the older members of this Confederacy, the Federal Government sets up no claim to the waste and unappropriated lands; has no land offices, derives no revenues from the sales of lands. In the new States, this Government is the lord of the soil, has established land offices, and collects millions from the sales of lands. A statesman or historian, making himself acquainted with our system, would pronounce it, in theory, beautiful. With nothing would he be more pleased than with the republican equality of the States. But what would be his surprise, when told, that, in seven of these States, the soil itself belonged to the Government of the Union, while, in seventeen States, the soil belonged to the States themselves. Would he not instantly inquire, why are the States of this Confederacy equal in theory, when they are not so in fact? Why are they not made equal in reality, as they are in name? The answer to this last inquiry would be the reasons against the proposition now before the Senate. He would then hear, as we have so often heard, of the cessations, the pledge, and the compacts.

I am aware, Mr. President, that these are usually resorted to, as the authority of this Government, to hold the lands in the States; but these authorities, taken in connexion with other portions of the history of that day, instead of showing title in the Federal Government, may, in my opinion, safely be relied on, to sustain a different position. It surely was the intention of the States ceding, and of Congress in receiving, these cessations, that the territory thus ceded should be formed into States, and should be received into the Union, as free, sovereign, and independent States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. That they should thus be received into the Union was most certainly the intention of the framers of the Constitution. To establish and sustain the political equality of the States, the Constitution had extended favors to the small States. It had put political power, in some instances, into the hands of the small States, to balance numbers of the large States. The equal representation in the Senate is an evidence of this. I will take a brief notice of these cessations, this pledge, and these compacts; and being more familiar with my own country than that of any other, I will take my facts and illustrations from that district chiefly ceded by Virginia to the Union—that portion of country out of which is formed the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. I will leave to others—to the Senators from Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Missouri—to speak of that portion of the public lands which was acquired by treaty from France and Spain, and by cession from other States than Virginia.

The ninth article of the Confederation declared, that no State should be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States. This was the origin of the cessations. The cession from Virginia was authorized by act of her Legislative body in 1783, and was formally transferred by her delegates to the Congress of the Confederation, by deed bearing date the first of March, 1784. These transactions were anterior to the formation of the Constitution of the United States, and cannot be understood, without recurring to the circumstances under which they took place. These circumstances, some of them imperious and controlling in their character, and these only, can give us the reasons of the actors of that day, and unfold their views about the public domain. It had been a matter of much complaint, on the part of several States, that, in the articles of Confederation, no disposition was made of the crown lands. This will be found, perhaps, as fully set forth, in the objections of New Jersey to the Confederation, as any where else. The objections of New Jersey to the articles of the Confederation, respecting the public lands, were as follows—Vol. I. U. S. Laws, p. 24.

"The ninth article provide, that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States." "It was ever the confident expectation of this State, that the benefits derived from a successful contest, were to be general and proportionate, and that the property of the common enemy, falling, in consequence of a prosperous issue of the war, would belong to the United States, and be appropriated to their use. We are, therefore, greatly disappointed, in finding no provision made in the Confederation, for empowering the Congress to dispose of such property, but especially the vacant and unpatented lands, commonly called the crown lands, for defraying the expenses of the war, and for such other public and general purposes." "Reason and justice must decide, that the property which existed in the crown of Great Britain, previous to the present Revolution, ought now to belong to the Congress, in trust, for the use and benefit of the United States." "Shall such States as are shut out by situation, from availing themselves of the least advantage from this quarter, be left to sink under an enormous debt, whilst others are enabled in a short period, to replace all their expenditures, from the hard earnings of the whole Confederacy?"

The proposition of New Jersey was, that all the crown lands, all the waste and unappropriated lands in all the States, should belong to Congress, as a source of revenue, to meet the expenses of the war. But this proposition so to amend the articles of the Confederation was rejected by the Congress of 1778, to which it was submitted, three States only, out of ten, voting for it.

The objections of Maryland to the articles of the Confederation were also submitted to the same Congress. An amendment was moved, in behalf of Maryland, "that the United States, in Congress assembled, shall have power to appoint commissioners, who shall be fully authorized and empowered to ascertain and restrict the boundary of such of the confederated States, which claim to extend to the river Mississippi or South Sea." This was also negatived.

The objections of Rhode Island to the same articles, were also considered by the Congress of 1778. It was proposed by that State, to add, "that all lands within these States, the property of which, before the present war, was vested in the crown of Great Britain, or out of which revenues from quit-rents arise, payable to the said crown, shall be deemed, taken, and considered, as the property of these United States, and be disposed of and appropriated by Congress, for the benefit of the whole Confederacy." This proposition was also negatived, by a vote of States, nine to one. So far then we have, in three instances, the solemn decision of Congress, against the assumption of power over the unappropriated lands, within the limits of the States. Nor indeed, does it appear, that, after that period, 1778, was the proposition to give Congress the right of soil in the States ever renewed. This, sir, is a very important part of our history, respecting the public lands. In these three instances, Congress positively refused to assume the power of interfering with the right of soil, in the sovereign and independent States. Congress seemed to say of that proposition, that, being already clothed with the sword and the purse of the nation, if power over the soil were added, there would be nothing but the shadow of a name left to the States.

Many causes, however, operated in producing these voluntary cessions on the part of the States. Those States in which there were but little unappropriated lands, and on whom the pressure of the war debt was at that time heavy, allured by the expectations, that there were public lands sufficient to pay the debt, were pressing the idea of cession. Some of the States had not yet joined the Confederacy, dissatisfied with the articles of Confederation; and in order to quiet the discordant elements of the day, it was necessary to hit upon some measure likely to produce that effect. Congress, accordingly, by act of 1780, recommended to the several States having wild lands, to make liberal cessions of them to the Union, to pay the debt of the Revolution. This measure promised to have the desired effect. Nor was the situation of the States holding these lands, calculated to dissuade them from such cessions. Virginia had been exposed to great expenditures and sacrifices, in the prosecution of her Indian wars, and in garrisoning of posts on the territory in question, and to her, who had experience on that subject, there was little prospect that her finances, all things considered, were in a short time to be much benefitted by her public lands. The validity of her title, too, owing to the unexpected extent of her grant from the British crown, and its clashing with that of Connecticut, no doubt strongly induced her to the proposed cession. The grant of Connecticut running indefinitely West, and that of Virginia indefinitely North, would have thrown them upon the same territory, from the Western limits of Pennsylvania, along the shores of the Northern lakes, to the banks of the Mississippi. They would have held disputed titles, and of all things, collisions among the States were at that time to be most carefully avoided. Nor does the value set upon these lands at that day, seem to bear any comparison with their value according to modern estimates.

In examining the whole history of these cessions, from the articles of the Confederation to the formation of the Constitution, we find nothing to incline us to the opinion, that either Virginia or the United States expected this vast expanse of territory to remain in the hands of the Union, in the same condition it was in the hands of Virginia at the time of cession. That the condition in which these lands were placed by the cession, was not intended by either party to be a permanent one, is most certain from the cession itself, in which it is stipulated that new States shall be formed out of this territory.

But, it is said that we may not cede the lands to the States, because Congress stands bound to appropriate their proceeds to the payment of the public debt. The pledge, as it is called, is immediately referred to. This pledge, sir, I believe, is to be found no where else than in the act of cession of Virginia, and in her deed of transfer to the Union. If this be a pledge, it is made by Virginia herself, and is a guarantee that Congress will so appropriate the proceeds of the public lands. It is not, as is generally understood, a pledge made to Virginia by Congress. But, consider it in that light, and associate it with other parts of that instrument from which it cannot be separated, and you cannot fairly understand it to have reference at all to a period, after the political condition of the territory shall have been totally changed—after it shall have been formed into sovereign, free, and independent States.

Much stress appears to be placed on the language of this pledge. It is there said, that the lands so ceded "shall be considered a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederacy, or Federal alliance of the States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." There is not, in this pledge, any stipulation, that the new States, when admitted into the Union, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil.

But, sir, whatever the language of this pledge may be, the object of the contracting parties is plainly expressed. That object was, that all the States should become, and remain, members of the Confederacy; and, as a strong inducement for so doing, it was stipulated, that the proceeds of the ceded lands should be appropriated in favor only of those States that had subscribed the articles of Confederation. The quotas of such States as were not members of the Confederacy, should be required of them unaided by the proceeds of the territorial lands. Nor is this view of the subject weakened by the fact, that most of the thirteen States had, previous to these cessions, joined the Confederacy: for the policy of the cession had been determined on in 1780. New York had ceded before Virginia; and it is worthy of remark, that at least one of the delegates from Maryland subscribed the articles of Confederation the same day that New York ceded her unappropriated lands to the Union.

This provision held out to the New States, thereafter to be formed, strong inducements to join the Confederacy: for, refusing to do so, they would be deprived of their respective proportions of the proceeds of the territorial lands, while they would be chargeable with their proportions of the public debt. The inducement, too, in their case, was much strengthened by the ordinance of 1787, which prohibited them, after they should become States, from interfering with the primary disposal of their own soil, until they should have joined the Confederation.

But, connected with this pledge, there is another objection urged. The special words of the prohibition not to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, &c. is understood by some as expressing a perpetuity co extensive with time. This language, however, is familiar to the statute book, and from it nothing can be inferred. It is to be found in almost every act of Congress, from the Confederation to the present time. We are in the habit of saying in our statutes to day, that this, that, or the other regulation, shall be, and for ever remain, the law of the land, while we possess the power, and frequently, at the next session, exercise it, of repealing such law.

I have said, Mr. President, that this pledge has reference only to a Territorial form of government, and has no reference whatever to a period, after the political condition of the country shall have been totally changed—after it shall have been formed into sovereign, free, and independent States. And, if it be not susceptible of this construction, it cannot be reconciled with the ordinance of 1787, which says, that, whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. If the construction just given be not the true one, the pledge and this provision of the ordinance are at war with each other—are destructive of each other. And suppose, sir, that these lands were pledged in perpetuity, under all political circumstances, for the payment of the public debt: For what debt?

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Surely for no other than the $42,000,000 then existing. And has not that sum, in amount, been often paid.

But do gentlemen tell us that this pledge is a sacred one, and may not be touched, until every tittle of the procrastinated Revolutionary debt shall be paid? And if so, will some one be kind enough to tell the Senate how it comes to pass that more than 20,000,000 of acres have already been legislated away in military bounties, and for other purposes than paying the debt of the Revolution? This pledge would seem to be one of flexible, convenient character. Whenever it becomes necessary for this Government to divert any portion of the public lands from the object of this pledge, it can forthwith be done; but when the fair claims of the new States are presented for the whole, or a part of these lands, then, indeed, this pledge rises in great majesty and strength. Put this matter on what ground soever you please, these lands are long ago released. If bound for the payment of the Revolutionary debt, that debt is, in amount, long ago paid; and if inseparable from the sovereignty of the States, they are in that way released, although the debt be not paid.

If we carefully examine the ordinance of 1787, we shall see, on the face of it, that it never was intended, in the great mass of its provisions, to be applicable to the States when formed: for some of its provisions are entirely inconsistent with every idea of State government, and in that view, they are contradictory to one another. Can any one believe that the ordinance would guaranty, on a particular event, the admission of these States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, if it had been the intention of Congress to retain the full property of the soil, while the soil of the original States belonged to those States?

The resolution of 1780 provided for the formation of the ceded territory into States, and determined, that, when admitted, they should have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States. The ordinance specified the boundaries of the districts, and recognized them as States, before their admission into the Union. It gave them the right, severally, of demanding such admission, whenever they should have sixty thousand free inhabitants, and gave them the right, also, of forming for themselves permanent Constitutions and State Governments. Being recognized as States before they had joined the Confederacy, the Congress of 1787 thought proper to restrain them, previous to their joining the Union, from the primary disposal of the soil. This was, perhaps, at that day, when every patriot was tremblingly solicitous for the stability and perpetuity of the Republic, a valuable provision. It held out inducements, strong and powerful, to the new States, to become members of the Confederacy; and it was the Legislatures of the new States, who had not joined the Confederacy, and these only, that were prohibited interfering with the primary disposal of the soil. They had a right to demand admission with a population of sixty thousand, and to form, at that period, permanent Constitutions and State Governments. They were, at that period of their history, and not till then, promised admission on an equal footing with the original States; and if Congress had refused them admission, they would still have remained States, and the equal footing which was guarantied them, being ascertained by comparison with the original States, would have attached to them.

This opinion is not novel. For this opinion, the ablest statesmen contended, in the question of admitting, without restriction, the State of Missouri. I will not, Mr. President, weary the Senate, in giving extracts from the speeches of that day, volumes of which could be instantly produced. The occasion is in the recollection of every one. It was contended for, by many of the advocates for the Missouri admission, that she, having formed her Constitution, convened her Legislative body, enacted her own laws, was, in very deed, a State, and that her State sovereignty and equality, included her right to her public domain. It may also be stated, with much certainty, that difficulties such as these, finally kicked the beam in favor of her admission, more than any constitutional argument.

I am well aware, sir, that the Constitution will be resorted to for aid in the present case. We shall, no doubt, have quoted upon us the third section of the fourth, and the whole of the sixth article. We shall be told that Congress have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory, or other property belonging to the United States. But, those who contend for the validity of the ordinance, and its application in the present case, will surely not take the ground that its provisions were changed by the Constitution; for, if they do, they have themselves no ground to stand upon. If you say the ordinance was repealed by the Constitution of the United States, you lose the benefit of its prohibitions against the new States; and if you admit that the ordinance, with its guarantees in favor of the new States, is sanctioned by the Constitution, you must admit, that the new States, with a population of 60,000, were entitled to admission into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States.

The ordinance is, in many of its provisions, a compact between the original States and the People and States in the Territory. It contains engagements of both parties; and the sixth article of the Constitution declares, that all engagements, entered into before the adoption of the Constitution, shall be valid. The ordinance contemplated the public lands as belonging to the new States, after their admission into the Union; and, if all other authorities were wanting to prove this, the ninth article of the Confederation would be sufficient. It declares, that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States. These articles were made for the government of the United States, and for the States which should adopt them in future; and the ordinance was framed in accordance with those articles. They were the basis of the ordinance of 1787. They were the constitution of that day, and the ordinance cannot be construed in violation of them. The meaning of the ordinance, compared with this article, becomes perfectly clear.

Mr. President, the union of the States was the grand object of all parties in the regulation of the Territorial lands. The articles of confederation had provided, that no State should be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States; that Congress should not assume the ownership of the soil in the States. With this, many States were dissatisfied, and hesitated about joining the Union. To remedy this, the cessions provided, that no State out of the Confederacy should participate in the proceeds of those lands; and the ordinance further provided, that the new States, refusing to join the Union, should not only be excluded from all participation in the proceeds of the territorial lands without their limits, but that they should be prohibited from interfering with the primary disposal of the soil within their limits. As a further inducement to the new States to join the Confederacy, the ordinance stipulated that they should be admitted into the Union, with a population of 60,000, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; and the Constitution, in sustenance of the same policy, provides, that all engagements entered into before the adoption of the Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under the Constitution, as under the Confederation. So that the articles of the Confederation, the acts of cession, the ordinance of 1787, and the Constitution itself, form a perfect and harmonious chain of policy—the grand object of which was, the union and equality of the States.

Public Lands.

Then, Mr. President, if at all correct in this view, it may well be asked, by what means have the new States been deprived of their equality, of the right of soil? I am well aware, sir, of the answer to be expected here. Here the compacts made with the new States are brought into view. Here, notwithstanding the guarantee that the new States shall be admitted into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; that they shall enjoy the same rights of sovereignty and equality with the old States; we are told that the sovereignty of the States are, sub modo, conditional; that, if one condition may be attached another may, and that, whatever our political rights would have been, if we had never made the compacts, we must now abide by them, and have no reason to complain. And are we to be told, that, although the sovereignty and equality of the States, as well as the stipulations of the ordinance, would have given us, without the compacts, the soil of our country, we are to be deprived of that first attribute of sovereignty by the conditions imposed, when we asked permission to form, for ourselves, a constitution and State Government?

These compacts, it is true, ought never to have been made; and, however soon we may get clear of them, we shall have suffered sufficiently by them. A Territorial form of Government is, indeed, not to be desired. It has been one of turmoil and strife, wheresoever it has been introduced. The Territories, anxious to gain a political elevation, anxious to gain the level of equality with the original States, did not rightly consider the immense sacrifices they were making for the name, while they were not really acquiring the substance of equality and independence. They had a right to demand admission with a population of 60,000, and Congress might, in their discretion, receive them into the Union with a less population. Some of the new States asked for admission with a less population. This was the case with Ohio, the first from the Territory in question. Ohio, tired with her Territorial relations to the Union, asked, by her Delegate, permission to form, for herself, a Constitution and State Government, with a less population than 60,000. Congress, under these circumstances, having the power to admit or not, responded to this request of Ohio with conditions. That part of the ordinance which prohibited the new States from full property in the soil, until they should be admitted into the Union, was made perpetual; and the prohibition of sale and taxation was imposed, for no other consideration, than a few sections of school lands, a few supposed salt springs, and five per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands, for internal improvements. This is the history of the matter in reference to Ohio.

Louisiana was next admitted into the Union, with a Territory obtained, by treaty, from France. That the People of Louisiana, who had been accustomed to receive from the Crowns of France and Spain almost any quantity of land for occupying it; a People anxious to experience the full benefits of the Government to which they had recently been attached; should have been thoughtless about any regulation on the subject of their public lands, is not wonderful. Louisiana, too, like Ohio, was admitted into the Union with a less population than 60,000.

Indiana was the next State admitted into the Union. She had, before she applied through her Delegate, for admission, a population of more than 60,000. She had a right to demand admission under the ordinance of 1787. Following, however, the example of others, under circumstances less favorable than her own, instead of forming her Constitution, and demanding unconditional admission into the Union, as, by the ordinance, she had a right to do, she procured the passage of a similar law, authorizing her to form a Constitution and State Government, giving up the right of soil and taxation to the Federal Government.

The compacts, themselves, admit the rights of the States to the public lands: for they stipulate conditions. The compact not to tax, implies the right of taxing on the part of the new States, unrestricted by the compact. The compact not to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil, implies the right to interfere, unrestricted by the compact. If the right of the Federal Government, in these respects, had been clear, on constitutional grounds, or on well-established principles, we should have had no compacts, no bargaining about it. Congress did not ask the States to enter into compacts not to declare war, not to make treaties, not to grant letters of marque and reprisal, or keep troops and ships of war in time of peace. And why? Because the Constitution itself clearly inhibited these powers to the States.

Sir, it must be admitted, that the new States are now contending with this Government on terms very unequal. They are little else than vassals and tributaries to the power of this Union, and they have all the force of the compacts against them. But I cannot, I will not believe, that this consideration is to prevent that justice now, which at first should have been done. I believe that, as soon as it shall appear, that the condition of the new States, in reference to their public lands, is one of abject and humiliating dependence; inconsistent with the rights of sovereignty and equality; inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and their character as States; that the proposition now before the Senate will instantly prevail.

We claim, as we believe, a constitutional right; make a reasonable demand, that you should restore to us the soil of our country, which you ought never to have taken from us. Do you talk of equitable conditions, the expenses of Indian wars, and Indian treaties in the country; the expenses of purchasing Louisiana and Florida, from France and Spain: and, if you had never owned one foot of soil Northwest of the Ohio river, would your Indian wars and Indian treaties have been the less expensive? Your line of frontier South of the Ohio would not have been quite so long; but the whole country between the Ohio river and the Lakes would have been covered with an innumerable horde of Northern warriors, who could, at any moment, have carried desolation into the Southern country. Your expenditures, on account of Indian wars, would, in that event, have been much greater, than at present they are. And if, previous to the acquisition of Louisiana, every acre had been granted by the Crowns of France and Spain, to individuals, would you have hesitated about $15,000,000 for that indispensable appendage of the Union? Would not inevitable wars with the nations in possession of that country, have cost you, probably ere now, this amount twice told; saying nothing about the commerce of the Western country?

If the idea of State sovereignty, strengthened by the equality which is guaranteed to the new States, be inseparable from the right of soil, then you cannot withhold that right of soil. If you have a right to impose conditions, then may you impose such as can never be complied with, and, in this way, exercise the power of refusal. But, if you even determine that you have the right of imposing conditions, then we say to you, do not lay heavier burdens on us than we are able to bear: do not look to us to contribute more than our numerical proportions to the Treasury of the nation. In requiring us to reimburse expenditures on account of Indian wars and treaties, you adopt the principle of levying on that portion of the country which may, unfortunately, become the theatre of war, the expenses of that war. You require it to sustain, not only the desolations of war, but to pay the debts created. And where would this principle lead? It would have required the People of this District to have rebuilt the President's House and the Capitol, and would have subjected them to contributions for every expenditure here. It would have required the People of the Niagara frontier to have borne the burden of the Treasury, in that quarter, instead of receiving remuneration for burnt villages, and lost property during the war. And, besides, this principle is incapable of being practised on: for, how will you determine, and of whom will you require, a reimbursement of your expenditures in Canada?

Public Lands.

It was my intention, sir, to have presented to the Senate, some arguments on the principle of expediency, many of which might be urged in the present case. I will, however, desist from this view of the subject, being unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate. I will only remark, that the public lands, as a source of revenue, have greatly disappointed the expectations of those who looked to them as the means of paying the national debt. It was, no doubt, the expectation of the times, that these lands would soon pass into the hands of capitalists, and that the public debt, then amounting to about 42,000,000 dollars, would be paid before any of the political divisions of the Northwestern Territory should gain a population of sixty thousand, and be prepared for admission into the Union. Of the twenty five millions annually paid into your Treasury, your receipts from lands have frequently been less than one million. And this result has several times happened, when you had, at present, more than one hundred millions of acres in market. Your land system has been in operation about forty years, and your whole receipts, from that source of revenue, has not exceeded 36,000,000 dollars; and this sum is chargeable with heavy incidental expenditures in collecting. The million derived from this source, can, if the means of the Government are insufficient without it, be assessed on other objects, and this Government would be relieved from a distracting subject, which, in the very fact of your time, in legislating about it, and in the cost of its necessary details, consumes half its own amount.

But, sir, there is another point of view to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senate. The amount of lands with which this amendment has any thing to do, does not exceed 200 millions of acres, the quantity contained in the new States; while the whole amount of the public domain is estimated at 10 or 1100,000,000. And of the 200,000,000, more than 50 are already disposed of, in military bounties, sales, and donations; 800 or 900,000,000 would still be left in the Territories and further West, to the undisputed control of the Federal Government.

The public lands should be ceded to the States in which they lie, because their present condition is not warranted by the letter of the Constitution of this Government. The Government of the Union is one of limited and specified power. It was framed with a cautious jealousy of its encroachment upon the States, and with the view of transferring from them, and to it, no powers which they could exercise; no powers except those which are, in their character, national, and necessary for national purposes. Its powers are carefully enumerated and specified; and so jealous were its framers, that, after every specification contained in it, it is expressly inhibited the exercise of any powers, except those delegated to itself, or prohibited to the States. We shall search in vain for any clause in the Constitution, which prohibits to the States the exercise of any powers connected with the public lands. In all the original States, this power has always been exercised by the States. We shall search in vain for any clause in the Constitution, which authorizes a control over the principal object of sovereignty in the States—their public lands. It cannot be appendant to the word Territory, in the fourth article of the Constitution; for Territory, in our Constitution, our laws, and our history, signifies a region of country without the limits of a State, in, and over which, a Territorial Government is established.

We say the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, the Territory of Michigan, &c.; but, when we speak of the public lands, we say the public lands in those Territories; the public lands in the States. The one term signifies a political division of the country. The other is a term by which we designate property.

The exercise of this power by Congress, is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, which aspires to national objects, unlike that under consideration—national concerns, such as the States are incompetent to legislate upon. The interests submitted to the Federal Government, are those of peace and of war, of the Army, the Navy, and the foreign relations of the country, and of such system of finance, as may be found necessary to give active energy to these great interests. One of the principal difficulties in the formation of this Government, was, to designate the boundary betwixt it and the States; and it seems to have been the care of its framers, to avoid, as much as possible, all municipal legislation; the regulation of all local and domestic concerns. It seems to have been intended, that the Federal Government should not engage in that which the States were competent to do. Now, sir, test the present case by any of these rules, and we must come to the conclusion, that, with this matter, the Federal Government has nothing to do. The Public Lands create a field of municipal legislation, inconsistent with its general purposes, and the evident intention of its framers. And, if in any degree correct in this view, the compacts are unwarranted by the Constitution; and, if so, are not binding on the States.

I deny, sir, the Constitutional power of this Government to hold lands within the limits of the States, except for the purposes designated by the Constitution; such as forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings: and, to enable Congress to hold lands even for these purposes, the consent of the Legislatures of the States is declared to be necessary, by the express language of the Constitution. In a question of such vital importance to the new States, it would surely not be thought unreasonable, that they should scrutinize the power which takes from them the public lands within their limits, impairs their sovereignty, and deprives them of equality with the original States. It would be, at least, some consolation to know, that the power which prostrates them at the feet of the Union, which assigns them a level lower than that of the original States, is based on the Constitution.

The power, Mr. President, of the States to make compacts is one thing, and the Constitution of the United States is another. And, although the States may have the power to make compacts, by which a portion of their sovereignty may be alienated, yet it does not follow of course, that they have a right to transfer such sovereign power to the Union, or that the Union could receive or exercise such power. The boundary separating Federal and State powers, may be considered the stability of our political system. This boundary may not be passed by either, for any purpose; neither to usurp nor to transfer power: for, in either way, would our system be deranged, and the Constitution suffer violence. A State may have the power of destroying her own Constitution, though totally destitute of power to interfere with the Constitution of another State, or with that of the Union. Suppose a State to determine on its own dissolution: Could it transfer all its powers, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, to the Federal Government? And, if a State could so transfer its powers, could this Government receive such transfer, or exercise such powers? Surely not: if one jot or tittle of power, not given by the Constitution, can be acquired or exercised in such way as this, then farewell to the guards against usurpation of power, placed by the wisest and best of men around the Constitution: Farewell to the sovereignty of the States.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

[JAN. 28, 1828.]

Establish this doctrine, and we may live to see a consolidation of all power in the hands of this Government. Then, indeed, would the Constitution have prescribed in vain the mode of its own amendment. Vain would be the provision that two-thirds of Congress, or of the States, should agree in calling a Convention to propose amendments, and that three-fourths of the States should be necessary to ratify such amendments, if the Constitution can be changed by transfers of power from individual States, or by compacts with the several States.

I lay it down, sir, as a proposition not to be resisted, that the rights of soil and taxation are inseparable from the sovereignty of every independent State; and to sustain this proposition, no other proof seems to be necessary than well established definitions. What, sir, is sovereignty? And what is a State? Go to writers on national law, or to the ablest expositions of our most enlightened statesmen, for answers to these questions. We shall here, no doubt, be told, that nothing can be found in national law applicable to our affairs. But we must be permitted at least to hope, that the sovereignty of the States is not so perfectly destroyed by the formation of the General Government, as not to be recognized by the principles of international law. It is, perhaps, by all writers on such subjects, taken as an axiom, that the public domain is the first grand object of sovereignty in every independent State. In proof of this proposition, I shall refer the Senate to some authorities. Vattel, page 165, says, that "the general domain of the nation over the lands it inhabits, is naturally connected with the empire; for, establishing itself in a vacant country, the nation certainly did not pretend to have the least dependence there on any other power; and how should an independent nation avoid having authority at home? How should it govern itself at its pleasure in the country it inhabits, if it cannot truly and absolutely dispose of it? And how should it have the full and absolute domain of the place in which it has no command? Another's sovereignty, and the right it comprehends, must take away its freedom of disposal."

This authority would, itself, be abundantly sufficient to prove the proposition laid down. The high character of its author must be set at naught, or it cannot be resisted. But I shall make another quotation from the same book, which, if the author of the compilation had written with our system before him, and with reference to no other form of government, could not be more applicable to our affairs. It is to be found at page 3, and is in these words: "Several sovereign and independent States may unite themselves together by a perpetual confederacy, without each, in particular, ceasing to be a perfect State. They will form together a Federal republic. The deliberations in common, will offer no violence to the sovereignty of each member, though they may, in certain respects, put some constraint on the exercise of it, in virtue of voluntary engagements."

And what is the condition of the new States, respecting their public lands? What we complain of, is, that you have not only put restraint on the sovereignty of the new States, but that you have taken that sovereignty entirely away.

I will, Mr. President, trouble the Senate with but one other quotation from this author. It is to be found at page 165, in these words:

"What is called the high domain, which is nothing but the domain of the body of the nation, or of the sovereign who represents it, is every where considered as inseparable from the sovereignty."

The authority of Vattel is strong and very positive. He lays it down as a proposition incontrovertible, that the right of disposing of the soil, the right of high domain, is inseparable from the sovereignty. Look, too, at the decisions of the Supreme Court, and surely this authority will be considered in point. In the case of Fletcher against Peck, 6 Cranch, 128, Judge Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the Court, says:

"That the Legislature of Georgia, unless restrained by its own Constitution, possess the power of disposing of the unappropriated lands within its own limits, in such manner as its own judgment shall dictate, is a proposition not to be controverted."

And in the case of Martin against Hunter, 1 Wheaton 325: "The sovereign powers vested in the State Governments by their respective constitutions, remain unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they are granted to the Government of the United States."

These authorities are in direct sustenance of the sovereignty of the States. The doctrines of international law, and the authority of the supreme Court, are alike clear and positive, and establish the proposition that the public domain is inseparable from State sovereignty.

But, again, sir, the public lands ought to be given up to the States, because, in their present condition, they stir up and perpetuate distracting political questions. The question of internal improvements is one of that kind. On this subject, there seems to be as yet no compromise of opinion. The new States must adhere to their opinions, and the old States are not likely to yield. It is a very singular fact, that, while a large minority of both branches of the National Legislature deny that Congress have the constitutional power to construct roads and canals, while they persist in saying, that, in constitutional questions, precedents are entitled to no respect; that, although beaten to-day, on an appropriation for a road or canal, they will rally to-morrow, and fight the battle over again—yet, by the compacts with the new States, this Government stands bound to appropriate five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands to these very objects. Two-fifths of these appropriations are to be expended, under the direction of Congress, in making roads and canals to the States; and three-fifths to be expended under the direction of the Legislatures of the States, to those objects within the States.

If Congress have no constitutional power to construct roads and canals, there is no power in existence to carry these compacts into execution: and yet this five per cent. is the principal consideration the new States have for not interfering with the primary disposal of the soil. The enemies of internal improvements say they have no power in the Constitution to make roads and canals: but they are bound by compact, with all the new States, to make roads and canals for their benefit. Surely, then, according to their own construction, they must either give up the compacts or the Constitution. But, Sir, strange as it may seem, many members of both Houses, who strongly deny the power of Congress in reference to internal improvements, adhere with much pertinacity to the compacts, because the moment they are abandoned, the public lands will unquestionably belong to the States.

The question of internal improvements is one which the new States, in the present condition of the public lands, can never yield. It is in vain to expect, that, while the lands belong to the Federal Government; while millions are drained from the country into the Treasury of the Union—these States will cease to ask aids for the improvement of their country in roads and canals. It is reasonable that they should so ask. The new States have recently seen New York finish her splendid canal. They see Pennsylvania in progress with one no less splendid. They see other States carrying on other public works. These States have all derived revenues, almost inexhaustible, from their public lands; and Pennsylvania, though one of the oldest States, has not yet exhausted that great source of revenue: for, on a recent occasion, she has pledged the revenues to be derived therefrom to the progress of the canal.

Public Lands.—Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

[SENATE.]

The public lands in the hands of the new States, would put those States on an equal footing with the original States. They would be sources of revenue for the improvement of those States, and they would relieve their agricultural interests, from the heavy burdens they at present bear to sustain their Treasury. Few of the old States are reduced to the necessity of a land-tax to meet their current expenditures; but the new States, having few objects of taxation, lay heavy contributions on their agricultural interests for that purpose. Almost all the circulating medium of the new States, is drained into the Treasury of the United States, by the operation of the land offices, and the lands thus purchased, are taxed heavily to support the State Governments. In no portion of the Union is agriculture so much burthened as in the new States.

The public lands should be given up to the States, because the revenue derived from them is a tax on those States, and has an impoverishing effect upon them. This opinion I know will be controverted. It will be said that every man that buys land, must expect to pay for it, and that it is no difference to whom that payment is made. It will also be said, that the means of paying for these lands, are generally taken from the old States to the new, by purchasers, emigrants to the country. It is true, sir, that it makes little difference to the person paying out his last dollar, to whom he pays it; but to the country, it is very important. If he pays it into a land office, it passes immediately out of the country into the Treasury here. If he pays it to his neighbor, it remains in the country, and makes a part of its circulating medium. In the one case, every dollar in the country might be employed in the purchase of lands among the citizens, and there would not be a dollar the less of money in the country. In the other case, every dollar would be gone out of the country. A citizen emigrates from an old State to a new, and lays out his money for land. What has the country gained? His person only. The title to a tract of land is changed from the Federal Government to a citizen; but he is, for the present, impoverished. He increases the demand for a circulating medium in the country, but he adds not a dollar to that medium.

Mr. President, there is no prospective evil too delicate to name, and none, however remote, unworthy our vigilant attention. We legislate not only for the present, but for other times; and it is our duty to guard our free institutions against every thing likely to interfere with the peaceful prosperity of the country at a future day. In this view, sir, the lands ought to be given up to the States, for a reason stronger than any heretofore named; because, in their present condition, they offer to the new States the strongest inducement to a severance of the Union. What, sir, is patriotism? It is the love of country. And can the love of country ever be indifferent to the ownership of the soil, and the tenure by which it is held? Can the People of the new States—and there are no people on earth more patriotic—be indifferent to the fact, that the soil of their country belongs to the Federal Government, and not to themselves? Suppose the Union to be dissolved, and where would be the public lands? All controversy about them would then cease. They would belong to the States in which they lie. Look at the great inducement to this state of things: Look at the character and extent of this country—How capable of self government, and its own independence. Seven of the largest States of the Union. The finest country on earth. The whole valley of the Mississippi. The noblest rivers on the globe. With three millions of inhabitants. A safe and sheltered sea board, with a commanding position, for a large participation in the commerce of the West Indies, South America, and Mexico. But the People of these States are devoted to the Union. You cannot drive them from the Union. They are attached to our Republican institutions, and proud of the trophies and achievements of the Revolution. They wish to perpetuate to future ages, the liberties of their country and the union of the States. They wish to preserve inviolate the Constitution, and ask for that justice which will place them on an equal footing with the original States; which will place in their hands the first attribute of sovereignty—the soil of their country. I trust they will not ask in vain.

Mr. BRANCH replied in opposition to the amendments and the bill generally; when, on motion of Mr. PARRIS, the bill was postponed, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill providing for certain surviving officers of the revolution: the following motion of Mr. PARRIS being still under consideration:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee which reported it, with instructions to provide for the payment of every officer, non-commissioned officer, and private soldier, who served in the revolutionary army, and who was entitled to pay from the Continental Treasury, for the service by him actually performed, deducting therefrom the just value of whatever such officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, may have received from the Government, in payment for his said service; and deducting, also, whatever sum he may have received, if any, under the pension law of March 1818, and May 1820.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that the point of order presented on Friday last, relating to motions for recommitment of subjects to select Committees, was decided by him on parliamentary principles; but he had since found that the practice of the Senate was different. [He then read the rule from Jefferson's Manual.] The parliamentary rule was more convenient, and he would now submit the point for decision to the Senate.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that if the Senator from Maine would withdraw his motion, the Senate would be relieved from the difficulty presented by the question of order, and the gentleman would, without embarrassing the committee, have an opportunity to move amendments in the committee of the whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, suggested that the committee could be revived for the purpose of a recommitment.

Mr. PARRIS said that he was unwilling to withdraw his motion, unless with an understanding that he should have an opportunity to renew it. He had an object in his motion, which he should take occasion, at a proper time, to explain.

The VICE PRESIDENT made some further explanations as to the point of order, stating that on parliamentary principles, a motion to recommit was tantamount to a motion to revive the Committee; but such had not been the practice of the Senate, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, if no objection was made by any Senator, it might be taken and considered that the motion was in order: when after some further remarks from Mr. SILSBEE and the VICE PRESIDENT, no objection being made, it was considered as settled that the motion was in order.

Mr. PARRIS said that his object was not, as had been surmised, to embarrass the bill by objections, or to defeat it by delay. He wished to further its progress. He was anxious that the bill should make a proper provision for the soldiers, but he would not say that, if he could not accomplish his views in regard to the soldiers, he would not vote for the separate provision for the officers. His object was to provide both for the officers and soldiers; they had contended side by side for their country's cause; and, in the distribution of the bounty or justice of their country, they should not be separated. There were many survivors of the contest who had no claims.

The six months' militia men had, to this day, a claim on the States, severally, by which they were raised, but not on the Government. But there were regiments on the Continental establishment, as efficient as any others in the service, which had received no compensation, in any way. If we gave to the officers a part of the sum due to them, we should pay the soldiers in the same proportion; and if our finances enable us to pay the officers the whole of their claims, the whole sum due to the soldiers should likewise be discharged. It was unnecessary to speak, at this time, of the merits and the sufferings of the soldiers. The story had often been told in this House, and it was matter of record. It was said by the Senator from New-Hampshire, that the half-pay was promised to the officers as an inducement for them to remain in the service. The soldiers were entitled to their monthly pay, as well as the officers to their half-pay for life; and if the officers had been paid in depreciated paper, so had been the soldiers. In one respect, the officers had a great advantage over the soldiers. If the officers were, by hard fare or bad usage, disgusted with the service, they could throw up their commissions and turn their backs upon the camp. But the soldiers, though suffering from want of food and clothing, were obliged, for the whole term of their enlistment, to perform the last day's service as well as the first; and if they left the camp, they were pursued by martial law and punished as deserters. If any discrimination were made, it should, therefore, be in favor of the soldiers. Both officers and soldiers should be provided for, and that alike. Let it not be the business of this House to create a distinction between them. It had been objected to the proposition for remunerating the soldiers, that the sum required would be very large. This was an unfounded objection. It would not equal the amount annually paid to those on the pension list. He took as the basis of his calculation the statement made by the Senator from Maryland, Mr. SMITH. That gentleman stated, that four-fifths of the surviving soldiers were on the pension roll. This number will be excluded from the provisions of the bill. The whole number of pensioners was now 12,500. Five hundred, it was computed, would die this year. The one-fifth part, embraced in the provision, was 2,400. Two hundred dollars to each of these was but $ 480,000—not half the amount of the pensions. The provisions which he proposed would embrace another class of soldiers, which was not provided for by any existing law. One regiment, he knew, for documentary proof of the fact was in the Capitol, had entered the service with the promise of pay and eighty dollars bounty; they served faithfully, and never received one farthing—Justice, concluded Mr. P., should not be dealt out with a partial hand. If it was rendered to one class, it should not be withheld from another. But if we were not able to do full justice to all, he would not say that he would do nothing.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, said the subject had been before Congress many years, and amendments had always been offered, and sometimes adopted, by which the bill was lost. He wished now to take the question on the bill providing for the officers, alone; and he hoped the Senate would say, decisively, whether they would fulfil the compact with the officers or not. If not, he did not think that the old officers would trouble us any more. He was opposed to the recommitment. When the bill had passed, provision might be made for the soldiers.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he approached the discussion of the bill under consideration with a degree of solicitude he had seldom experienced. It arose from a deep consciousness of the importance and delicacy of the subject, and the difficulties which would attend a satisfactory determination. He freely confessed, that he did not remember a legislative question in which his feelings had been more deeply engaged. These feelings, sometimes too sanguine, and always ardent, might now deceive him; but he could not suppress the conviction, that, upon the doubtful issue of the present question, the character of our country was, in no inconsiderable degree, suspended. It would, indeed, have afforded him the highest gratification, could he anticipate with confidence a favorable result. But when he beheld the formidable concentration of talent and numbers arrayed against the petitioners and their advocates, he was but too conscious of the difficulties against which they had to contend. Undeterred, however, by these circumstances, he would proceed to discharge the duty which seemed to be required by his connexion with the committee by whom the bill had been reported.

His brethren of the committee, said Mr. V. B., had pronounced a merited eulogium upon the character and services of the petitioners. Considerations which arose naturally from the subject, but upon which, although far from being exhausted, he would not attempt to dwell. Indeed, he was greatly deceived, if, on this point, there was any diversity of opinion. Whatever expressions might escape from gentlemen in the warmth of debate, he was sure that the transcendent merits of the petitioners, after having received the attestation of impartial history, were not now to be the subject of examination or of doubt. Sir, if, in the mysterious dispensations of an all-wise and over-ruling Providence, we, too, are doomed to experience the common calamities of nations, it may become our duty to receive these dispensations with meekness, and bear them with fortitude. But if there be a stain from which he would be most desirous of rescuing the American name, it would be the stain of ingratitude to the surviving officers of the Revolution. If there be a calamity which, more than any other, he would pray to have averted, it would be the calamity of witnessing, in an American Senate, a cold insensibility to the services of those whose devotion to their country in peace, and whose constancy in war, had extorted the applause of an admiring world.

If, sir, gallantry in the field, and devotion to country, ever deserved the meed of grateful remembrance, the encomiums bestowed by my colleagues upon the Revolutionary officers will find their approval in every patriot bosom. But their merits, great as they were, appear to be enhanced by the cause in which they were engaged. Revolutions in Government had been witnessed before, and they have been witnessed since. But if we consider the principles involved, the means employed, and the results produced, may I not be indulged in expressing the conviction that they dwindle into insignificance with this? The Revolution in which they embarked, was not only the most important, in civil government, that oppression has produced or patriotism accomplished, but must, in the nature of things, for ever remain so. The materials for another equally important, do not, I fear, exist; and, perhaps, the progressive character of man precludes a well-grounded hope that they will ever again arise. Why, sir, said he, do I allude to these high considerations? Not, I am sure, for the purpose of display; and as little with a view to indulge in self adulation. It is because the unparalleled blessings, which, as a people, we enjoy; the great and successful example that has been given to the world; and the perpetual influence which that example must exert on its future destinies—awaken in every mind the most intense anxiety, lest the closing scenes of that mighty conflict should be unworthy of its own great character—and that the page of history which embalms the virtues and heroic deeds of our fathers, may not at the same time record the too early degeneracy of their sons. The petitioners at your bar are destined to be our witnesses with posterity. It is in their persons that an opportunity is afforded, either to repel, or in some degree, confirm the imputation cast upon Republics by the enemies of freedom, that ingratitude is their inherent and inextinguishable vice : and it was earnestly to be hoped that our decision might be such as would be favorable to them, to ourselves, and to the cause of liberty.

But, sir, said Mr. V. B., instead of pursuing these general remarks, allow me to invite your attention to the question immediately under consideration. In doing so, my first attempt will be to separate that which is not a subject of dispute from that which is : for in this, as in other cases, time may be consumed, and arguments fruitlessly employed, in supporting positions which have never been questioned, or enforcing opinions in which all are agreed.

First, then, it will be admitted, on all sides, that the promise made by the Congress of the Confederation of half pay for life to the Revolutionary officers serving to the end of the war, was made by competent authority : that the condition upon which the promise was founded has been fully performed : that the obligation thereby created rests upon the present Government in its original force : and that if it has not been fully, fairly, and justly performed, it ought now to be discharged. The critical condition of the country at the time the promise was made—the fact that this inducement to remain in service had been held up to the Army from the commencement of the war, by various resolves of Congress—that this alone prevented their abandonment of a service, in which they were not bound to remain by any of those considerations which operate on the generality of mankind—that to their continuance in the Army, more than to any other cause, under the blessings of Providence, the successful termination of the war was, in the opinion of Gen. Washington, mainly attributable, and that the sacrifices which they incurred, in consequence of their determination to remain, were almost unparalleled—are points upon which there can be no difference of opinion, and requiring, after the able comments of the Senators who had preceded him, no additional illustration.

If this, sir, said Mr. V. B. has been the unquestionable engagement of the Government, if the petitioners are thus entitled to its fulfilment by the performance of the sole condition on which it was made to depend—the question will be asked, has that engagement been satisfied ? And if satisfied, how has it been done ?

Those who maintain that the Government had fulfilled its engagement, rest their position on the ground of the commutation of the five years' full pay, which has been given in lieu of the promised half-pay for life. Whatever might be the diversity of sentiment with respect to the legality or the fairness of that commutation—the means by which it was effected—and the manner of its execution—and on these points he acknowledged there was room for an honest difference of opinion : there was one position, he thought, sufficiently plain to challenge the acquiescence of every reflecting mind. It is, sir, that this commutation tendered by the Government as a complete fulfilment of its promise, has been any thing but a fair and just equivalent. To demonstrate this, a few observations only will be necessary.

The intelligent Chairman of the Committee, who reported the bill, whose ability in the exhibition of the claims of the petitioners would entitle him to more than the humble tribute of respect, which it was in his power to render, had submitted to the Senate statements and calculations establishing the following results :

1. That, according to authentic tables for the computation of annuities, the five years' half-pay, ought to have been acres, at the time it was given, in order to make it a fair equivalent, and that the reduction of this just allowance was attributable to the necessities of the Government, and not to a disposition to elude the claims of the petitioners.

2. That, owing to the failure of the States to supply the funds necessary to the payment of the interest, and ultimate redemption of the principal, of the "commutation certificates," these commutation certificates for five years' full pay, given as an equivalent for half-pay for life, rapidly depreciated. So that, when compelled by necessity to dispose of them, they in fact produced to the officers less than one year's pay.

3. That when these commutation certificates were funded in 1791, a deduction was made equal to one third of their amount, by deferring the interest for ten years, upon one-third of the principal, and allowing only three per cent. on the interest which had accrued since 1783.

That this deduction was made by the Government, on the ground (and could be justified on no other,) that these certificates were in the hands of speculators, who had availed themselves of the necessities of the officers, brought upon them by their stipulated continuance in service, and thus were enabled to obtain them at a reduced and almost nominal price.

Mr. V. B. said he would refrain from attempting to enforce the views, upon this branch of the subject, presented by the Senators who had preceded him. It would be time enough to do so, should these views be ever contested. He candidly acknowledged, however, that they did not constitute the material arguments upon which he relied, for the purpose of showing the gross inadequacy of the commutation awarded to the petitioners : and he would therefore proceed to state the grounds upon which he predicated his proposition, with all the brevity and perspicuity in his power.

The certificates for commutation of half pay, were issued under the resolution of March, 1783, and delivered in November, 1783. They admitted upon their face, that five years' full pay was due to their holders, to be paid with interest, at the rate of six per centum per annum. These certificates were redeemed by the operation of the funding act in 1791. They were, of course, for different amounts, according to the respective ranks of the officers. The average pay of the officers was $30 per month, and the amount which would have been due to each officer for half pay, allowing interest after the same was acknowledged to be due, would have amounted in 1791, when the redemption took place, to $1,742 40. The average amount of five years' full pay for each officer, amounted with interest, in 1791, to $2,664 00 ; from this amount one third was deducted in the redemption, as he had before stated. The average amount therefore received by each officer in 1791, for his five years' full pay, assuming that these certificates had been retained, would have been $1,776 00.

From this simple statement it results that, in consequence of the delay in discharging the commutation, and the deduction which was forcibly made in doing so, the Government paid no more than would have been due to the officers for their half pay alone, up to the period when the commutation was actually made. To that period, therefore, the officers gained nothing by that measure. Since that time years have rolled away, during which they would have received the promised half pay, had it not been for the commutation. The sum which would have been payable to the officers since that period, is the sum precisely which the officers have lost, and the Government has gained, by this variation by the Government from its original contract.

This subject, said Mr. V. B. is simple, founded upon data which cannot deceive by their plausibility, and is liable to no mistake, except the mere errors of calculation. Those he had endeavored to avoid. The average half pay of each of the petitioners from the year 1791 to 1828, would have amounted to $13,177 83. This sum, multiplied by 230, the number of Revolutionary officers supposed to be yet in existence, would amount to $3,030,710. The effect of the commutation upon the Treasury, and upon the interests of deceased officers, could not be, said he, distinctly stated without a particular knowledge of the time of their respective deaths. But from what we know upon that subject, there was a moral certainty that the gains of the Treasury from that source had not been diminished, but on the contrary greatly increased.

It is then, said he, an ascertained and incontestible fact, that, in addition to all the injuries sustained by depreciation, the officers have lost by the course of events, and the Government has gained a sum not less than $3,030,710, in consequence of that commutation which is now set up to bar the claims of the petitioners—claims predicated upon a promise of the Government, held out to the officers as an inducement to remain, and constituting the chief reward for the most signal services ever performed by men in the cause of freedom and their country.

Upon these facts, said Mr. V. B., a question arises for our decision, no less important to the Government than to the petitioners; because, involving the character of the one, and the interests of the other. What is it? Is it confined to the legal rights and obligations of the parties? No, sir, I shall never, said he, bring my mind to consider the question of strict legal right, when I look at the parties. Who are they? On the one hand, the Government of the United States, not liable to be impeached, and incapable of being coerced against its will by any power superior to its own—rich in resources, and overflowing with redundancy: on the other a remnant of the officers of the Revolutionary army, borne down by the infirmities incident to age—with one foot in the grave, and the other upon the threshold of your door, supplicating the fulfilment of that promise which was made them, in the vigor of their days. If even they have legal rights, where is their remedy to enforce them? They cannot in the nature of things have any. But candor constrained him to acknowledge, that in strictness, they have not now, whatever they may once have had, any rights, except such as are founded upon the immutable principles of justice. As early as the year 1785, the Government found it necessary to protect itself against dormant and unfounded claims, arising from the Revolutionary contest, by a statute of limitations. Various acts and resolutions were passed upon the subject before the year 1793, more or less comprehensive in their terms: and in that year an act was passed so comprehensive in its provisions, as to embrace the claims of the petitioners, and barring them, unless presented by the 1st day of May, 1794. The officers did not present this claim until 1810, and are therefore precluded from urging their vested legal rights. Being thus furnished with a general answer to all claims which do not address both our consciences and judgments, Congress have nevertheless relaxed, from time to time, the rigor of their own act, when considering claims founded on justice, and not opposed by policy. But as none of these suspensions have embraced the case of the petitioners, we have it in our power, if we can have the heart to present this statute of limitations to the petitioners, and under its mantle, resist the cry for justice, if not for bread. The question, then, is not what we are bound to do by law, but what we should do. What conduct on our part will bear the scrutiny and the judgments of impartial men, when the opportunity to remedy the consequences of our decision shall have passed away?

Let us look, for a moment, said Mr. V. B. at the arguments advanced by the opponents of the bill. The meritorious services of the petitioners, the signal advantages that have resulted from these services to us, and to posterity; the losses sustained by the petitioners, and the consequent advantages derived by the government from the act of commutation, are unequivocally admitted. But, it is contended, we have made a compromise, legally binding on the parties, and exonerating the government, from further liability, that in an evil and unguarded hour, they have given us a release and we stand upon our bond. Now the question which he wished to address to the conscience, and the judgments of this honorable body, was this—not whether this issue was well taken in point of law—not whether we might not hope for a safe deliverance under it—but whether the issue ought to be taken at all—whether it comports with the honor of the Government to plead a legal exemption against the claims of gratitude—whether, in other words, the government be bound at all times to insist upon its strict legal rights. Has this been the practice of the Government on all former occasions? Or, is this the only question on which this principle should operate? Nothing, said Mr. V. B., can be easier than to show that the uniform practice of the Government has been at war with the principle which is now opposed to the claim of the petitioners. Not a session had occurred since the commencement of this Government, in which Congress had not relieved the citizens from hardships resulting from unforeseen contingencies—and forborne an enforcement of law, when its enforcement would work great and undesired injury. He might, if excusable on an occasion like this, turn over the statute book, page by page, and give repeated proofs of this assertion. But it is unnecessary. He would content himself with a reference to one or at most two measures of the character described. In the year 1812, between the months of June and September, goods to an immense amount were shipped from England to the United States, by American merchants, in open violation of the acts prohibiting their importation. They alleged in justification, either their anticipated repeal of these acts, in consequence of the measures of one of the belligerents; or their apprehension that in the event of a declaration of war by the United States, their property would be seized and condemned in the British ports. The declaration, in fact, took place; but the importers were not the less liable to the fines and penalties imposed by a violated law, and merchandise to the value of more than twenty millions of dollars was forfeited to the United States. Upon the arrival of the goods, the owners were permitted to retain and use them, upon giving bonds to abide the decision of their Government. Application was made to Congress for relief: and although it was well known that immense profits were made upon their importation, and not a doubt existed of their liability to forfeiture, Congress, by an act which fills but a single page upon that statute book, cancelled the bonds and relinquished merchandise, which, if retained, would have been equal in value to one-fourth of the whole expenses of the war, and which would doubtless have been retained had the Government insisted upon its legal rights, and acted on the principle now contended for.

The system which has been pursued in relation to the purchasers of public lands, is not a less memorable example of a departure from that rigorous policy now recommended to our imitation.

By the act of 10th May, 1800, the minimum price of the public lands was fixed at $2 the acre; one-twentieth of the purchase money was required to be paid at the time of the purchase, one-fourth in 40 days; the balance, with interest, was payable by instalments of 2, 3, and 4 years; and the forfeiture of the land was the declared penalty of non-payment.

By the act of the 26th March, 1804, no interest was to be charged upon instalments for future purchases, if punctually paid, and this provision, in favor of the purchaser, was extended to those whose instalments should become due before the following October.

Under this liberal system, yielding to the government but little more than the necessary expenses of surveying the lands, supporting the various land offices, and providing for the holder a secure landed title, a debt accumulated prior to the year 1820, from the purchasers to the United States, amounting to twenty-two millions of dollars.

Before that time repeated indulgencies had been granted, extending the times of payment, preventing the forfeitures which would have accrued, and, in numerous instances, allowing a re-entry, or a new purchase of lands, improved, and forfeited to the Government upon the terms of the original purchase. No less than six acts were passed from the year 1813 to 1820, to suspend the forfeiture and sale of the lands thus purchased. The evil, however, had swelled beyond the reach of palliatives. A debt of 22 million of dollars exceeded the ability, blighted the prospects, and deadened the energies of the States by whom it was due. Had the law been enforced and payment inflexibly exacted, nearly the whole of the lands thus purchased and improved, would have been forfeited to the Union, and many an honest yeoman would have been compelled to relinquish to more fortunate strangers those woods and lawns which he vainly hoped would be the solace of his declining years. To prevent this calamity, the Government interposed, and by an act of liberality having few parallels in history, arrested the forfeitures; authorized the relinquishment of lands for which the purchasers were unable to pay; and the application of whatever sums had been paid to the payment of so much only as they thought proper to retain; cancelled the accumulated interest; extended the term of credit for that portion of the lands retained; and by a subsequent act passed in 1824, consented to receive as a full payment for these lands, less than two-thirds of the amount actually due. Nor was this all: by the act of 1821, the price of the lands was reduced from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents; and he who had surrendered lands purchased at the highest sum was enabled to re-enter the same lands, if not sold at public sale, at the reduced price. Sir, said Mr. V. B., by the best estimate that I am able to make on referring to the only documents within my reach, this donation to the purchasers of public lands could not have been less than seven millions and a half and probably has not been short of ten millions of dollars. But the exact amount is not material to the elucidation of the principle from which it flowed; and in considering its value, who, that can cast his eyes upon those extensive regions, where tranquillity has succeeded to dissipation, and prosperity to ruin, will attempt to estimate it by the scale of dollars and cents?

It appears, then, said Mr. V. B., that it has not been the practice of the Government to act the part of Shylock with its citizens; and God forbid that it should make its debut, on the present occasion, not so much in the character of a merciless creditor, as a reluctant, though wealthy, debtor; withholding the merited pittance from those to whose noble daring and unrivalled fortitude, we are indebted for the privilege of sitting in judgment on their claims; and manifesting more sensibility for the purchasers of our lands than for those by whose bravery they were won; and, but for whose achievements, these very purchasers, instead of being the proprietors of their soil, and the citizens of free and sovereign States, might now be the miserable vassals of some worthless favorite of arbitrary power.

If disposed to be less liberal to the Revolutionary officers than to other classes of the community, let us at least testify our gratitude by relieving their sufferings, and returning a portion of those immense gains which have been the glorious fruits of their toil, and of their blood.

Such, said Mr. V. B. would, in his judgment be a correct view of the subject, had the government relieved itself from all further liability by the most ample and unexceptionable performance of its stipulations. How much stronger, then, will be their appeal to your justice, if it can be shown that you have no right to urge this act of commutation as a complete fulfilment of your promise? The act of commutation is impeached by the petitioners—first, on account of the means by which it was effected; and, secondly, because the stipulations of that act have never been fulfilled.

The petitioners with reason complained that without ever having consented to be bound by the acts of their brother officers, their personal rights were made to depend upon the decision of the lines, and not upon their own individual assent. This is admitted to have been the fact. Two months were allowed to the officers of the lines, under the immediate command of Gen. Washington; and six months to those of the Southern army, to give their assent to the compromise. It does not appear that the lines of the Southern army ever gave their assent. Indeed it is stated by a distinguished Revolutionary officer on this floor, (Gen. S. SMITH,) that they never did. It does not appear that there ever was a meeting of the officers of the Northern army, for the purpose of deciding upon the question: and it is affirmed that there was none. To assume, then, that the assent of each individual was given under circumstances like these, appears to my mind harsh and unjust. But it is alleged, in extenuation, that the compromise was made upon the petition of the officers themselves. Let this be admitted: did the application for a just equivalent for the promised half pay for life, confer on Congress the right to prescribe the terms? Will it justify the allowance of less than that to which they were entitled? Will not the circumstances, under which this application was made, present a still stronger appeal to your liberality, if not your gratitude? Look, said Mr. V. B. at the acts of these brave and high-minded men, in whatever light you please; examine their conduct by the strictest scrutiny, and you will always find them exhibiting the purest principles and the most elevated patriotism. The half pay establishment for life, was, at that time, considered by the ardent advocates for liberty, as leading to the formation of an aristocratic body, and therefore, subversive of the principles of the revolution. An intimation like this, in the infancy of our institutions, however groundless in itself, was sufficient to excite alarm. The dangers of the past were overlooked in the apprehension for the future; the measure was reprobated, and these meritorious officers became the objects of unfounded jealousy. To quiet these unreasonable fears, the petitioners expressed their willingness to waive the literal fulfilment of the promise which had been given: to remove the cause which could have a tendency to deprive them of the confidence of their fellow-citizens: to surrender the boon they had so dearly purchased; and, in addition to all that they had done, and to all that they had suffered, to offer up their future prospects upon the altar of their country. And could any thing be more preposterous than to attempt to found upon an act, originating in motives like these, the right to prescribe the terms of commutation? But it is alleged that the officers received the commutation certificates, and, by doing so, must be presumed to have assented to their being considered a full satisfaction of their demands. This inference was, in his opinion, removed by the peculiar circumstances under which the certificates were given. These circumstances said Mr. V. B. are not unworthy of the deliberate attention of the Senate. Previous to October, 1783, and subsequent to the time when the signature of the preliminary articles of peace was known to the army, frequent applications had been made, in their behalf, to Congress, for an adjustment of accounts, and payment of the large arrearages which were due. These applications were fruitless. The failure of the States to comply with the requisitions of Congress, deprived that body of the means of discharging their engagement: and with a full sense of the services and privations of the army, and of the injustice they were about to commit, Congress were on the point of disbanding them, unpaid and unrequited, and sending them penniless and almost naked to their homes. The effect of this anticipated measure upon minds sensibly alive to indignity and injury may be easily imagined:—At the moment when passion might have triumphed over reason, the army was addressed by an anonymous writer, on the subject of their wrongs, with a degree of eloquence calculated to redeem, if any thing could redeem, the vicious tendency of his principles. He admonished them of the futility of their complaints, and urged them, by every motive that could be addressed to their hopes and to their fears, to change the supplicatory style of a memorial to language more becoming those who had the means of redress within their hands. At that perilous moment, on the events of which were suspended the honor of the army and the future welfare of the country, their commander-in-chief appeared amongst them. He conjured them to give one more distinguished proof of unexampled patriotism, patience and virtue; to rise superior to the most complicated sufferings, and by the dignity of their conduct, give posterity occasion to say, when speaking of their glorious example—"Had this day been wanting, the world had never seen the last stage of perfection, which human nature is capable of attaining."

They listened to the voice of their beloved commander, followed his advice, surrendered their arms—and sunk, penniless, into the ranks of private life. In the succeeding month, the certificates of commutation were tendered, by the Pay-Master General, who requested only an acknowledgment of their receipt, while in relation to the final settlement certificates for their pay, he required a full discharge of their demands. The certificates thus tendered, were accepted, and in almost every case, immediately sold, for the purpose of satisfying the most urgent necessities of nature. He asked the Senate whether it would comport with the dignity and honor of a great and magnanimous people, to avail themselves of an acceptance extorted by circumstances like these; and to urge it as sufficient to bar the claims of justice, and divest their protectors in the hour of danger, of their stipulated reward?

But it has been said, that this commutation excited no dissatisfaction at the time; that the complaints upon the subject, are of recent date, and now, for the first time, thought of as a plausible support to an unfounded claim. The Senator from S. C. [Mr. SMITH,] who has been impelled, by a sense of duty, to assume the unpleasant task of zealously opposing the bill upon your table, has enquired, with much apparent triumph, whether a single individual could be pointed out who had refused the commutation? He assured the worthy Senator that he had adopted an erroneous impression. When tendered, it was received with universal discontent, and by the junior officers, who were most likely to be injured, with decided reprobation. Had an opportunity for inquiry been allowed, he had no doubt of being able to designate many who had refused. At the moment he could refer the senator to Major Gadsden, of his own State, whose petition on the subject had been presented to the Senate; and if respect for the feelings of an honorable member before him, did not render it improper to drag the name of his venerable father into the debate, he could name another veteran soldier of the Revolution,* the confidant of Washington and the companion of Lafayette, who had served his country bravely and efficiently throughout the war, and who refused to receive the commutation, because violating, in his opinion, the leading principles of the Revolution, by subjecting his property to the decision of men whom he had never authorized to act in his name or stead. But, Sir, said Mr. V. B., what effect did the supposed injustice of his country have on this veteran soldier? Did it in the least damp his ardor in her cause? By no means. He belonged to a different school, and he gave the most palpable proof of the enduring quality of the principle of that school during the late war. On learning the approach of danger he repaired to this City. On the disastrous day of Bladensburg, he was found, at the advanced age of seventy, on horseback in the field, stimulating to exertions, by his example and exhortation. When the danger pressed the hardest he waited on the military commander of the day, and solicited the responsibility for the safety of the City, by being intrusted with the possession of this capitol, with a reasonable force for its defence. Denied in his application, mortified and humiliated by the results of the day, he found his way back to his home and the home of his family, where he still lives, blessed with the esteem of his friends, and the respect of all who know him.

But assuming, said Mr. V. B., that the act of commutation was just, in its inception, was it just in its execution? On this point, he thought there was no room for contrariety of opinion. An essential difference, he observed, existed between the claims for pay and subsistence of the army, and those arising from the stipulation of half pay for life. The former being payable during the war, when it was known that the finances were embarrassed, were properly subject to the depreciation of that period. But the promised half pay for life was expected to survive the period of embarrassment, and therefore to be payable in the sound currency of the country. Some of the reasons which inclined the officers to accept a commutation have already been noticed. The necessity of obtaining pecuniary means to enable them to embark in other pursuits, formed a no less prevalent inducement. To effect this object, it was obviously necessary that the equivalent to be received should be promptly paid or adequately secured. The act of commutation did neither. It is surely not enough to say that the resolution of Congress prescribed that the commutation of five years full pay should be paid in securities, unless it can be shown that paper, absolutely worthless, was the security intended. Can it for a moment be supposed, that Congress meant to deceive their brave defenders, by holding out a "promise to the ear," only "to break it to their hopes?" No, Sir, they meant what they expressed, that the securities should be real, and not nominal; their repeated and earnest requisitions upon the States prove their intention; and nothing but the inherent weakness of the government, and the failure of the States to comply with the requisitions of Congress—an excuse fortunately not in our power to plead—prevented that venerated body from redeeming their engagements. But though the depreciation which followed was not attributable to Congress, its effect upon the officers was not the less fatal. Necessity, that waits not for times or seasons, compelled too many to carry their certificates into market, and the amount which they produced served but to realize the destruction of all their hopes. The few who retained them until 1791, experienced a loss not less severe than unexpected. It has already been stated that, by the operations of the funding system, one-third of the amount which the commutation certificates declared to be due was deducted by the government. The reason alleged for a measure apparently so destructive of public confidence and individual rights, was the well known fact, that by far the greater part were held by speculators who had purchased them at an inconsiderable price. Mr. Madison, it is true, endeavored to exempt the certificates in the hands of the officers from this deduction; but having failed in his attempt, the least necessitous of the officers were doomed to experience a diminution of their already insufficient commutation.

This act of commutation, therefore, is clearly liable to the objection :

1st. Of not being a just equivalent for the promised half-pay for life.

2dly. Of having been effected under circumstances, and by the operation of motives, which deprive it of all obligatory force, and entitle the officers to liberality instead of rigour.

3dly. Of partial and defective execution.

If, said Mr. V. B., no other obstacle were interposed to the claims of the petitioners than those to which he had alluded, fortified as they are, by facts not susceptible of misconstruction, and resting upon the plain and immutable principles of justice, no doubt could be entertained of your favorable decision. But he was apprehensive that other considerations would have their influence: that the claims of the petitioners would be clouded by dangers in prospective; and, that the fear of establishing a precedent by which the door of your Treasury would be unlocked to a crowd of applicants pleading their poverty, and urging their misfortunes, may induce you, in this case, to resist the strongest impulses of your hearts, if not the dictates of your judgments. Among the different grounds upon which this apprehension is founded, a leading one, he said, is, "That the bill did not embrace the cases of private soldiers, who might also have sustained injustice, and whose services were not less meritorious than those of the officers themselves."

Before I proceed, said Mr. V. B., to consider this objection, allow me to call your attention to one or two incidental remarks. A variety of persons, officers of the Army, who had not served to the end of the war—private soldiers, militia officers, and citizens who had borne the privations of that period, had been successively brought in review before the Senate; and their losses and sufferings, after having been forcibly depicted, were urged as a reason for the rejection of the claim of the petitioners.

If, said Mr. V. B., any thing could aggravate the injustice already inflicted upon the petitioners, it would be an objection like this. Had the claims of the persons alluded to been similar to those of the petitioners, the argument derived from an equality of right would be entitled to attention; but if dissimilar, let them be disjoined. The allowance of the one can constitute no ground for the admission of the other; and by uniting them together, you throw upon the petitioners the misfortunes of others, (misfortunes for which they are in no sense responsible,) in addition to their own.

Now, Sir, said Mr. V. B., it is easy to demonstrate that no similarity exists. What is the object of this bill? To repair a wrong in not having given a just equivalent in satisfaction of a promise of half-pay for life. Do the claims of any others rest upon a basis like this? Is it alleged that any such or similar engagement was made with the soldier? Most assuredly not. If, then, no similarity exist, an attempt to connect them would be plainly unjust.

I am aware, said Mr. V. B. of the imposing character of the argument that has been urged in favor of the claims of the common soldier. In a Government like ours, appeals in their favor cannot be made without effect. They derive their force from that all pervading jealousy of power, which is generally supposed to be the concomitant of official station and accidental elevation. Although not insensible to its influence, he was not disposed to complain of its effect; and when properly directed or controlled, he considered it necessary to the successful operation of our political system.

But, sir, said Mr. V. B., instead of yielding our judgments to favor on the one hand, or improper prejudice on the other; it became our duty as public men, to know no distinctions but those of merit, and no rule but that of justice. Was it true, then, he asked, that the partiality of the Government had inclined to the officer, in preference to the soldier? Is it not evident, on the contrary, that in every case the former has been treated with distrust, and the latter with indulgence. Upon what can the soldiers predicate a claim for additional compensation? Upon the ground of the depreciation, and no other. The losses of the officers, on this account, were as much greater than those of the soldier, as the relative difference of their pay; and yet this bill contains no provision in their favor upon that subject. This, then, can form no objection to the proposed allowance. But, sir, in relation to the relative condition of the officer and soldier when they entered the service, General Washington informs us in his letters to the States, contained in the book which I hold in my hand, that the private soldiers had this signal advantage over the officers. They received at the time of enlistment, from the States, by which they were raised, a bounty of from two to three hundred dollars, in good money, or provision for their families. No such advances were received by the officers. What, Sir, said Mr. V. B., has been the subsequent conduct of the Government? The average pay of the officers calculating from a colonel downwards, was forty dollars per month. That of the soldier was six dollars and a quarter.

Now, by the pension act of 1818, the allowance to officers and soldiers, reduced to poverty, was, for the officers, twenty dollars per month, and for the soldiers eight dollars per month. Giving to the officer less than half-pay, and to the soldier, more than full pay. So, said he, would it ever be. Whatever might be the declamatory appeals upon this subject, there was no danger that the partiality of Congress would ever be manifested for the officer, to the exclusion of the fair claims of the soldier. To prevent misapprehension, said Mr. V. B., I will proceed further. I have said, that I am not insensible to the feeling which had been so strongly pressed into the argument. As an evidence of the sincerity with which he spoke, he expressed his willingness to adopt any measure in favor of the soldier, that the gentleman opposed to him, could reasonably desire. Most of the soldiers, said Mr. V. B., had been placed upon the pension list. The limited number who had not, must average seventy years of age. Let, said he, a section be prepared, placing all who had enlisted for the war, upon the pension list, at eight dollars per month, without requiring evidence of poverty. For a measure like this, he would readily vote; if even more were proposed, it should receive his deliberate attention, and if possible, his concurrence. Frauds might be practised; but they would, of necessity, be of short duration. Even now, the expense would not be felt; in a few years it would cease to be remembered; while the fame that would attend it, would constitute one of the most valuable legacies to posterity that can be left behind us.

Instead, then, of opposing the bill because it contains no provision for the soldier, might he not with some propriety ask of gentlemen to propose a remedy for this defect, and not condemn for omission—whilst making no effort to have that omission supplied?

Another cause of apprehension from this bill, as a precedent, arises from the supposition that if it be intended to provide for losses incurred by the depreciation of commutation certificates, the Government will be bound to compensate for similar losses, whether incurred by the Army or the public creditors. These fears, said Mr. V. B. I consider visionary. The bill does not propose a compensation on account of depreciation. This would be impracticable, because no data could be obtained by which an estimate could be formed to justify a legislative act. The depreciation of the commutation certificates has been referred to solely for the purpose of enforcing the equity of a claim originating in a contract, never satisfied by the act of commutation, but from which you are legally absolved by the acts of limitation. Until the soldiers can plead a similar contract, and the equitable considerations which the officers have urged, they can have no right to place their claims on an equal footing. Still less, Sir, said Mr. V. B. can it be said that this bill will afford a pretext for reviving the dormant claims of the public creditors. Their case is widely different from that of either the officers or the soldiers. While the pay of the Army was fixed and stationary, its actual value was reduced by the depreciation of currency, which they were compelled to receive at par. But the suppliers of the Army the great mass of public creditors, regulated their contracts by the fluctuations in which they expected to be paid, and the prices demanded bore an exact proportion to its depreciation in market.

It has been urged, too, as an objection, that provision had not been made for the officers who did not serve to the close of the war, and for the militia. It was sufficient to say that with them the government had entered into no such engagement. The surviving officers of the revolution, who had been called from service before the end of the war, generally by public considerations, would not, he was persuaded, repine at the success of their brethren in arms, or make it the basis of unfounded complaint. It has been stated by the venerable and worthy Senator before me, [Gen. S. SMITH,] that this bill will not embrace his case, for the reasons he has given. Who would have more cause to complain than he, if, indeed, any cause could be found in the measure proposed? Of his conduct and services in two wars, it would be superfluous to speak. They are familiar to us all; and he wished he could add, had been as well appreciated by the Union as by the State whose interests he had promoted in peace, and whose safety he had defended in war. The solicitude which he had manifested for the friends of his youth, and his companions in danger, must have awakened the sensibilities of those who witnessed it; while his zealous, though disinterested support of the bill upon your table, constituted a convincing proof that it would be viewed by others, who might be excluded from its provisions, with equal satisfaction.

The last, and, to his mind, the strongest objection against the passage of this bill, was its making no provision for the widows and children of deceased officers, who were entitled to half-pay. By whom, Sir, said Mr. V. B. has this objection been adduced? By the parties themselves? No, Sir; by those who have had no conference with the parties. Do they advocate the claims of the heirs and widows because they have heretofore been importunate for relief? No, Sir; from the first agitation of this question, in 1810, to the present moment, he was authorized, he believed, to say, that not a single petition had been presented in their behalf. Sir, said Mr. V. B., we resist the claims of the living by exorcising the spirits of the dead. The gentleman from Georgia declares that he will not vote for the bill, because the heirs and widows are not included, and that he would not vote for it, if they were. It has been asked by the Senator from South Carolina, whether a positive debt, a vested interest, does not descend to the heir, and whether a government, any more than an individual, is discharged by the death of its creditor? The objection thus presented is plausible in appearance, but he was persuaded, easily surmounted. He had already, in his opinion, given a satisfactory answer. Whatever might have been the original character of the claim, it could no longer be regarded as legally binding on the government. It was barred by the statute of limitations—a measure sometimes harsh, but not the less founded in policy and justice. This shield, interposed by the government for justifiable ends, might be removed, at the option of the government, only in the cases which policy and justice might demand. It has a perfect right to permit it to operate upon the officers, their widows, or their heirs—and neither might, in strictness, have a legal ground of complaint. I have endeavored, said Mr. V. B. to show that equity requires, and policy does not forbid the allowance proposed for the surviving officers. The claims of the widows, stood, in his opinion, on a different foundation. But he should not be willing, for one, to oppose them. Their number must be small; not half as great, in all probability, as that of surviving officers; say one hundred at the outside. Give them a gratuity of one or two thousand dollars each; and if necessary, deduct it from the sum you would otherwise give to the surviving officers. They, he was well assured, would not utter a complaint. On the contrary, the value of what they received, would be doubly enhanced by the cause of the deduction. The supposed claims of the heirs could not be presented to your attention with equal force. Of the two thousand four hundred and eighty officers of the revolution, two thousand two hundred and fifty are no more. Their temporal interests, whatever they were, have been distributed, in some cases, among successive generations. To ascertain and distribute the respective shares, to which the heirs would be entitled, of the small amount now proposed to be given, if not wholly impracticable, would involve an expense that would consume the means of your bounty; and without being productive of substantial benefit, your resources would be exhausted. But, said he, these are considerations of an inferior character, founded on expediency only. Your refusal to grant to the heirs, may be placed on the highest ground of principle. Whatever you now do in favor of the officer, must be voluntary, proceeding from your liberality and gratitude. All other obligations have been cut off by time. All your endowments springing from such motives, being for the reward of personal services, may with propriety be confined to those by whom those services were rendered. This, said he, is not a new principle in your legislation. It lies at the foundation of the act of 1818, providing, not for the heirs, but certain portions of the revolutionary officers and soldiers, by the operation of which, millions have in his opinion been beneficially applied. It was called indeed a pension act, but with no more propriety, according to the established principles of the Government, than the bill upon your table.

What, according to these principles, are the grounds upon which pensions have been granted? They were, exclusively, disability produced by known wounds received in the public service, and half pay for a limited time, to the widow and infant children of those who had fallen in action. Since the date of our independence, these only have been the legal and appropriate causes for being placed on the list of pensioners. The annual allowance to a limited number of the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, by the act of 1818, was founded on no such consideration, otherwise the widows and orphans of the deceased officers and soldiers would have been as much entitled to your bounty as they can be now. They did not receive it; and the only justifiable reason which could then have been given, was the one which may now be assigned. You had a right to make your donation personal. You had a right to enlarge or contract the circle of your beneficence, according to your own views of the state of your treasury, the exigencies of society, and the claims of humanity. Among the most powerful motives for its adoption, was a desire to rescue the country from the reproach of seeing those to whom it was indebted for its liberties, thrown, in the evening of their days, amidst the prosperity they had been instrumental in producing, upon the cold charities of an unfeeling world. It was to prevent the vivid and heart-rending picture of Roman ingratitude, which, though the invention of modern days, has so long interested the world, from being only descriptive of real life in the streets of this proud capital.

Mr. V. B. said he would say nothing as to the amount. Full justice had already been done to that subject. The general object was to make up, in part, the loss sustained by the officers, out of the profits made by the government, by the successful result of its compromise with them. Let us, therefore, said he, pass the bill upon your table. Let this body have the credit of originating it. Let no narrow or weak views impede our course. No matter where those honorable and patriotic men are from; whether from the North or the South, the East or the West; whether from the old States or the new. In every State where the blessings of a free government are enjoyed, there they had a name, if not a local habitation, that could not fail to work its way to the hearts of their fellow citizens. It was true, he said, that by the list submitted, it did not appear that any of the officers resided in seven of the new States, and he was not sorry for it. If he were not deceived in the character as well of the people of those States, as of their representatives on that floor, they would rejoice that an opportunity was thus presented to evince their devotion to the cause of the revolution, and their gratitude for the services of those who fought our battles in that day, without even a suspicion of a selfish or local object. This will be the more gratifying to them, because it was not their good fortune, as States, to be in a situation to take part in that great struggle, out of which grew this mighty empire, and all the blessings of civil and religious liberty, that we now so pre-eminently enjoy. He had not a doubt that all that remained for them to do, they would do well. If evidence of the fact were wanting, he had only to allude to the small but patriotic State of Illinois, which alone had instructed her representatives on that floor, upon the subject under consideration, in a spirit reflecting upon herself the highest credit, and affording the most flattering presage of her future greatness.

Mr. V. B. said, that he was distressed by the consciousness that he had already trespassed too much upon the kind indulgence of the Senate. In any other case he would have considered it reprehensible to have done so. He would therefore (although there were yet many considerations which he intended to have urged,) draw his observations to a close. There was, however, one point upon which he felt too much solicitude to suffer it to pass unnoticed. If by any one he had been understood as casting as much of censure or reproach upon the old Congress, he desired to correct so erroneous an impression. He could not indeed have done so consistently with his own long cherished opinions. On the contrary, he did not believe that the world ever witnessed, or ever again will witness a body of men more patriotic or enlightened. He would not believe that it was in their nature to be indifferent to the just claims of the revolutionary army. The question with them was not what they would, but what they could do. The embarrassments under which they labored from want of power, and the backwardness of the States, who themselves were struggling against the exhausting effects of a cruel, bloody and protracted war, were known to all. As little did he wish to cast reproach upon the counsels of the nation. Every thing could not be done at once. Much had been done under the present Constitution, to satisfy the claims of justice, and vindicate the character of the republic. It is our good fortune that something still remains for us to do. Fear not, that in doing it, you will go beyond the wishes of your constituents—your feelings lag behind them. Speaking for his immediate constituents—and he had not the presumption to suppose that they were more just or public spirited than their neighbors—for them he could say, with confidence, that, having some share in the national funds, and contributing no inconsiderable part of their amount, they would willingly pour them out, like water, in a cause so righteous. With them, a million more or less of public debt, compared with the preservation of the public faith, would be as nothing. He gloried in the consciousness that he was a representative of a people influenced by such elevated sentiments. Every day, said he, makes the remnant of this band of worthies more dear to the American people. When that period arrives—which a majority of the Senate may expect to see—when the last of the officers of the revolutionary army shall be called from time to eternity, it will be the cause of keen regret, and self reproach, if, upon a review of the past, it shall appear that any thing was omitted that ought to have been done, to smooth their passage to the tomb.

One word more, and he had done. The Senator from Maine, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who, although he had lost his father in the struggle, had felt it to be his duty (and there was no man, he believed, who more implicitly followed his sense of duty,) to oppose the bill, had, with his characteristic shrewdness and pertinency, asked—did General Washington, whilst at the head of Government, ever recommend this subject to the notice of Congress? The worthy Senator well knew what the answer must be, and the train of reflections it would give rise to. General Washington did not—but why? Before and after the war, he spared no pains to make the States sensible of what was due to the officers on this very point. His letters have been read. He urged them by all the considerations that belonged to the subject, to act efficiently for their relief. He failed. After he came into the government, the officers themselves evinced no disposition to revive their claims, and it certainly would not have become him to be the first to bring them forward. It is not difficult to conceive why the officers were, at that day, willing to avoid all applications for pecuniary aid. New prospects opened—they were probably not exempt from those feelings of ambition and hope of preferment, which actuate mankind. They have out-lived them, and they humbly ask for justice. But, Sir, what was the language of the Father of his Country, when the subject was an open one? In his circular of June, 1783, to the Governors of the States, he said:—"The provision of half pay for life, as promised by the resolution of Congress, was a reasonable compensation offered at a time when Congress had nothing else to give to the officers for services then to be performed; it was the price of their blood and your independence, and as a debt of honor, it can never be cancelled until it be fairly discharged."

One question, said Mr. V. B., and I have done. Has it been fairly discharged?

Mr. PARRIS was disposed, he said, to withdraw his amendment, with the understanding that he should have an opportunity to renew it. While up, he would remark that it was true that the soldiers had, to a great extent, been paid; but there are many who have not been paid, and who never will be paid, unless they are paid now, side by side with their officers. It is the officers alone who have kept the claims of the soldiers alive. The soldiers cannot meet in conventions, issue circulars, frame memorials, and get up all the necessary machinery for acting on the public sympathy. If they do not succeed with the officers, their claims are lost. He withdrew his motion, but should renew it when the question had been taken on the bill as reported.

The question then recurred on filling the blank with $1,100,000.

Mr. RUGGLES could not vote, he said, to fill the blank with that sum merely for the officers. He thought, also, that those officers who, on the first alarm of war, left the plough for the ranks, were as well entitled to remuneration as the officers who served to the end of the war.

SENATE.]

[JAN. 28, 1828.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was, he said, one of those officers who entered the army at an early period, and resigned before the close of the war. He had, therefore, no claim, and never had advanced any. None who left the army before the close of the war can have any claim. In the year 1778, General WASHINGTON addressed Congress on the state of the army, which was near dissolution. In 1779, many of the officers resigned; and to prevent more from resigning, the act of 1780 was passed. No one, then, who resigned before the close of the war, can be entitled to any benefit from the provisions of that act.

After some remarks from Messrs. HARRISON and WOODBURY—

Mr. RUGGLES, in reply to Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that many meritorious officers, who had resigned before the close of the war, were as much entitled to remuneration for their services, as any who had served to the close of the war. He would cite the case of an officer whom he knew: He was a soldier at the battle of Bunker's Hill; and, for his gallantry, received a commission as a Lieutenant. He was for some time engaged, with great credit to himself, in the severest enterprises of the war. He then resigned from ill health. This man fought before the war was legalized; he fought, in its earliest struggles, with a halter about his neck. Surely, upon every principle of justice, he was as much entitled to remuneration as those who entered after him, and continued to the close of the war. This man recently died, and left a helpless family. If his children were not provided for, he would vote for no provision.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he could not consent to give a silent vote, after the declaration of the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PARRIS,] that he should hereafter offer the amendment which he had just withdrawn: and after the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. RUGGLES,] that he could not vote for filling the blank with any sum until a provision was inserted in the bill for the other officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army. The only difficulty, Mr. C. had long believed, which would be opposed to the recovery of this claim, was the one now presented by the proposed course. He did not believe that the good sense of the American people, or the justice of Congress, could ever permit a direct rejection of this claim. He was only apprehensive, therefore, of the indirect mode of attack, which had heretofore proved fatal. For a long series of years these claimants have addressed themselves to the liberality, to the generosity and to the charity of the Government. They had associated themselves in this appeal with other officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, and had surrounded their case with all the material, and had connected with it all the considerations which could operate upon the sympathies and sensibilities of a noble and generous nation. They had told over the well known story of the hardships and sufferings of a Revolutionary war, the scars, the wounds, the hunger and nakedness and poverty—the courage and constancy of those who fought and bled in that mighty struggle which resulted in securing to us the means of enjoying every civil and political blessing. They appealed in vain. Year after year has rolled away, and age, disease, and death, have thinned their numbers to a little remnant, who now hover over the grave, most of them in indigence and want. They have now made a last effort to engage the notice of the Government: not by an appeal to its charity or its generosity; not as mendicants asking its bounty; not as pensioners, sir. Let me say to the honorable member from Maine, [Mr. PARRIS,] who has introduced this term, that the wealth of this nation is too little to place these men in that character. Exhaust the annual revenue of the nation in filling their coffers and multiplying their luxuries, and yet, sir, the present generation must ever remain pensioners to the veterans of the Revolution, whose toil and blood are the source whence this revenue is derived. No, sir, said Mr. C. it is not as objects of charity, that these men now come. They present you a copy of your contract; they tell you it has been violated to their pecuniary loss; that the obligation of the Government has not been redeemed, and they give a statement of facts from which they say the principles of acknowledged law authorise them to demand satisfaction at your hands. They refer to the page and letter of your own records, and to the undisputed history of the day, as making out a case which calls for the decision—the judicial decision of this tribunal. Does any honorable member on this floor dispute the facts, or deny the application of the principles of law and equity to those facts? This would be a fair and legitimate ground of discussion. If the terms of the contract are not as set forth, if the rules which should govern that contract are not as they are stated to be, let this be urged as a reason why this debt should not be paid. But a very different course is suggested. Other claims, resting on other grounds, and properly to be governed by other considerations, are referred to, and we are told that this debt ought not to be paid until those other claims are ascertained and adjusted. The Government, like an individual, ought to be controlled by the great moral principles which enter into all pecuniary transactions. Good faith and the observance of contracts are demanded from a Government to the same extent as from an individual. Let, then, the case be supposed, that an individual is applied to for the discharge of a fair debt: will any honorable man feel himself justified in turning an honest creditor from his door, with no other reason than that he is indebted to sundry other individuals, in large amounts, and he must ascertain the nature and extent of his engagements, before he can pay the claim which is presented to him? and if the creditor could also urge his pressing necessities, his indigence, his age and decrepitude, would it not be still less excusable to repulse him with such an evasive reply? And if when impelled by the extremity of his distress, the creditor should assert and the debtor concede the highly meritorious nature of the services charged, the great peril to his life and the certain destruction to his fortunes, which were encountered in the performance, and the great advantage and abundant wealth derived by him from whom was asked but a portion of that price which, by his bond, he had promised to pay, would, Mr. C. again inquire, would any honorable man feel excused for again repeating his refusal to discharge, nay, even to examine the claim, until other transactions were adjusted, involving matters having no connection with it? Would not the moral sense of the community be disgusted with such conduct, and merited indignation overwhelm its author?

Is not such the case of these officers? They claim the same privilege which is extended to the most humble individual in the community—the privilege of demanding justice from the Government. They have submitted, in respectful terms, an argument to sustain their demand. Their memorial has been examined by an intelligent committee, and the exposition by the Chairman appeared to him to demonstrate the obligation of the Government to pay their debt. To the arguments thus urged, and to his mind conclusively urged, no member of the Senate had opposed contrary arguments, and in that state of things he did not intend to add one word more on that part of the case. His object was to resist the fatal influence of proposed amendments, which the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. PARRIS] must pardon him for saying were calculated to destroy all prospect of final success. The gentleman had said, and no doubt with great sincerity, that he was not influenced by a motive to embarrass this bill; but, let the motive be what it may, such is the effect. Delay alone is fatal. The few surviving patriots who now apply for a portion of their debts, are rapidly disappearing from their country and from the world; they, too, owe a debt which all must pay to nature's law, and which will, ere long, call them to rewards of a higher order. All they can hope for is to smooth the rugged path which separates them from the grave, and which, however short the distance, is beset with thorns which age and infirmity does not enable them to remove without your aid. And why should you refuse your aid? The gentlemen from Maine and Ohio, [Mr. PARRIS and Mr. RUESELZ,] deplore a separate legislation for these officers, as a positive injury to others. Mr. C. said he venerated the character of the Revolutionary soldiers, and was willing to do ample justice to every class of them. No man would go farther in extending the beneficence and the charity of the nation to those persons. But their claims were not now before us.

The question of separate legislation ought to have been made forty years ago, and more. The separate legislation of the old Congress, for the very class of persons now before the House, formed the specific subject of their claims. On matters growing out of the general legislation for the army, they claimed nothing. They had sustained equal loss by depreciated paper, by want of pay, by want of food, by nakedness, and sufferings of various kinds; these they encountered in common with their fellow officers and fellow soldiers: and for these sufferings he should be proud to aid in giving some compensation. Yet let it not escape the attention of the Senate, that these claims were discarded by these men; such items formed no part of the account rendered. Their demand rested on specific separate legislation, which no other officers and no soldiers in the army had any common interest in. It is entirely too late, therefore, to urge objections to separate legislation. Mr. C. said, he was equally surprised to hear from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. R.] the objection he had alluded to. It was in the knowledge of the Senate, that that gentleman, as Chairman of the Committee of Claims, was frequently called to act on claims preferred by individuals who had sustained injury during the late war, either by violations of contract on the part of the government, depredations by the enemy, or from various other causes. He would ask the honorable Chairman, if he had ever made it a cause of objection to either of these claims, that there were numerous other claims, arising upon the same or somewhat similar principles, yet unsettled? He knew such an objection had never been urged, and could never have been sustained. It was as competent to these individuals as to any others, to have separated their claims; and if one amongst them had presented his case alone to the Senate, Mr. C. did not perceive how they could have refused it their notice. The other officers of the army—the soldiers of the army, were not included in the memorial. Those officers alone believing, and he thought correctly, that their case did not resemble the case of officers and soldiers who were not embraced by the resolution of 1780, had asked an examination and decision of the rights of those who were included by the terms of that resolution. They had exerted the common privilege of every citizen in asking a decision upon their claims. If fairly examined and finally rejected, their history and their character did not permit any one to doubt of their acquiescence. The memorials of their virtues were too intimately connected with the history of the nation, and the plaudits of a grateful people had sounded too loudly their praises, to permit his feeble voice to extend the circle of their fame; but he would say, that men who could resist the seductive appeal made to them by the author of the Newburg Letters, were not now to be taught obedience to the constituted authorities, or respect for the laws of the land.

He had declined adding one word to the argument of the Chairman of the Committee, on the law and the equity of the claim. Before he concluded, however, he would remark, that the sum conclusively demonstrated to be due to these officers, had gone into the treasury of the nation. The two-seventh parts of their pay, not included in their certificates, if funded, would have been on interest, according to the express terms of the contract. The Treasury, therefore, is by so much the less indebted; and the sum from which it is thus relieved has been applied to other objects, which would otherwise have been paid by other funds. An arithmetical calculation will demonstrate the fact, that the unpaid two-seventh parts of the amount for which certificates should have been issued, and the loss by deferred interest, with interest on those sums to this period, will constitute an aggregate greater than the sum now proposed by the Committee. This sum, therefore, you hold; this sum you have made available to the general purposes of your government; and it is surely not extravagant in these claimants, after a lapse of more than forty years, to ask you to repay to them this forced loan. Mr. C. hoped, for these reasons, that the blank would be filled with the sum recommended by the committee, and that the Senate would steadfastly resist every attempt to superadd amendments to the bill.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1828.

The CHAIR presented the following memorial, accompanied with an affidavit, from E. V. Sparhawk, which was read:

To the Honorable the Senate of the United States:

The Memorial of the undersigned (accompanied by an affidavit of the facts) humbly sheweth, that, having been subjected to insult and violence, in the room of the Committee of Claims of the Senate of the United States, from a person called Duff Green, an officer of the Senate, on Friday, the 25th of January, instant; and having been threatened by said Green with further violence, in case your Memorialist should "ever write a line about him"—considering that said violence was not, in any manner, provoked by your Memorialist, and that it was committed within a room devoted to the use of the Senate: Therefore, your Memorialist humbly prays that such notice may be taken of this matter as may, in the opinion of your honorable body, comport with its dignity, and extend protection to individuals while within the precincts of the Senate.

EDWARD VERNON SPARHAWK.

Washington City, Jan. 28, 1828.

The affidavit accompanying the memorial was read.

Mr. MARKS moved to lay the memorial on the table; which motion, on a division, was lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS inquired what question was before the Senate.

The CHAIR observed, that it was an application laid before the Senate by him, at the request of the Memorialist, and it remained to be disposed of by them.

Mr. COBB said it was a very grave subject, and he would move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary; but was understood to have withdrawn the motion.

Mr. MACON said he thought the matter worthy inquiry; and he should be in favor of laying it on the table. He had known a similar case in the other branch of Congress; but did not know how it would be taken up by the Senate.

Mr. COBB signified his assent to a motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. ROWAN said he would make another motion, which was, to allow the memorialist to withdraw his memorial. It appeared by the affidavit that the affair took place after the adjournment, from which it was plain, that it did not come under the jurisdiction of the Senate. They, therefore, had no more control over this matter than if the affray had taken place in the street. They might as well interfere in the quarrels of two hackney-coachmen, as in this. If violence was committed, there were laws in the District to which the aggrieved party might appeal. These were his reasons for moving that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. FOOT made a few remarks which were not distinctly heard. He was understood to be in favor of laying the memorial on the table.

Mr. BERRIEN made some remarks, which were not distinctly heard, which were, in substance, that this matter was one which the Senate ought to consider not only with regard to what ought to be done in relation to the application of the memorialist, but what was also due by the Senate to itself. He then moved to lay the memorial on the table; which was agreed to.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The unfinished business of yesterday, the bill for the relief of the several surviving Officers of the Revolutionary Army, was then taken up.

The question being on filling the blank in the bill with 1,200,000 dollars—

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, rose and said: He was opposed not only to filling the blank, but was opposed to the passage of the bill under any circumstances, and would ask the indulgence of the Senate whilst he offered some of the reasons upon which he grounded that opposition. Although he was far from entertaining any ungrateful feelings towards the surviving officers of the revolutionary army, yet he could never yield his assent to the assertion that they held exclusive claims, either upon the justice or gratitude of this government.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARRISON] felt such devoted zeal on this occasion, that he had declared he would take the last cent from the treasury to discharge this demand; nay, he would go further, he would give up the Alleghany canal, he would give up the Cumberland road, and would even dispose of his churches to raise a revenue for that purpose, and would worship his God in the open fields, and in the shades of the forest. Mr. S. said, if he believed this claim was founded in justice and good faith, he would go further than the gentleman from Ohio: he would not only dispose of his churches, but would worship his God in sack-cloth and ashes before he would withhold a just debt. Yet he feared he should not pay that homage in spirit and in truth, were he to withhold that same justice from the widows and orphan children of those revolutionary officers, who have deceased since the passage of that commutation law, whose claims are entitled to the same justice, and to a much deeper sympathy.

It has been stated by the Chairman of the Committee [Mr. WOONAUBT] which reported this bill, that there were only 230 surviving officers to provide for. To satisfy the claims of these survivors, it was necessary to fill the blank with the sum of $1,100,000. At the close of the war, the whole number of officers then surviving, entitled to half pay, were 2480; deduct from that number 230, will leave 2250; in the ordinary course of mortality, it is fair to suppose, that the average deaths would allow a calculation of 1125 entitled to full pay, in equal degree to the surviving officers, now sought to be provided for. This would require an additional sum of $5,380,434, which, with the $1,100,000, asked for the survivors, would make an aggregate of $6,480,434. If either justice or gratitude require the Senate to make provision for the surviving officers, the same measure of justice and of gratitude, require provision to be made for the widows and children of the deceased officers, whose rights were as well founded, and whose rights were as perfect, up to the times of their respective deaths, as that of the survivors.

Mr. S. said, he had yet to learn by what rule of law, or by what rule of gratitude, this discrimination could be made. It was a settled principle of municipal law, of almost the whole civilized world, founded in nature itself, and fully recognized by every State in this Union, to its fullest extent, that in all cases after death, the relations of the deceased, whether his widow or his children, his father or his mother, his brothers or his sisters, or relations in any other degree, were by inheritance entitled to the whole of his estate, in whatsoever it might consist; whether in lands, goods, moneys, or debts due, either from private individuals or from governments. If therefore, this be a debt of obligation, founded on contract, to the survivors, it is equally a debt of obligation, founded on contract, to the legal representatives of the deceased officers. And it would be a perversion of one of the soundest maxims of law, to suppose, that the death of a creditor cancels the debt, or lessens the obligations of the debtor.

Mr. President, we have heard it stated, during this debate, by a Senator from Ohio, [Mr. RUGGLES] that a revolutionary officer of distinguished merit, died in his neighborhood but a few weeks ago, and left a family of twenty children, two of them twin girls, only four years old. Are we, Mr. S. asked, to close our eyes upon the claims of these tender and helpless infants, because their father has been taken from them by the hand of death? who, had he survived but a few weeks longer, would have shared in the bounty of the government asked for in this bill. Are we to forget the dead, however meritorious their claims, claims founded on the very same law, governed by the same rules of construction, and enhanced by the piteous condition of the objects to whom it must be equally due, if due to any, merely because we behold the living presenting themselves personally before us? This would be an exhibition of feeling but little to the credit of the Congress of the United States!

The Chairman, [Mr. W.] as Mr. S. understood him, had placed the claims of the surviving officers on the principle of annuitants. And fixing the length of time of the half pay at two lives, or 14 years, would demand as an equivalent, full pay for seven years, to constitute a fair commutation. But he, Mr. S. had made a calculation, and it would be found that five years full pay, paid promptly, with its accumulating interest, would amount to more than 14 years' half pay, only paid annually as it became due, with its accumulating interest also. [Here Mr. WOONAUBT asked to explain, and said he had been misunderstood.] To this Mr. S. replied, he supposed that he must have misunderstood the gentleman from N. H. But laying that argument altogether out of the question, he could nevertheless assume that position without resorting to the annuity tables of any foreign country. Seven years were computed a life by our laws, and so understood in the calculations of life estates not otherwise provided for. And 14 years, the term of two legal lives, was a fair average computation upon which to found the commutation; the half pay for which was not equal to the five years' full pay, calculating the accumulating interest on each. But at the time this commutation was made, there were no calculations of this sort contemplated. The officers knew nothing about annuity tables, neither did the government.

Congress had in 1781, almost at the close of the war, promised, by a resolution, half pay for life to all such officers as should remain in service to the end of the war. This was considered an odious distinction, and became excessively unpopular. It did not suit the genius of this country, and was opposed to the principles of that liberty for which we were then struggling, and was one of the features of the British Government which produced the contest. These officers viewed it in that light themselves, and wished to get rid of it; and in December, 1782, after the preliminary articles of peace had been signed, voluntarily stated, in a petition to Congress, their belief of its odious character, and said in that petition, "We are willing to commute the half-pay pledged, for full pay for a certain number of years, or for a certain sum in gross, as shall be agreed to by the Committee sent with this address." (1)

These are their own words, and their own Committee, sent with that address, consisted of Major Gen. H. Knox, Brig. Gen. Patterson, Col. Crane, Col. Maxwell, Brig. Gen. J. Huntington, Col. Webb, Col. Huntington, Col. Cortland, Col. Cummings, Maj. Scott, Wm. Eustis, Hospital Surgeon, Brig. Gen. Hazen. Officers of high standing, selected and deputed from among themselves, with full powers to make the arrangement with Congress, what commutation should be given for the half pay. And among the members of Congress appointed on the Committee to make this arrangement with the Committee of officers, was Gen. Alexander Hamilton, who had gone through the whole war himself, knew the relative claims of these officers, and whom he was one, and who was as just as he was generous, and as generous as he was brave; which was really surrendering almost the whole matter into their own hands to settle, and it was settled to be equal to five years' full pay, and no more. And when settled at that, it was not made compulsory by the resolution of Congress, but left optional to accept the five years' full pay or hold on to the half pay for life.

(2) Nine States: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, accepted it by lines; and not a murmur was heard for twenty-seven years afterwards, when, for the first time, they brought it up. And at the distance of forty-four years, the Senate are told the commutation was unjust, arbitrarily settled at the discretion of Congress, and forced upon those officers without any alternative, to take that or nothing; and that they come now to ask justice and demand a fulfilment of the compact. And gentlemen affirm that upon principles of law and equity, it is a contract not yet fulfilled, and which in a court of justice the government would be bound to fulfil.

Mr. S. said, he was not brought up at the foot of Gammaliel, but he understood the law of contracts better than that. To render a contract binding on both parties, nothing was necessary, but that the parties were capable to contract, were willing to contract, and actually did contract. And if capable and willing to do so, they could make, and could change that contract as often, and into as many forms as they pleased. It required no lawyer to know this. It was every day's practice, with every man in the Government. But we have a fashion of paying Government contracts as often as they are asked for. What was the contract? First, that the officers who should remain in the army to the conclusion of the war, should be entitled to half pay for life. Who asked to change it? The officers themselves. When it was changed, to whom was it submitted for acceptance? To the officers themselves. Who did accept it in the very form in which Congress had placed it; to be paid in securities, on interest of six per cent. per annum, instead of the half pay promised for life? 3) After they had done so, it would be sporting with the rights of the Government, to say the contract had not been fulfilled on her part. If the Government has any rights, it has the same rights of individuals, governed by the same rules, and entitled to the same privileges. And it would be idle to say, when the Government had done no more than to meet the very wishes of the officers, and gave them what they asked for, that the contract was not fulfilled, because the operations of the change had not proved as prosperous as some of them had wished.

Mr. President, our gratitude has been invoked on this occasion. The gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. H.) has read various letters written by Gen. Washington to Congress, stating the discontent of the officers of the Army, the hardships they endured, and concludes by saying, they would have quit the Army, had not Congress promised them the half pay: and asserts, it is to those officers that we are indebted for our civil and religious liberty, as well as for our independence as a nation, and the freedom of debate we now exercise in this Senate. Mr. S. said, it was by no means his wish to detract from the military merits of those officers; and much less would he have supposed they were actuated by the hope of pecuniary reward, to continue in the Army, had not the gentleman himself affirmed, it was the promise of the half pay which kept them there. He was willing, himself, to ascribe to them better motives for remaining in the Army, than the hope of pecuniary reward. He was willing to believe it was patriotism that kept them in the Army. All your gallant men prefer the thick of battle, and seek death itself, as the highest reward of the brave. And can it be a motive to an American Senate, to pay those officers a second time, because they would have left the Army in the time of its greatest peril, but for the promise of half pay?

Mr. President, it is an error that is gaining ground in proportion as we recede from the period of the revolution, that the independence of this government was achieved solely by the regular army. It is an error that has been promoted by the very officers themselves, and to which gentlemen very naturally subscribe who witnessed no part of those times which tried men's souls. That war was a war without a parallel. It was forced upon the people of this country when they had neither money, arms, nor experience: and not more than three millions and a half of a population. In this situation they had to meet a brave and experienced enemy, with a veteran army, and experienced and gallant officers at its head. The most determined doubted; but their appeared to be no alternative, and a general enthusiasm pervaded the whole community, with a few exceptions; and all who valued freedom were eager for battle, in defence of their homes and their fire-sides, and death or liberty was the universal motto. It was this proud eminence assumed by the American people, that gave them liberty, independence and freedom of debate: not the sordid mercenary hopes of pecuniary reward.

But, said, Mr. S., it has nearly come to this, since time has thrown a veil over those scenes and achievements that ought to characterize that war, that we are taught to believe that, during that war, every thing was quiescent, and every body happy at home in the enjoyment of their families and fortunes, except the regular army; and that there was but little praise due to any but the officers. The arguments seem to go upon the ground, that this is the correct history of the revolutionary war. Gentlemen who entertain this opinion, know but little of that war, as it was carried on in the three Southern States, of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

The Chairman [Mr. W.] has told us, these officers broke up their connexions in life, and left their families and their homes to serve their country. And so devoted was one of them, that he left his dead father unburied, to enter the Army. This, all will admit, was patriotic. But what does this weigh, when compared to the bloody scenes that spread horror and desolation throughout the two Carolinas and Georgia, during the years of 1779, 1780 and 1781; a good part of which time you had no regular Army there. Whilst the British Army were there ravaging the country wherever they went; not a horse in the country upon which they could lay their hands, that they did not take, to repair the waste in their own cavalry, or for the use of their baggage wagons. All the cattle, hogs, sheep, flour, wheat, corn, and every description of forage, fell a prey to their rapacity. And what was not consumed, was wantonly burned and destroyed. The tories, following in their train, burning dwelling houses, out buildings, and fences, and laying waste with fire and sword all that came in their way. Plundering the defenceless women and children of any little remains of provisions that the Army might have left, and stripping them of their wearing apparel, and the very bed clothes that covered them by night. Mothers and daughters who had seen better times, labored in the field to procure a scanty subsistence: whilst the fathers and brothers were harassing the enemy, and fighting the battles of their country. Not in the regular Army, but in volunteer and self-created bodies; self-trained, and mounted on their own horses, and armed with their own rifles, and other arms, such as they could procure; all at their own expense, without the aid, or even the knowledge of the General Government. They annoyed the enemy by hanging on their borders, killing their light troops, cutting off their foraging parties, shooting their sentries at their posts, and destroying and dispersing the tory parties wheresoever they assembled. No friend of his country could remain at home in safety. Many who ventured there for a moment, were dragged from the bosoms of their families, and butchered at their own doors. Others who were taken in arms, were treated as rebels, and hung upon the limbs of trees, on the road sides. These scenes became so familiar, that the spilling of human blood lost the most of its horrors.

While this undisciplined warfare was carried on by the community at large by a spirit of patriotism unrivalled, General Sumpter, with no other authority than a commission from the Governor of the State, for the legislative body was dispersed by the enemy, drew to his standard a respectable number of volunteer militia, who displayed as much bravery, and fought to as much purpose, as any continental troops belonging to the regular army. They distinguished themselves, and were victorious in almost every battle they fought. Their leader was as gallant a soldier as ever drew a sword, with all the qualities of a cool circumspect general. His successful operations were more confined to the middle and southern parts of the State.

General Marion, who acted under a similar commission, only from the Governor, confined himself more to the eastern part of the State.—Whose partisan corps were entirely volunteers, also. Mr. S., said that he might be more accurate as related to his operations, he would read it from Ramsay's history of the United States. Speaking of the promotion and successes of General Sumpter, he says: "About the same time Marion was promoted to the same rank, who in the northeastern extremity of the State, prosecuted a similar plan. Unfurnished with the means of defence, he was obliged to take possession of the saws of the saw-mills, and to convert them into horseman's swords. So much was he distressed for ammunition, that he has engaged, when he had not three rounds to each man of his party. Various schemes were tried to detach the inhabitants from co operating with him. Major Wemy's burned scores of houses on Pedee, Lynch's Creek, and Black River, belonging to such as were supposed to do duty with Marion, or to be subservient to his views. Having no houses to shelter them, the camps of their country became their homes. For many months, Marion and his party were obliged to sleep in the open air, and to shelter themselves in deep swamps. From these retreats, they sallied out, whenever an opportunity of harassing the enemy, or of serving their country, presented itself."

Marion was a man of large fortune, and lived at his ease. He abandoned it all, made the morasses his dwelling place, and his rations were parched corn and potatoes, when he could get them. He may be justly called the Leonidas of the South. He never was defeated, nor could the strongest threats, or the most flattering promises from the enemy, induce him for one moment to forsake the cause of his country. Sumpter and Marion could have had any promotions they would have asked for in the British army, if they would have accepted it. Or if they would have laid down their arms, even at the most gloomy moment of that perilous time, they could have been protected in their persons and fortunes by that army. But they were inspired by other considerations, of a higher character. They were inspired by a patriotism and love of country that never tired, and taught them to look upon pecuniary rewards as trash; not to be put in competition with a soldier's honor nor with a patriot's love of liberty. Their troops, composed as they were entirely of volunteer militia, from the mass of citizens, were equally inspired by the same motives. There never was a regular army belonging to the government, from the beginning to the end of the revolutionary war, that endured such hardships, who fought more, or more successful battles, or rendered more essential service. These men never received a farthing from the general government, neither for their services nor their arms, which they furnished for themselves for the most part. Nor has a single man among them, however hacked or cut to pieces, ever been placed upon your pension roll.

Many of the first citizens of South Carolina were seized, incarcerated in prison ships, and sent to St. Augustine, and other unwholesome climes, to subdue their patriotism; many of whom perished. Col. Laurens, the elder, was sent to England and imprisoned in the Tower, to subdue his own patriotism, and strike terror in others. These tortures were endured by men who lived in the lap of ease and fortune, all of which was abandoned to the reckless ravages of the enemy, rather than they would abandon the cause of that independence in which they had embarked. Was there any officer in the continental army who suffered such hardships, and made such sacrifices for the cause of freedom? Who is there, that would not rather rush upon the spear of his enemy, and hazard his life in battle, than be confined in the hold of a prison ship, in an unwholesome clime? At the same time these scenes of horror and discomfort were going on in South Carolina, Georgia and North Carolina were also engaged in those of a similar character, except that the British army remained principally in South Carolina. The three States were destitute for a long time of even the semblance of a regular army. It was the gallantry and patriotism of the farmers of North Carolina, who quit their ploughs and embodied under Col. Caswell, a militia officer, that totally defeated and dispersed a large body of Scots tories, that had collected to the royal standard, on Cape Fear River, in 1775, and gave a shock to the formidable tory party in that quarter, from which it never recovered. This was effected by their own means, without the aid of a continental officer or soldier; or so much as a sabre furnished by the general government. For which they never received, nor did they even ask, a farthing.

These achievements were followed up by the battle of King's Mountain, in the autumn of 1780, under Col. Campbell, of Virginia, Col. Cleveland, and Col. Shelby, and others of North Carolina, Col. Lacey, Col. Hill, and others of South Carolina, who assembled the volunteer militia of their neighborhoods, to stay the high-handed career of the enemy; and the historian says, "They had so little of the mechanism of a regular army, that the Colonels, by common consent, commanded each day alternately. The hardships these volunteers under"went were very great. They subsisted for weeks together without tasting bread or salt, or spirituous liquors, and slept in the woods without blankets. The running stream quenched their thirst. At night the earth afforded them a bed, and the heavens, or the limbs of trees, were their covering. Ears of corn, or pompions thrown into the fire, with occasional supplies of beef or venison, killed in the woods, were the chief articles of their provisions."

Under all those disadvantages, these volunteer officers and citizens, without a moment's training, met a veteran officer of great experience, and as brave a partisan officer as any in the British army, on ground chosen for the occasion by himself; and with a very small loss on their part, killed and wounded 225, among them Col. Ferguson, their commander; and took 800 prisoners, with all their arms, ammunition, and baggage. The annals of the whole revolutionary war do not afford a more brilliant achievement, or one effected with more cool and deliberate bravery, by any portion of the regular army.

It were these resistances and these successes that gave the first check to the British arms. It destroyed their hopes of submission; and proved that freemen, without training and without discipline, were too brave to be conquered.

These men and officers did not fight your battles for money. They never cost your government a single cent. They furnished their own rifles, with which they principally fought. They furnished their own clothes, and their own horses; and their slender and humble rations they picked up where they could find them; and, like the other citizens who fought our battles, without the aid of government, if any were wounded or disabled, the government has positively refused to place them on the Pension Roll, but has left them to beg their bread, or starve, if they could find no other relief. And yet we are confidently told by gentlemen, in this debate, that we owe our independence as a nation, and the freedom of debate which we enjoy in this Senate, exclusively to the officers of the revolutionary army. Gentlemen who assert this fact, have never known by what means the revolutionary war was carried on in the Carolinas and Georgia; otherwise, they must have forgotten it. If they had not, they could not say that freemen, whose blood had streamed in torrents in the prosecution of that war; whose valor in battle had been unrivalled; who had sacrificed their fortunes, and abandoned their families and their homes, and every private comfort, for its support, owed their independence, and freedom in debate in this Senate, to the prowess of any other arm but their own.

Mr. S. remarked that it had been affirmed that the regular army had defended the Southern States. Some portions of the regular army had been there, it was true, but had rendered no sort of service, whatever, until the arrival of General Green, in 1781.

When the British navy made an attack on Fort Moultrie, on the 28th of June, 1776, before the declaration of Independence, with a view of reducing Charleston, General Lee, a continental officer, next in command to General Washington himself, instead of defending the fort, as he ought to have done, declared it impossible, and ordered the fort to be surrendered; when Col. Moultrie, of the militia, refused to obey the order; but said, he would continue the defence of the place, and would take the responsibility of a failure upon himself. Your Continental General retired to a place of safety, and Col. Moultrie, with the gallantry of a veteran, sustained the attack, for ten hours in succession, against ten British ships, two of which were fifty gun ships. The siege terminated in the loss of one of the enemy's ships, and a total repulse of the whole fleet. This was the first essay of a Continental officer in the South.

The next was General Lincoln, an experienced continental officer, who, on the 12th day of May, 1780, surrendered to the enemy, without the fire of a gun, the city of Charleston, both the continental and militia army, with all the munitions of war, and upwards of 400 pieces of artillery; and put the enemy in the strong hold of the Southern States, from whence they could, and did play in every direction, to the great embarrassment of the Southern Section.

Col. Buford, with a regiment of continental infantry, and some horsemen, was sent to the relief of South Carolina. They were assailed by Col. Tarleton, and after the first fire, laid down their arms and sued for quarters, which was denied them; and they were literally cut to pieces. And a great portion of those who were not slain on the field, had their hands or arms cut off, or their heads and bodies hacked to pieces.

General Gates, another experienced continental officer, was sent to South Carolina with a few more than 900 regular troops. To these were added 3,000 militia from the neighboring States. With these 4,000 men, he met the British army, near Camden, in South Carolina, and a battle ensued. No sooner did the enemy display their columns and commence a heavy fire, than General Gates fled. Nor did he stop until he reached Hillsborough, a distance of 150 miles, and then but for a short time. The continental soldiers under Baron de Kalb, and some of the militia, under their own officers, fought with distinguished gallantry. But they were overpowered by numbers, and were all either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. But not a vestige of the regular army remained for active operations. And with them were taken all the artillery and 200 baggage wagons. The State was again left to the alternative, either to submit as rebels, and seek protection from the enemy, or fight their own battles, without the least hope of assistance from the General Government. They preferred the latter, which they carried on with an enthusiasm that was never surpassed and but rarely equalled.

This state of things continued until General Green went on the next year; and even then, much was done by the militia. At the Cowpens, the British had 1100 men, and the Americans not more than 800: two-thirds of them were militia, who were under the command of Col. Pickens. They formed the first line a few hundred yards in advance, and received the first fire; then fell back, as they were ordered to do, and immediately rallied and joined the regulars in charging the enemy with fixed bayonets, which threw them into complete confusion, and five hundred of the British army laid down their arms to the militia.

When General Green took command of the Southern Army, it consisted of only 2,000 men; more than half of whom were militia (1). The battles he fought at Guilford and Eutaw, were said to have been the two best fought battles of the Revolution; and more than half his army, at each place, were militia. He was a man of superior skill, and of distinguished bravery; and did honor to the cause in which he was engaged. But the bravest Generals could not fight without an army, and his regular soldiers were but about 1,000; and these were kept as a reserve. His militia were always placed in the front of the battle; many of whom were killed. And that was the last the General Government knew of them. It neither gave them pay, honor, nor provided for their suffering families.

The war in South Carolina was so protracted, and raged with such violence, that, in addition to the volunteer services of almost every man in it, that State, instead of paying one-thirteenth part, which would have been more than its proportion, paid more than one-fifth part of the whole expense of the revolutionary war. (2) Whilst the great State of New York paid but $1,200,000, South Carolina paid $4,000,000, (3) although ranked among the small States. The State of Maryland paid but $800,000. Notwithstanding, it is urged that we owe our liberty and independence to a very small regular army, from whose efficiency the Southern States received but little assistance, when compared with their own unceasing efforts. This claim of the petitioning officers is placed on another ground, as extraordinary as it is novel. Which is, that the certificates given in commutation for the half pay, had been purchased from them by speculators, for a very small consideration. The answer to that argument is plainly this:—If the government were bound to protect its citizens from the grasp of speculation, it would have more than a Herculean labor to perform. Where could such a requisition end? The government had fulfilled its engagements, and it belonged to those who were interested to guard against imposition.

Another and a louder complaint against the government is uttered: that in establishing the funding system, Congress had done injustice by deferring a portion of the interest for ten years. But upon a fair calculation the interest will average more than five per cent. And four per cent. is considered a very high per cent. when secured upon the faith of the government, as this was. It is far beyond any per centage produced by your best agriculturists. Moreover, these claims were placed precisely on the ground of the claims of every other citizen. And who were they that settled the principles upon which the public debt was funded? General Hamilton, and many other revolutionary officers were among the most prominent members of that Congress. And General Washington was the President of the United States, who, by virtue of his constitutional powers, could have negatived the law. And can we for a moment suppose he would not have done so, had he seen any thing like injustice contained in it? We do not believe he ever slumbered over the rights of those officers whom he had commanded, and whom he respected.

The truth is, that the officers of your revolutionary army, had been more liberally provided for than any other class of men, in this or any other country. In addition to their pay during their time of actual service, they were promised half-pay for life, after they should retire from the army, which was commuted for five years' full pay—which was a mighty stretch for a government at the dawn of its struggle for freedom—and were promised and received large tracts of valuable lands. Each officer, from a Major General down to an Ensign, had his lands, and that placed upon the most fertile spots. In addition to this, the southern States gave their officers large tracts of the finest lands in the world. Virginia gave largely and liberally in lands to her officers. South Carolina did the same. North Carolina gave to each Brigadier general, 12,000 acres; to a Colonel, 7,200; to a Captain, 3,500; and to General Green, that State gave 25,000 acres, that were said, at one time, to be worth $500,000. To that meritorious officer, Georgia gave $22,500 in money, and South Carolina gave him $45,000 in money. These were free-will offerings, after the war ended, which those States were prompted to make, to exalted merit, for distinguished services; and surely they would redeem the Carolinas and Georgia from the crying sin of ingratitude.

But, said Mr. S., there was another, and a very different view to be taken of this subject, which would prove, beyond a doubt, how much further the government had gone to promote the interest of the military men, over that of every other class of your citizens. The revolutionary war continued seven years. The supplies for the armies, during the first five years of that war, were furnished by the citizens, exclusively for paper money; then called Continental Money, and States' Money. The continental money was issued by authority of Congress, and bore on its face a pledge that it would be redeemed with gold or silver. The Congress issued $241,552,780; to secure the currency of this money, on the 11th of January, 1776, Congress passed a law in the following words:

"That if any person shall hereafter be so lost to all virtue and regard for his country, as to refuse to receive said bills in payment, or obstruct and discourage the currency or circulation thereof, and shall be duly convicted thereof, such person shall be deemed, published, and treated as an enemy of his country, and precluded from all trade or intercourse with the inhabitants of these colonies. (1.)

On the 14th January, 1777, the Congress passed another law to support and enforce this currency, in these words:

"Whereas the continental money ought to be supported, at the full value expressed in the respective bills, by the inhabitants of these States, for whose benefit they were issued; and who stand bound to redeem the same," &c. And thus it goes on to make it as penal as the English language could express it.

Under these very penal laws, and from their devotion to their country, the citizens received this money, $241,552,780, for the support of that war; and when the war ceased, the money ceased to circulate, and fell dead in the hands of the last holders. Not a single cent of that enormous amount of continental money, without which your army would have been a cipher, has yet been paid to your honest farmers who supported your armies upon the plighted faith of your Government, that it would be paid at the conclusion of the war. Not a militia man has ever received a farthing for his services, nor the widows or children of such as fell in battle, have, in one instance, received the bounties of the government. Pay your debts before you talk of your gratitude. Had these classes of your citizens looked to their pecuniary interests in the hour of peril, instead of devoting their lives and their fortunes to the public service, and the public good, notwithstanding all your Revolutionary officers, and your Revolutionary armies, you would yet have been British subjects, and these States British provinces.

It has been said by the gentlemen who advocate this claim, you are unable to pay your militia, and unable to redeem your continental money. Is this the justice, said Mr. S. of which you boast? This one-sided justice; is this to characterize the justice of your country, pay your favorites a second time, and permit yourselves to slumber over the rights of all others, because you cannot spare the money to pay them, from your thousand projects? This would be justice with a vengeance.

Mr. WOODBURY referred to Milne on annuities, to shew to what number of years full pay the officers were entitled to; because he had in his former remarks been misunderstood. When the officers asked for a commutation, it was not for five years, but for such an one as would be equivalent to the half pay for life. According to all the best authorities, they were entitled to the average of fourteen years' half pay, or seven years' full pay. Thus the senior officers, whose chance of life was smaller than that of the juniors, received their full equivalent by the commutation; which was far from being the case in regard to the juniors.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he should be wanting in his duty to the memory of the dead, as well as to the fair fame of the living, should he remain silent, after the remarks of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH.] He regretted that his colleague was at the moment absent from his chair, for to him all these scenes were familiar, having himself been an actor in the battles of the revolution. Mr. C. had no other knowledge but from written and oral history—But sir, said Mr. C. limited as my information is, I must be permitted to tell the gen-gentleman from South Carolina, he has not correctly given us the events of the southern campaign; no man is less disposed than myself to lessen the just reputation of the militia officers who acquired glory in that campaign, but as a Marylander, I cannot permit the well earned laurels of her brave sons who fought and bled by her side to be tarnished. The gentleman was most unfortunate in his position that the militia alone fought those battles, and still more in his reference to the names of the Cowpens, Eutaw, and Camden, to prove that the officers of the continental army did not perform effective service. Sir, Maryland has lately had to mourn over the bier of her departed Howard. He has gone down to the grave full of years, of honor, and esteem. His gallant conduct as a soldier, was not more estimable than his excellent, amiable, and modest virtues as a citizen. To him was due, as it has been accorded, a large share of the glories which were won in two of those battles: at the Cowpens, his courage and his skill have secured the admiration of his country, for himself, and the brave companies of the Maryland line which he commanded; at Eutaw, he fought and his blood there mingled with that of the patriots, who fell by his side, and I now with surprise find he is omitted in the history of their exploits. I need not ask the honorable gentleman to go far, to find other proofs, that regular officers acquired glory in the South. I point him to one of the monuments of that age, which time has spared—one who now asks your justice—and tell him there is another whom Maryland is proud to call her son, who fought, was wounded, and made prisoner, at Camden. [General HARRIS, who was in the lobby.] I will not offend him by sounding his praises in his presence, but I should be treacherous to him, to his departed friend, to others of their worthy compatriots, and to my State, if I did not correct the error of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of S. Carolina, did not mean to detract from the merit of the regular army. If Major Howard's services were so valuable—and he knew they were so—why was not some provision made for his heirs? He was not insensible to the services of the regulars: but he contended in favor of the militia. He repeated that the regular troops retreated and fled at Camden; and he believes they did not stop until they arrived at Philadelphia. He had not said that there was no regular army at the South; but that it was ineffectual. He had not said that General Lincoln had no regular troops; but that they laid down their arms, and delivered up the City of Charleston; and if the militia had done the same, it would have afforded another argument to their prejudice, and in favor of the regulars. He had said that General Green had but a small regular force at Eutaw and Guilford Court house; and he had said, and now repeated it, that his men were chiefly militia, were posted in front, and bore the heat of the battle. As to the Cowpens, if there was a regular army there, it was a very small one; and the victory had always been attributed mainly to the good conduct of the militia. But, if he was mistaken in this, he would ask, if he was not right in his statement, that the whole country was ravaged, at the time when Congress would not send an army to the South. Again, said Mr. S., I would ask, where was your regulars at King's Mount; and whether that achievement by the southern militia, did not give a turn to affairs, when General Washington was flying before the British armies? Immediately upon the decision of that battle, Cornwallis marched his army to the South. I know, said Mr. S., many a man who fought in that battle who is now poor and penniless. Sir, the conduct of the southern militia was beyond my praise. Had they waited until a regular army came to their assistance, the Southern States would have settled down as a British Province. And not only did their acts do much towards our independence—their example gave spirit and confidence to the people. These were his ideas of the question. He thought these officers came here with no better claim, than any other class of individuals who made sacrifices, and rendered services, during the Revolution. There were thousands of individuals deprived of all they possessed, by the depreciation on the continental money. There were fathers and sons killed at their very doors—and of these we hear not a word. But here at this late day is a band of patriots, who come forward and declare that Congress entered into a compact with them, which has never been fulfilled. I say, said Mr. S. that these officers have no better claim than those other classes to whom I have alluded. He knew no reason why they should be relieved in preference. He knew of no plundering speculations in which others had not suffered as well as they. The history of those times, of the sufferings and privations of the southern people, had never been correctly written. While it was impossible to make up all the losses which had fallen, as the fate of war, upon the people of the whole country—he was against making a distinction favorable to one class in preference to another.

Mr. CHAMBERS said the honorable gentleman from South Carolina must pardon him for another remark. The honorable gentleman has said that the written histories of the events alluded to by him, are not accurate; his emendations are to go to the world, and will no doubt receive, as they are entitled to claim, great respect. A regard for the character of some of those concerned, and a wish to put their claims fairly before the public, induces me to correct an error, into which the gentleman has certainly been betrayed. He alleges that at Camden, the American troops ran away at the first fire; on what authority the gentleman has ventured this assertion, I know not; but this I do know, from an honorable man now living, and fully entitled to faith and credit, and who was an officer in the Maryland line, engaged in that battle, that there was a close, and warm engagement for fifty-four minutes. 'Tis true my informant did not say how many rounds were fired, but Sir, if the battle continued fifty-four minutes, and but one fire was exchanged, the extraordinary character of that fact, could not well have escaped the very marked attention of military men, and have given celebrity to the battle of Camden, for at least one circumstance that has not been usually associated with its history.

Mr. ROBBINS rose, and spoke to the following effect:

In speaking to this subject, I shall speak only to the legal obligation, if any, of the United States, in this case. For though I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (my friend, if he will permit me to call him so,) that appeals in this case to the gratitude and magnanimity of the nation, imply the absence of legal obligation, or the apprehension of that absence; I do agree that this question is not to be determined on those appeals, nor to be influenced by them, any further than as they are sustained by that obligation. I am the more anxious now to speak to that point, as it has been more particularly challenged by the learned and able gentleman from South Carolina, who has just taken his seat.

The legal question I take to be this—whether supposing the commutation not to be equal to the half pay for life, the United States are under an obligation to make good the difference; an obligation either legal or equitable; for as to Government, there is no difference between the legal obligation and the equitable; both have the same common foundation in justice; their difference is only a difference of forms; and these forms belong to courts, not to governments.

I begin this inquiry by saying, that the act of 1780, providing half pay for life for the officers of the revolutionary army, who should serve to the close of the revolutionary war, became a contract with those officers who did serve to the close of that war. The proposition made to them in that act, was a conditional one; and when the proposition was accepted, and the condition was performed on their part, it became a contract on the part of the United States, strictly and technically so speaking—a contract with those officers, not as a body, but with each individual officer. In 1783, when the treaty of peace was concluded and ratified, these contracts were perfected and perfect, and became from that moment obligatory upon the United States; and are still obligatory, unless they have been rescinded by each individual acting for himself. For several parties to several contracts, cannot rescind those contracts for one another; nor can a majority of all those parties rescind them for all. The idea is preposterous.

If these contracts have been rescinded, it must be, I repeat, by the individual assent of each officer to the rescinding act, whatever that act may be. If that assent has been given, I agree it is not material in what form it was given; nor whether by words or by acts; whether expressed in the former, or implied by the latter: but the fact of the assent, and of the individual assent, is material.

Now as to the evidence of this assent. The votes of the army lines, determined by majorities in those lines, is not evidence of individual assent; not even in those majorities; for it is impossible to say who voted in those majorities; and who did not vote in them; it is impossible, therefore, to bring home the assent to any one individual in particular. And there is no pretence, to say that these votes were unanimous. Had they been unanimous, it would have amounted to the requisite proof, as to each individual; but they were not unanimous; and the proof is that the votes were reported to Congress as majorities merely; a majority of the whole, certainly is not the whole; regarding, then, the votes of these majorities as not being evidence of individual assent—what evidence of individual assent remains?

It is said that the acts of these officers imply this assent; that in point of fact they did accept of the commutation notes, given as a substitute for half pay, and did receive them in lieu of the half pay; that this was implied assent, and was individually given. All this is very true, and would be quite conclusive against the officer, if this assent was voluntary. Here is the turning point of the whole case. If this assent was voluntary, it was conclusive against the officer; but if it was compulsory, it was not conclusive. How was the fact?

If this alternative had been presented to the officer—here, take these commutation notes, or take your half pay for life; and he had taken the commutation notes, the acceptance would have been conclusive upon him, because then it would have been voluntary. But this alternative was not presented to him. The alternative presented to him was this—here, take these commutation notes, or take nothing—yes, or take nothing. That this was the alternative is evident; first, because Congress supposed, and acted upon the idea, that these officers had agreed to accept the commutation in lieu of the half pay; and were to be held precluded. Then in consequence of this supposition, because Congress had made and contemplated making no provision, either immediate or prospective, for satisfying these life annuities, in case the commutation notes should be refused, by these officers, or by any of them. The alternative presented, then, unquestionably was this—either take these notes, or take nothing. And surely an acceptance thus constrained, thus compelled, was not, and could not, be called voluntary. A constrained acceptance a voluntary acceptance! Why, it is a contradiction in terms. You might as well say that a release of a private debt for half its amount, was a voluntary release, and a binding discharge. No: as in that case, the debt would still be a subsisting debt, at least for the unsatisfied balance; so this obligation is still a subsisting obligation, unless the commutation was a fair equivalent for the half pay. This question then arises—whether it was a fair equivalent; and if so, whether this equivalent has been paid up according to the terms of this contract. But upon these questions I do not propose now to speak. Both have been so clearly explained by the honorable gentleman who made the report, and by others in this debate, that if I made the attempt, I could not hope to shed upon them any additional light. I could but repeat what they have stated, and I fear I should but weaken what I repeated.

Mr. CHANDLER said he was no lawyer, and did not understand the nature of contracts. But he gathered from what had been said, that if any original contract was changed by the consent of the parties, it was still binding. It appears that a majority of the officers did accept the terms of the commutation, and that majority, in his opinion, swept away the original contract. And he looked upon the acceptance of the commutation certificates as a proof positive of their acquiescence in the terms proposed.—Otherwise, said Mr. C., I consider it binding on the claimants to show evidence that they did not vote for the commutation law. If that could be shewn, the case would have been made out.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland. I remarked on a former occasion that the Southern lines never did vote. General Green never propounded the question to the officers under him—and when they returned home they were forced to accept the certificates.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that there never was any proof of the acceptance of the law by the officers, with the exception of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury. But, was it not evident that those who did not vote for the bill were those who were under thirty years of age? They were those alone who were to be injured by it. Besides it is well known that the senior officers had allowed the younger officers to go home on furlough, consequently they were not present when the vote was taken in their respective lines.

Mr. HARRISON said that the Committee had been placed in a very delicate position, as they were probably restrained by motives of expediency from proposing all that their feelings and wishes would have led them to recommend. Mr. H. felt this difficulty himself, and thought it necessary to explain his reasons for opposing the introduction of the claims of the soldiers into this bill. He hardly knew how to oppose a measure, of the principle of which he was in favor. The gentleman from South Carolina has said that he did not censure these applicants; but certainly he has questioned their right and their motives. But said Mr. H., the author of this plan was the Commander-in-Chief himself; one of whose letters I read yesterday, in which he reiterated again and again the promise of Congress to the officers of half pay for life—and in which he declares that it is not only right and just but the only means of keeping the army together. He would now read another passage of the same letter. [Mr. H. then read a passage of the letter of General Washington, in which he urged the measure, not on the ground of the necessities of the officers, but on the single grounds of economy and public benefit.] That this had been the opinion of General Washington after the war, there was abundant evidence.

Mr. H. said he regretted that the gentleman from South Carolina had contrasted the claims of the regulars and the militia. Their merits and services could stand by the side of each other safely. He agreed that the claim of the militia was a valid one, and it was not his fault, if it was not acknowledged. The gentleman from South Carolina was mistaken in many of the facts which he had stated; and Mr. H. would endeavour to correct them. The battle of the Cowpens was gained by regular troops. General Pickens was the commander of the regulars, and he acted in this case, as in all others, with the utmost bravery and intelligence. Indeed, Mr. H. was of opinion that his share of the glory had never been awarded to him. He did not occupy the highest position, but he was always to be found at the post of danger. The militia at the Cowpens did all that was required of them; but distinguished themselves in no particular manner. [Mr. H. here read an account of the particulars of the battle.] He had heard a venerable officer doubt if ever a battle was fought before, in which the bayonets of the two parties were crossed; but that here it was the case, and the British were driven. The retreat to which the gentleman from South Carolina had alluded, was caused by circumstances beyond the control of the regular army. And that retreat had placed on high the name of Col. Otho A. Williams, who conducted it in a most masterly manner.

Mr. H. had never heard his friend from South Carolina, with so much dissatisfaction as on this subject. [He here made some allusions to the actions fought during that campaign, in reply to Mr. S., but the reporter has it not in his power to give the detail.] He would make one remark more in relation to the idea that the commutation being accepted, no further claim existed. They had no alternative. The government had no money to give them, and they were induced to take the terms offered. But had they, seeing that they were not paid an equivalent, taken the necessary means, the government would have been obliged to pay a much larger amount. For instance, they might have sold their claims to half-pay, instead of the commutation certificate. It could not be supposed that at a time when the half-pay was first offered them, they anticipated being forced to accept a less valuable consideration, when it is recollected that to this promise General Washington attributed the renovation of the army. In every point of view the army deserved the appellation bestowed upon it by him, of the patriot army; and Mr. H. felt regret that the appeal of these officers should have caused so much discussion, and had met with so much opposition. He felt deeply interested in this bill, and he had thought it his duty to correct the errors of his friend from South Carolina, because, in one of the affairs to which he had alluded, a friend of Mr. H.'s took a part, to whom he owed more than to any other person. But besides, he felt interested in preserving inviolate the fame of the heroes of the revolution, to whom he owed, in common with all, the gift of freedom, to which perhaps he might add, that his dearest friend died upon the field in those days of glorious peril.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he was desirous of stating his views on this bill; but the day was now too far advanced to justify him in troubling the Senate with further debate. He therefore moved that the Senate adjourn.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1828.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

On motion of Mr. KANE, the bill for regulating process in the Courts of the United States, in States admitted into the Union since 1789, was then taken up, and the question being upon the amendment offered by Mr. White to insert after the word "now" the words, "may be"—

Mr. WHITE said that some discussion had already occurred on the amendment offered by him, and as provisions were absolutely necessary in some of the districts, rather than embarrass its passage, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. ROWAN then rose, and in support of an amendment proposed by him, the effect of which was to take away the power of the Federal courts, to supervise and modify the process laws passed by the State legislatures, expressed himself at considerable length, alluding more particularly to abuses that had arisen in the State of Kentucky. He observed that the judges ought to be made to publish their rules, for in his State the people had only learned the nature of the rules of Court, by their operation, and when feeling their effect in the progress of their suits. He protested against the right of judges to alter, to annul, or to make laws, and desired to confine the Judiciary within its own proper orbit. He thought Congress was not wandering from its proper sphere, in passing laws which were not to be altered at the discretion of judges. It might be proper for courts to regulate and modify the mere forms; but this prerogative ought to be much guarded; for there never was a power delegated, which was not carried to its full extent by those in whose hands it was placed. It was difficult to get back power when once given; and here a transfer of power was contemplated which might be carried to a dangerous length, as it was in the nature of such grants to steal on gradually in an imperceptible manner, and in the end to defy all redress or retrenchment. If it was necessary, a law to regulate rules of court ought to be passed by Congress. This House was the laboratory in which laws were to be made. And if Congress did not choose to make these laws, let those of the States be adopted, which could easily be done, and would suit the desires of all. He believed the people were the best judges of their own interest, and of what would conduce to their happiness; and the happiness of the people was always the prime object of all governments. They certainly understood better what suited their condition than any central legislative power could do. The people in Kentucky were sore on this subject. They had long protested against the wrongs they had suffered; but being a single State, those evils were scarcely heard. It would be different, Mr. Rowan argued, when any number of the States were similarly aggrieved at the same time. Their remonstrances would then be heard, and heard effectually. What was the objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee? Were the codes of the States too vulgar for the sublimated comprehensions of the Federal Courts. He could not conceive of such a distinction, for, although we had two separate governments, we had as yet but one people, and what the laws of one could effect, could be done by the laws of the other. It was a scandal that the States were not placed on a footing in law with an honorable gentleman. The confidence placed in them was not equal to that placed in an individual of good moral character; and it was supposed that the States were capable of partial conduct involving a degree of moral obliquity of which an honest man would scorn to be guilty. If the States could be depended on; if they could be trusted to enact process acts for their own people, why should not the Federal Courts be directed by them? Why should not the intellect which regulated the process of the State Courts be applied also to the regulation of the Federal Courts? There was generally as much gravity and industry in the legislatures of the States as in Congress, at least for the purposes to which their endeavors were directed. He hoped the velo of the House might be put upon this question. He did not believe that the framers of the act of 1789, intended that the Federal Courts should have supreme controul over process in the States from its incipency to its details. On these grounds he had proposed to amend the bill.

Mr. KANE said that he had hoped that this question would have been settled before the hour had arrived for the consideration of special orders. The measure was so essential to several of the new States that he was very desirous that it should now be disposed of. The gentleman from Kentucky had moved to strike out that portion of the bill which subjects the laws of process to the supervision of the Federal Courts. He (Mr. K.) thought the words ought to be retained. The gentleman had alluded to the difficulties which had arisen in Kentucky. But he considered that those difficulties arose from the fact that no such bill as this had been in existence. He thought it an error of the gentleman from Kentucky that he wished to apply the circumstances of former years to the present condition of things. What was the object of this bill? It was to make the process of the Federal Courts the same as those of the States. This was the general proposition. It did not give the judges power to make or alter process laws; but only the power of modifying them so as to make them consistent, so far as related to forms. He doubted whether any judge since the act of 1789, had undertaken to alter process laws of the States further than related to the forms. He hoped the bill would now be allowed to pass.

Judicial Process.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, made a few remarks in support of the motion of Mr. Rowan. He considered that any measure which should directly or indirectly sustain the power of the judges of the Federal Courts, as now exercised in Kentucky, operated effectually to sanction the principle of tyranny and oppression, which caused the separation of this country from Great Britain. For himself, so help him God! he never would yield to judge or jury, acting under illegal forms, his constitutional rights.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew his motion at the suggestion of

Mr. VAN BUREN, who said that the question ought now to be disposed of. Six States were now waiting the result of the legislation on this subject. This was the second year which this subject had been before Congress, and he was very desirous that its decision should be no longer delayed; and it was quite certain that the bill could be disposed of at once.

Mr. V. B. then made some remarks in a very low voice, the whole of which were not heard by the reporter. He was understood to express regret at being forced into collision with the opinions of a gentleman for whom he had the highest estimation. The motion offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, had proposed to give the legislatures of the States the power of prescribing rules, still preserving the supervision of the Federal Courts. That proposition had been withdrawn, leaving the bill as it originally stood, proposing to put the new States on the same footing with the older branches of the Union.

Now, sir, said Mr. V. B., I sincerely regret that an attempt should have been made to change the system by a new proposition, the operation of which will be to place the new States on an entirely different footing. And I shall oppose such a measure with as much zeal as is shewn by the gentleman from Kentucky, in its advocacy. I have heretofore spoken of the difficulties experienced by those who first regulated the judiciary of the country. They were obliged to observe the various powers of the States—and they had therefore to avoid any measure which should change or infringe the then existing laws of each member of the Union. They could not do away the State laws, and it would be recollected that many of the then existing laws threw important obstacles in the way of the Federal Courts growing out of the English laws from which they had been adopted. They therefore took the laws of the States as they found them, and upon that multifarious basis, built up the Federal judiciary of the country. In one, two, or perhaps three instances only, had any difficulty occurred between the State powers and the Federal Courts. In Kentucky the ferment that at one time existed, had happily been quieted. The only difficulty in that State had been that the rules of court originated with the Federal Court, instead of emanating, as they should have done, from the State legislature, subject to the supervision of the Federal Judges. But, said Mr. V. B., I think my friend from Kentucky is in the wrong. It appears to me that it was the duty of the State legislature to have adopted rules; and if they did not establish them, it was their own fault.

The Courts, in the performance of their duties, finding none, were forced to make rules to govern their process. The gentleman from Kentucky has adopted a mistaken idea in supposing that legislation could be exercised in matters pointed out by the constitution as coming peculiarly under the province of the Supreme Court. That Court adopted the State laws as far as was practicable; and they could go no farther.

It was admitted, that in the formation of the Federal Courts, the best system that the nature of things would allow, had been adopted; they could not have framed a better plan. It could not be done now. He was very desirous that the bill should pass as it came from the committee; as he thought no State had reason to complain of the law as it now stands.

Mr. ROWAN would detain the Senate but a few moments. He did not agree with his friend from New York, as to the necessity of keeping up the present system, or in the opinion that it was the best that could be framed. That gentleman argues that there is a necessity operating, which in certain cases may involve the laws of a sovereign State. Has that necessity existed for half a century? Is it from that cause that the gentleman argues that, in a time of profound peace, we are forced to cherish a germ of poison within the bosom of the country? If discretion must be given, I ask whether it is not safer in the hands of the million and a half of freemen in the State of New York, than intrusted to the judges of the Federal Courts? If this matter must be trusted to somebody, is it not better to place it in the hands of the people themselves, than in the discretionary power of two or three individuals, who may be strangers to the interests and welfare of the people of the State?

The laws were not made to be unalterable; they were not framed never to be revoked. And now, when an opportunity offers to change what has produced such evil consequences, it is put off until a more convenient time. Agrippa-like, gentlemen looked forward to the more convenient season to take hold of this all important subject. I ask again, said Mr. R., if it is not more safe for the judges to agree to the views of the people of the State in which they preside, than by any arbitrary laws framed by themselves, to destroy public confidence, and injure local interests. Will you trust the confluent intellect of a million of citizens or the isolated opinions of two individuals? The latter has already given rise to contests of the most serious nature; and I say, if you have not time to frame a code to embrace all points, I am for adopting the codes of the States. For, although we are but one people, we have two governments, and the local laws of this people ought not to be neglected. To the general government they are liege subjects, without thereby losing sight of what is due to State rights. They fight your battles; they contribute to your wealth, yet they will not yield their rights to the general government. You may send out your viceroys to make laws; but a perfect code will never be framed, until the rules of court be made to rest upon the concentrated discretion of the States themselves. And he did not fear to say, that there was as much virtue and integrity in the State legislatures as in the general government.

Feeling the kindness and courtesy of the gentleman from New York, and fully reciprocating the respect and esteem which that gentleman had expressed toward him, Mr. R. regretted that they should differ so widely. The gentleman from Illinois would excuse him for delaying the present consideration of the bill, by moving to lay it on the table, in order to give time for its full investigation. He would barely remark, in conclusion, that his object was not precisely the same as that of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WATTS] but was enlarged so as to embrace all of the States.

The bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The bill for the relief of certain surviving Officers of the Revolutionary Army was then again taken up for consideration. In support of this bill,

Mr. BERRIEN addressed the Senate as follows: I have, said he, hitherto abstained from taking any part in this debate. Having satisfied myself that the memorialists have a claim on the justice of this Government, founded on the most rigorous legal principles that can be invoked for the decision of questions of private right, sustained and enforced, if such support were necessary, by that high and ennobling feeling of gratitude for meritorious service, which ought to distinguish us as a nation, and which, as individuals, we should be proud to cherish: having listened to the very lucid and impressive exposition of the subject, which has been given by the Chairman of the Committee, I have not heretofore permitted myself to believe, that this measure was fated to encounter the opposition by which it has been recently assailed. Even now, when under the influence of feelings thus called into exercise, and yielding to the wishes of my associates, I present myself to the notice of the Senate, I entreat gentlemen to believe, that it is in the discharge of my duty, as a member of the Committee, that I am induced to make even this brief trespass on their time.

I owe it to myself to make one preliminary remark. Educated in feelings of deep and habitual reverence for those illustrious men, by whose exertions, under Providence, this great Republic was ushered into existence, I have nevertheless silenced their suggestions, in the decision of this question. I came to its consideration with a perfect and unchangeable conviction, that, to entitle these memorialists to the allowance of their claim, it was necessary to do something more than merely make out a case, which should appeal to the gratitude of the American People, however meritorious and brilliant the services on which that appeal was founded. The claim was upon the Public Treasury of that People, preferred to agents of limited authority, who must allow or reject it, in the exercise of their constitutional functions, not under the influence of individual feeling. I presume not to question the motives of any Senator, who may differ from me, when I say, that we are not the almoners of the American People, the dispensers of their charity, but agents, with limited powers, entrusted with the control of the public purse, for the sole purpose of applying it to the current exigencies of the Government, in the advancement of great principles of public policy connected with the exercise of powers substantively conferred upon us, and in the discharge of individual claims arising from our own, or the engagements of our predecessors. I am very well aware, that this limited construction of our powers will often be productive of embarrassment; that many cases will arise, in which my feelings will strongly urge a more extended interpretation. In my view, however, it is forbidden, by considerations higher even than charity, by considerations of fealty to the Constitution, which we have sworn to preserve.

If I err, then, on this occasion, it is from my incapacity to estimate a claim of mere right, to determine an ordinary question of metum and timor, on the principles of that science, to which I have devoted (negligently, if you will, Sir, but still with some little ardor, however transient,) the best years of my life. Why should I repress the expression of the feeling which rises unbidden to my lips? The proudest privilege which that profession has ever accorded to me, is that which I this day enjoy, of vindicating, on this floor, under the clearest convictions of my judgment, the claim of these gallant veterans upon the justice of the country.

In the formation of my opinion on this subject, I have excluded every consideration of the character of the service on which this claim is founded, of the individual or collective merits of those who performed it. For all the purposes of this inquiry, that question is res judicata. It has passed into judgment by the decision of our predecessors, in the Congress of 1780, and 1783. The claim is of record, and the single question for our determination, is, whether it has been discharged.

While, however, in order to exclude from this inquiry every consideration which does not legitimately belong to it, I abstain from speaking of the character of the service, which it is the object of this bill to compensate, with any view to invoke your gratitude in aid of your justice, I cannot listen in silence to observations, of which the tendency, however unintentional, is to diminish the just estimate of its value. I present this as a claim of right, resting in contract, and having the character of an express conventional obligation. But, if gentlemen will look behind that contract, to the consideration on which it is founded, for the purpose of instituting an unfavorable comparison between these memorialists, and those of their companions in arms, although I cannot be tempted to say aught which may detract from the merits of the latter, it is my right, it is my duty, to defend those who have defended us; to rescue from all unfriendly judgment, the hard earned reputation of those gallant men, who breasted the storm in the perilous struggle of our Revolutionary conflict. If I could shrink from the performance of such a duty, I should be faithless to the best and purest feelings of my heart. That eye is forever dimmed, whose living, indignant gaze, I could not brook, if I were thus recreant from the claims of nature and affection.

Sir, is it at this day a question, whether those gallant men, whom Washington so often led to victory and renown, with whom he so often shared privations and sufferings, infinitely more trying to the spirit of the soldier, than danger in its most appalling form; is it at this day, a question, whether they have or have not deserved all that a grateful country can bestow? Fifty years have rolled on amid the annual recitals of their achievements, while they themselves have, for the most part, passed away, leaving to us the rich legacy of their heroic deeds. Sir, the reputation of the Revolutionary patriot is the moral treasure of the nation. In ages yet to come, it will constitute that nation's strength.

I repeat the declaration, I do not found the claim which I am now advocating before you, on the consideration that it was dearly, nobly won. I do not assume for these memorialists any pre-eminence of merit over their companions in arms, or their fellow-laborers in the councils of that dark and trying hour. I can turn with an enthusiasm as glowing as that of my respected friend on my left, to the brilliant scenes of Bunker's Hill, of Bennington, and of King's Mountain; to those illustrious men, who led our militia to victory in many a stormy fight; ay, and to the militia themselves, whose individual valor has often snatched victory from the disciplined phalanx which opposed them. I can deplore the mutability of fortune, which the victor of Burgoyne was destined to experience on the plains of Camden. But, I am a Southern man; and need I remind him that some of the most brilliant scenes of our Revolutionary strife were exhibited in the campaign of the Carolinas, under the auspices of Green, emphatically denominated the second savior of his country? Sir, while I cheerfully accord the meed of merited praise to Sumpter, and Marion, and Pickens, I cannot forget that Wayne, and Lee, and Howard, and Williams, and Morgan, and Moultrie, and a host of other worthies of the regular army, were foremost in the struggle of Southern strife.

But, why this unprofitable comparison, between the merits of the regular army and the militia, in the war of the Revolution? Why disturb the repose of the tomb, or mantle the cheek of the survivors with the glow of honest indignation? The reputation of both is the com-man property of the country. Is it our interest to diminish either? The effort would be as gratuitous as it would be unwelcome and unjust. I will proceed to state, as briefly as I may, the legal view which I have of this claim.

In May, 1778, Congress passed a resolution promising to give seven years' half-pay to officers, who were then in the army, and should so continue until the end of the war. In October, 1780, they resolved that all officers, who should continue in service until the end of the war, should be entitled to half-pay during life, to commence from the time of the reduction.

Here, for a moment, let us pause. The present memorialists were embraced in these resolutions. They were officers of the American army, and served with fidelity until the close of the war. With them, these resolutions, that of 1780, particularly, constitute a contract, a promise that they should receive half their regular pay, during their lives, on the performance by them of the stipulated condition. That condition they have performed, and the contract has become absolute on the part of the Government. The single question for our inquiry is, Has it been fulfilled? Unless this can be affirmed, its obligation remains, however successfully you may resist its enforcement, by applying the statute of limitations as a bar to the remedy, or by the exercise, for any other cause, of your power to refuse this application.

Has this contract been fulfilled? How—in what manner has it been fulfilled? In March, 1783, Congress resolved that these officers should be entitled to receive five years' full pay, in money or securities, at six per cent. per annum, as Congress should find most convenient, instead of the half-pay for life, promised by the resolution of October, 1780, under certain provisions to which I will hereafter advert more particularly. The confederated Government was then without funds, and without the means of raising them otherwise than by the contributions of the States. Nevertheless, the certificates were issued to the officers, in 1784, for the amount of this commutation and their arrears of pay, and as well in that year as in 1783, Congress resolved that requisitions should be made on the several States, to provide funds for the discharge of the demands of the army. But, these requisitions were not complied with by the States. The inevitable consequence was, that the certificates fell to about one-tenth of their nominal value, and at this depreciated rate, the necessities of the officers compelled them for the most part, to dispose of them. Then came the funding act of 1790. The arrears of interest were funded at three per cent. instead of six, and payment of one-third of the principal was deferred for ten years, without interest.

Upon this state of facts, my proposition is, that the original contract of October, 1780, is still subsisting and obligatory upon the Government; that payments made under the resolution of 1783 are applicable to it as credits, but cannot be pleaded in discharge.

Those who deny the continued subsisting obligation of this contract, must affirm one of two things. Either that the resolution of 1783 became obligatory upon these memorialists, by their acceptance of it, as a substitution for the contract of 1780, and by the performance on that part of the Government, of its stipulations; or that the certificates issued and received in 1784, were, of themselves, and independently of the resolution of 1783, a sufficient satisfaction of the contract of 1780. The latter ground has not been taken by the opponents of this bill. It is too obviously indefensible to be maintained. It will suffice, therefore, to direct our attention to the inquiry, whether the resolution of 1783, and the subsequent transactions between the parties, are sufficient to discharge the contract which it created?

On this subject, I maintain these positions:

1. That the propositions contained in the resolution of 1783, never were obligatory on these memorialists, because, after the period limited for their acceptance, and within which time it is not pretended that they were accepted, they ceased to be obligatory on the Government, and reciprocity of obligation is of the very essence of such a contract.

2. That there was no acceptance of these propositions by these memorialists at any time—and

3. That the receipt by the memorialists of the certificates issued in 1784, cannot be pleaded in discharge of the contract of 1780.

Let us look very briefly at this subject in the first view. The resolution of 1783, which proposed the allowance of five years' full pay, instead of the half pay due by the original contract, expressly subjected it to this condition—that the election of the officers to accept it, should, in the manner specified in the resolution, “be signified to Congress through the Commander in Chief, from the lines under his immediate command, within two months, and through the Commanding Officer of the Southern Army, within 6 months from the date of the resolution.” It is unnecessary to enter into details upon this point. It suffices to state, generally, what is, on all hands, admitted, that the condition attached to the offer contained in the resolution of 1783, was not, in fact, performed by those to whom the offer was made, within the time prescribed. At the expiration of that time, it ceased to be obligatory upon the Government. The contract between the parties was in precisely the same condition as if the resolution of 1783 had never been passed, and consequently the contract founded on the resolution of 1780 was in full force and operation. An ineffectual attempt had been made to substitute for the original contract one, the terms of which were specified in the resolution of 1783—but the failure to accept those terms in the manner, and within the time prescribed in the offer, necessarily prevented its consummation. No legal obligation could attach to the party making the offer, because of the failure of the party to whom it was made to accept it, according to the specified terms. Each party was therefore remitted to his rights as they existed anterior to this unsuccessful attempt to modify them. I submit to my professional associates on this floor, whether this would not be the legal effect of such a state of things between individuals; and to all, the inquiry, whether this Government can, with propriety, absolve itself from the obligation of those principles, which, through its judicial department, it would enforce in transactions between its citizens.

I maintain, then, that, on the failure to accept the offer made by the Government in 1783, on the terms, and within the time prescribed, the resolution containing that offer became fundus officio; that the original contract between the parties still subsisted, unaffected by this unsuccessful attempt to agree upon a substitute; and that all subsequent transactions between them, in the absence of express individual stipulation, are necessarily referrible to this as the only subsisting contract.

I have said that there was no acceptance of the offer contained in the resolution of 1783, within the time prescribed for its acceptance, and, consequently, that it was not binding upon the Government; and if not binding upon the party making the tender, certainly not so upon the party to whom the tender was made, since reciprocity of obligation was of the essence of such a contract. I now assert, that the acceptance of this offer by those to whom it was addressed, within the time, and in the very terms specified in the resolution, would not have operated as a legal bar to the claims of these memorialists. The contract entered into by the United States with the officers of the Revolutionary Army, the terms of which are set forth in the resolution of October, 1780, was a contract with the several individuals described in that resolution, which gave to each of them an individual right to half pay during life—of which right he could only be deprived by his own free consent, on the receipt of a fair equivalent. I inquire of gentlemen of the profession, if this proposition can be denied? If the individual right of an officer thus acquired by this resolution, could have been surrendered by the conjoint act of every other officer in the American Army, without the individual assent of that officer? I presume no one will assert this as a proposition capable of being maintained on legal principles. It might as well be affirmed, that the release by a majority of the officers of their right to their regular and current pay, would have operated to discharge the claims to such pay, of those who did not concur in their lease. But, if I am right in contending that the contract of 1780 could only be released by the individual assent of those with whom it was made, then I maintain that the resolution of 1783 was, from its very terms, incapable of becoming obligatory upon these memorialists. It was not addressed to them. They could not become parties to it in the only character in which their acceptance of it could have operated to discharge the contract of 1780. It was addressed to the lines and corps of the army. If it had been accepted in time, and in conformity to its own precise terms, it would still have been a contract between the Government and those officers of the army who accepted it—not between the Government and the individuals of which that army was composed—and could no more have affected the rights of those individuals than it could have influenced your rights or mine. Unless, then, it can be successfully asserted that the act of a majority of the officers of any line of the army, without any specific authority from the individuals comprising that line, can operate to release the rights of those individuals, it cannot be pretended that the acceptance which is relied upon, even if it had been made within the time prescribed by the resolution of 1783, could have operated to release the obligation imposed upon the Government by the resolution of 1780. If this could be, it would follow that the right of an individual, resting on the plighted faith of the Government, might be divested without his consent. Who is prepared to affirm this proposition? In despotisms, sir, the subject reposes on the word of Majesty—and, in general, reposes securely; because the honor of the Throne is the interest of the Throne. In Republics, the free citizen places his reliance on the principles of justice, which emphatically belong to such a Government. But if it can substitute its own will for the obligations which it has assumed to the individual, and coerce that individual by the acts of those to whom he had delegated no authority to represent him, the difference between these Governments is but in name, and its practical operation is to his disadvantage.

I repeat, then, that, up to the issuing of the certificates in 1784, the original contract, created by the resolution of October, 1780, remained unimpaired and unchanged; that neither the resolution of 1783, nor the agreement by certain lines and corps of the army to accept the proposal it contained, could operate to divest the rights of these memorialists, as derived from that original contract. These remained unchanged and unchangeable, except by their own consent, freely given, and for a fair equivalent. We may refuse their allowance; but it must be—I speak it with great respect—by a perversion of the principles of justice. We may presume the acceptance, by these memorialists, of the offer contained in the resolution of 1783, and require them to negative the presumption; but it must be—I speak it with great respect—by a perversion of the rules of evidence. Will the Government of the United States avail itself of its power to do this, in this its own peculiar forum? And against whom? Against the war-worn veterans of the Revolution—your champions in the day of their strength—suppliants before you now—not for charity, but for justice, in the season of their poverty and decrepitude.

VOL. IV.—14

We have thus traced this inquiry up to the period of the issue of the certificates in 1784; and now this question presses itself upon our attention: Assuming the fact that these memorialists were among those who accepted those certificates, did not such acceptance operate as a ratification of the proposal contained in the resolution of 1783, and a release of the contract of 1780? The answer to this inquiry will be found by considering these questions:

Was the acceptance voluntary?

Did the Government pay a fair equivalent?

Were these certificates received on account, or in full satisfaction?

No one will pretend that the constrained and involuntary acceptance of that which was not a fair equivalent for the stipulations of the contract of 1780, could, either at law or in equity, be considered as a release, or discharge, or satisfaction, of that contract. The questions recur. Let us look to the situation of the contracting parties, at the moment when these transactions occurred. That examination will prove that the issue of the certificates, as well as their acceptance, were alike acts of necessity on the part of the Government and the officers. At the moment of passing the resolution of 1783, promising the half pay for life, the Confederate Government, exhausted by the Revolutionary struggle, and entirely destitute of funds, and of the means of commanding them, relied upon being enabled to comply with their engagements, by requisitions upon the States. These requisitions were accordingly made, and urged with great earnestness in the Summer of 1783. But the States themselves were not in a condition to meet the exigency. They, also, were in a state of exhaustion. It is difficult, at this day, to realize the extent of the exertions, the sufferings, and the privations of our forefathers, in the dark and trying hour of their struggle for the right of self-government, which we now enjoy. The requisitions were not complied with. The Confederate Government found itself without funds. It became necessary to disband the army. The officers had claims for arrearages of pay, and the stipulated half pay for life was to be provided for. While this question was pending, incendiary letters, clothed in language the most persuasive and seducing, had been circulated in the army. The officers were eloquently urged, by every consideration which could appeal to their feelings or to their interests, never to lay down their arms, until their demands were complied with. It was an hour of deep and awakening interest; but the patriotism of the army was equal to the trial. Their conduct was duly appreciated by the Congress of 1783. It was no longer a question whether the just expectations of such men should be satisfied to the utmost extent of the resources of the Confederation. The commutation for half pay was stipulated. Requisitions on the States were made and urged with the energy which belonged to the occasion; and, when these failed, Congress gave—it was all they had to give—the certificates of 1784. They were not given in full payment, in satisfaction, of the claims of the officers, in discharge of the obligations of the Government. They were expressive of the sense which the Government had of the services of the army; an acknowledgment of their actual inability to compensate them as they had stipulated to do. The very terms of the receipt which was taken, are strongly indicative of this. It was not a receipt in full, a clear and express acquittal of the Government of all demands upon it. No. It was a simple acknowledgment, in each case, of the mere fact of the receipt of the certificate—clearly implying that the question of final compensation was open, and subject to future adjustment. It could not have been believed by Congress that these certificates, not resting on any adequate funds for their redemption, could be considered as even a legal compliance with the engagements of the resolutions either of 1780 or 1783. They were aware that securities, thus issued, must be liable to constant and excessive depreciation. These views of the Government were common to the officers; but even the miserable pittance afforded by this depreciated paper, was demanded by their necessities, and they received them with a simple acknowledgment of the fact of the receipt, confiding in the justice of the Government for future and adequate compensation. I do not trouble you with a repetition of those calculations which prove the magnitude and extent of the losses thus sustained by the memorialists, from this operation; for they have been clearly and satisfactorily stated by the Chairman of the Committee, and cannot indeed be the subject of controversy. I speak not now of the loss sustained by the Officers, from the depreciation of the public paper, which, in common with the private soldiers, and with all classes of our citizens, they were destined to bear, and which they have borne without complaint; but of that which arose from the failure to comply with the stipulations of the contract of 1780, from the inadequacy of the allowance of five years' full pay, as a commutation for the half pay for life, and from the rigor and injustice, as it related to these memorialists, of the funding act of 1790.

Can it then be pretended that these certificates were given and accepted in full satisfaction of the claims of the officers—that they were voluntarily accepted—that they constitute a full and fair equivalent for the claims of these memorialists, under either of the resolutions so often referred to in this discussion? I do not ask if it was an equitable fulfilment of your contract? I inquire not if it was such a fulfilment, as it will comport with the dignity of a great, and free, and flourishing nation, to urge against the veterans in her Revolutionary strife, bending under the pressure of poverty and decrepitude? I make no appeal to your gratitude:—to those high and ennobling feelings which spontaneously swell in our bosoms, when our thoughts are thrown back upon that interesting struggle.

For all the purposes of declamation, the theme is most fruitful? but it is not my purpose to declaim. I inquire simply, and I address the inquiry particularly to my professional associates on this floor, if in law, or on principles of strict right, as between individuals, the acts done by the Government, and submitted to by the memorialists, can be considered as a discharge of the contract of 1780? The clearest convictions of my judgment, assure me, that they were not—that these memorialists have still a subsisting claim for half pay, subject to all fair deductions for what has been received—or at the option of both parties, to two years' full pay, with an allowance for the loss sustained by the failure to provide adequate funds for the redemption of the certificates, and from the provisions of the funding system.

But, here it is objected to the provisions of this bill, that the claims of the representatives of the deceased officers, as well as that of the private soldiers, and of the militia, are equally strong with those of the memorialists, and yet, are not provided for. There are various answers to this objection. In the first place, the supposed claimants are not applicants for relief. They have made no demand upon the Government; and have, thereby, afforded a silent, but emphatic evidence, of their own opinion on the subject. It will be time enough to announce our view of such a claim, when it shall be presented.

But I propose an inquiry to Senators by whom this objection is urged. Admitting, argumenti gratia, the equal claim with these officers, of the various classes referred to, is that an answer to the claim of the former? Because there are other classes of persons, who have just claims upon you, which have not been presented, are you absolved from the obligation to pay those, of which the payment is solicited? I thank God, Sir, this Government is now solvent and competent to the payment of all just claims upon its Treasury.

I propose another inquiry. Senators who so strongly and feelingly urge the claims of these other classes, are of course satisfied of their correctness. They cannot doubt the solvency of the Government, or the willingness of the American People to discharge all just claims upon them, especially those contracted in the war of Independence. Sir, that People are always in advance of us in those questions which appeal to their justice or to their liberality. Are those Senators willing to provide for those claims? Will they support the present bill, with an amendment which shall provide for them? If they will not, let the objection stand upon its real ground, which is co-extensive with every claim for Revolutionary service.

Let us, however, for a moment examine the character of these claims—and first, of those, of the representatives of deceased officers—Consider their claim to half pay, under the resolution of 1780. Half pay is in the nature of an annuity for life. It is designed by the Government for the comfortable support of the officer, and not as a provision for his representatives. It is agreed, however, that any arrears which may be due at the time of his death, constitute a part of his personal estate, and will descend to those representatives. But the half pay was limited to the life of the officer—and those whom these claimants represent are dead. When they died—whether the amount of half pay, to which they were then entitled, exceeded or fell short of that sum which they had received, in the certificates issued in 1784, are questions which you are not prepaired to determine; and your inability to do this, furnishes no excuse for postponing the just claims of others, who still survive, and are consequently still entitled.

Then consider it upon the footing of the commutation, under the resolution of 1783, and the discrimination is still stronger in favor of the present memorialists.

The Congress of 1783 fixed upon five years' full pay, as a commutation for half pay for life. How was this done? To junior officers of the army—to men between twenty and thirty years of age, it was manifestly not an equivalent. A reference to the annuity tables, and the reflections of every one who hears me, will convince us, that they were entitled to full pay for a longer term of years? that, in the ordinary calculations of human life, they were authorized to expect a prolongation of it, beyond the term which was assumed in the estimate. For the senior officers of the army—for those of forty five years and upwards, the estimate was, perhaps, too large—it was probably more than an equivalent for half pay for life, calculating the probability of its duration in their case, in the same manner as in that of the junior officers. What then was the principle adopted in making the estimate? It was by taking a single life, the age of which was ascertained by the average of the ages of all the officers of the army, and calculating its probable duration, as the measure of the projected commutation. Now, the Chairman of the Committee has satisfactorily shown, by a reference to the most approved annuity tables, that, even on this assumption, the commutation actually allowed was too small. But that is not the point of the present inquiry. The complaint of the junior officers is this: that the amount of the commutation, to which they were entitled, was diminished, and that of the senior officers was increased, by assuming an average. In truth, the only fair principle on which such commutation could have been regulated, would have been by establishing different rates of allowance for different ages, and then applying them according to the state of the fact, when the certificates were issued, in the same manner in which annuities for life are converted into sums in gross, in transactions between individuals. Instead of this, the junior officer was deprived of a portion of the benefit of the prolonged life, which he was authorized to expect, which was given to his senior. It by no means, therefore, follows, that, because the claims of these mememorialists, who were among the juniors of the army, are sustained on the ground that they did not receive an equivalent, that a like claim exists in behalf of the senior officers, or their representatives. On the contrary, although the commutation, on the average assumed, was inadequate, it is a very reasonable presumption, that, to the senior officers, it was a fair equivalent. It is in right of these senior officers, that representatives would, for the most part, claim—and to them, therefore, in general, this answer might be safely and justly given. Many senators may recollect individual instances, which will seem to be variant from this view; a closer scrutiny will, however, show that they are exceptions, which do not conflict with the rule; and that they do not exist to any important extent.

It is thus, then, that these memorialists distinguish their case from that of the representatives of the deceased officers. That they were among the junior officers of the American army is proved by the fact, that they are, at this day, applicants at the bar of an American Senate. They tell you, that, in settling the commutation allowed, you took from them, to give to their seniors, without their consent, in the only way in which that consent could have been given, namely, by their individual voice. They tell you, that the acceptance of that commutation was by their seniors, who derived a benefit at their cost; and they deny that the allowance of their claim, now, to what was then taken from them to be given to those seniors, can constitute the basis of a claim on the part of the representatives of those seniors to a similar allowance. In truth, Sir, it would seem that all to which those representatives would make any claim would be to the amount of the loss sustained by the short funding of the certificates, under the act of 1790.

The claim of the memorialists would be either for the arrears of their half pay, deducting what was realised from the certificates, or to the difference between five and seven years' full pay, with simple interest, and to the amount of the loss sustained by the funding.

The deficiency of the commutation, with simple interest, would amount to - $ 534,000
One year's full pay, by short funding and simple interest, to - $ 175,000

It is only to the latter that the representatives of deceased officers could make claim, on the principles, and subject to the conditions, which I have attempted to explain.

It is objected that this bill contains no provision for the private soldiers of the American Army, and Senators have spoken of them in terms of well-merited eulogy, which it would be delightful to hear, if it were not pronounced in opposition to the just claims of these memorialists. But the discussion is wholly gratuitous and irrelevant. The character of the service rendered by the American officers was determined by the Congress of 1780 and 1783. They adjudged it to be faithful service, and they stipulated to reward it by a specific compensation. The memorialists ask from you, in the discharge of your constitutional obligation, the performance of that stipulation. Whatever may be the claims of the American soldier on the gratitude of the country, and it is cheerfully admitted that they are founded on distinguished valor, and the purest patriotism, unless they can shew the contract of the Government, their claim is on its gratitude, but they cannot appeal to its justice; and the effort to assimilate it to the claim of these memorialists is merely nugatory.

But, independently of your contract with the officer, would the analogy contended for exist? The soldier received a bounty on his enlistment, and was clothed by the Government, by whom the depreciation of the purchase money was borne. The officer, out of the monthly stipend which was paid to him in this depreciated currency, was compelled to provide for himself. Your contract with the soldier has been complied with on its face. Nevertheless, you have made a distinction in his favor in your pension law. The soldier has received land, bounty, pay, pension. What have you done for the officer? If he will approach you as a suppliant, in forma pauperis, you admit him on your pension list. But, when he presents himself before you as a claimant, and asks the fulfilment of your contract, you turn a deaf ear to his demand.

But the bill does not provide for the militia, and, therefore, it is objectionable. Sir, I am at all times willing to accord to the militia of the Revolutionary Army whatever distinguished valor and the loftiest patriotism can entitle them to claim. But, I repeat, this application is based on your contract with these memorialists. They do not urge upon you the pre-eminence of their services, or seek to disparage those of their associates in arms, who belonged to the militia. They ask the fulfilment of your contract with them. With the militia you have no such engagements. They were called into service by the States, by whom they were compensated, and the States have received an allowance for these disbursements in the general audit and adjustment of their accounts with the National Treasury. It cannot be, therefore, that the omission to provide for the militia can constitute a tenable objection to this bill.

Sir, the inquiry recurs: If provisions for all these various classes were included in the bill under discussion, would the difficulties of the objectors be removed? Or, are the claims of those classes urged upon us to give an alarming view of the magnitude of the obligations of the Government, and thus to defeat the present claim, without any view to ultimate provision for them? I apprehend the latter is the real state of the fact. I trust, therefore, that this discussion will not excite expectations which are too surely destined to be disappointed, and my earnest hope and desire is, that the Senate will decide the present application with a sole view to its own intrinsic merits. Whatever is due to justice, the Government is competent to perform. Whatever justly belongs to these gallant veterans, we ought to accord to them freely, promptly, and with gratitude.

But the appeal of these memorialists is not addressed to our gratitude; it is a claim upon our justice. The demands upon the former, it is beyond our power to cancel. The claims upon the latter, we are competent to fulfil. These veteran soldiers do not—it cannot be too often repeated—they do not come before us as suppliants for our charity. No, sir; struggling with adversity, bending under the weight of years, they still retain enough of the sturdy independence of their youthful spirit, to avoid this humiliation. They claim the fulfilment of a contract. They demand, respectfully, but earnestly, the award of justice.

Sir, let it be the honest pride of this Government sum cuique tribuere. Render to every man his due; fulfil your plighted faith; redeem the solemn pledge which you gave at a moment, when, besides that pledge, you had nothing else to give. Enable us to meet the little remnant of this band of heroes, who yet survive, the objects of their country's reverence, with a consciousness of having at least dealt justly with them.

Smooth their descent to the tomb, by giving to them the means of providing those comforts to which they are justly and of right entitled. Do not allow the sense of their country's persevering injustice to give an added pang to the last struggles of expiring nature. Be just, and fear not. The universal acclaim of a grateful People will consecrate the act.

Mr. COBB said, he asked the indulgence of the Senate for a short period, while he attempted, very briefly, to express his opinions, in relation to the measure under consideration. He felt himself constrained to oppose the passage of the bill. In doing so, he was conscious that he exposed himself to the charge of a want of feeling. This, however, should not deter him from discharging, in the best manner he could, what he conceived to be his duty. Or two former occasions, it had been his fortune to be exposed to a similar charge. He alluded to the bill granting pensions to the indigent officers and soldiers of the Revolution, and the bill making further provision for General Lafayette. These measures, like the one under consideration, were said by their friends to be required by both the justice and the gratitude of the nation. He had thought differently; and, upon the maturest reflection, he had never seen cause to repent of the vote he had given upon them. But in his opposition to this bill, he was equally conscious that he was not impelled by a want of a proper sense of the merits of the objects of it. He was sure that, in common with the whole community, he felt the liveliest gratitude for the services they had rendered, and the privations and sufferings they had undergone in the cause of liberty. Far be it from him, then, to say aught to their disparagement.

Mr. C. said, his opposition to the bill was founded in the opinion entertained by him, that it was required by neither the justice or the gratitude of the nation. Its advocates had supported it upon the principle that it was equally demanded by both. His colleague, [Mr. BERRIEN,] in his very eloquent and impressive argument, had declared that he considered it an act of mere justice; and the whole tenor of his remarks, if I comprehended them rightly, seemed to be, that the provision made by the bill, was one to which the Officers of the Revolution were entitled as a matter of right, and in the fulfilment of the most solemn obligations arising out of the pledged faith of the old Congress. Others seem to place it upon a different foundation. They do not claim it so much as an act of justice, as of national gratitude. As he had just remarked, he believed that it was demanded by neither the one nor the other. He thought it improper and impolitic, notwithstanding the very imposing circumstances under which it was brought before the Senate. The measure was recommended by the President of the United States, in his message at the opening of the present Congress, and seems to receive the warm support of gentlemen of great weight of character and talents, and who are known to be the fast friends of the present Administration. Insofar as such a recommendation and support can make it so, it must be considered as an Administration measure. But it is also advocated by gentlemen of equal eloquence and talents, who are believed to be leading individuals in the Opposition to this Administration. So great has been the zeal and ability displayed by each party in support of this bill, that it will be difficult, hereafter, in case of its passage, to determine to which of them shall be awarded the merit of having procured it. Mr. C. said, he knew not to which party, the Administration or the Opposition, he might be said to belong. Entertaining the opinions that he did upon a great many subjects, he feared he would be claimed by neither the one nor the other. But upon that subject he was not at all uneasy. He must confess, however, that he felt the delicacy of his situation, on the present occasion, in having the temerity to venture into conflict with such an array of talents of all parties. He could hardly hope for success in a contest with either of them—much less could he expect to be victorious against the fearful odds of their united forces; yet, in defence of his honest convictions of duty, he would make an effort with such weapons as were ready to his hand.

What, then, he would inquire, is the measure under consideration? The bill proposes to distribute $1,100,000 among the surviving officers of the Revolution. What is the exact number of such survivors, whether one, three, or five hundred, is not known, and, consequently, it cannot be known what sum will be given to each.

And here, Mr. C. said, he would take occasion to remark, that some of the friends of the bill seemed to speak of this amount of $1,100,000 as a very small thing—as an inconsiderable sum, not requiring much consideration as to the manner in which it should be disposed of. To be sure, said Mr. C. to borrow an expression which he believed he had first seen in some farce—$1,100,000 is “neither here nor there.” That is, it was neither in his (Mr. C.’s) pocket, nor in the pockets of the advocates of the bill—so far it was a matter of no consequence. But he feared that, when the accounts of the year came to be settled up, such a disposable amount would not be found in the pockets of the Treasury, and more especially if the statements made by some of the members of the Committee on Finance, when the bill making appropriations for the Revolutionary Pensions was under consideration, be correct. He would infer from those statements, if he understood them correctly, that the Treasury was not overflowing with superabundant means. The committee who reported the bill under discussion appear to have been aware of this fact themselves; and, therefore, they have so framed it as not to distribute that amount in money, but to provide for the issuing certificates of stock to the amount of $1,100,000. This gets over the difficulty of the want of money, to be sure; but it does so, by increasing the public debt to that amount, in a stock redeemable at the will of the Government. He thought that such a provision would in the end prove to be an ingenious piece of machinery, contrived to divert that amount of the sinking fund from its legitimate object, to wit: the extinguishment of the existing debt.

Mr. C. said, he would now proceed to an examination of the justice, the strict justice, by which it is contended the Senate should be influenced to the passage of this bill in its present shape.* Gentlemen contend that the Government entered into a solemn contract with the Officers of the Continental Army of the Revolution, which has never been fulfilled. Let us examine this matter, and see how it really occurred.

On the 21st of October, 1780, the old Congress, acting upon the report of a committee to which had been referred a letter from Gen. Washington, among other resolutions having relation to the organization of the Army, adopted the following: “That the Officers who shall continue in service to the end of the war, shall also be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the time of their reduction.” It is believed that this is the contract which constitutes the foundation of the claim now made on behalf of the officers; and certainly, if no change had been made in it, the old confederated Government, and subsequently the Government as now organized, would have been bound to fulfil it, by allowing the stipulated half pay for life. But it would appear that the measure was by no means a very popular one. It met, as would presently be shown, with the most serious objections. It was said that great discontent existed as to the manner in which the officers were to be rewarded. There were strong prejudices expressed against the half pay system. That such a system seemed to belong peculiarly to monarchies, by which the monarch was enabled to attach the army to his own person. That it was somewhat in the nature of sinecures, &c.; and, said Mr. C. had I lived in those times, I should probably have entertained the same opinions—for they are certainly such as I now entertain.

These discontents and prejudices led to a reconsideration of the measure. And at whose instance? At that of the People, or the State Governments? By no means: but at the instance of the officers themselves. He had before him their memorial upon this and other subjects, a part of which he begged the leave of the Senate to read.

* The bill subsequently was entirely changed in its provisions before its passage. As it passed, it is strictly a pension act.

[SENATE.]

[See vol. 4, Journals of Old Congress, page 207.] "We are grieved," say they, "to find that our brethren, who retired from service on half pay, under the resolution of Congress of 1780, are not only destitute of any effectual provision, but are become objects of obloquy. Their condition has a very discouraging aspect on us, who must, sooner or later, retire, and from every consideration of justice, gratitude, and policy, demands attention and redress.

"We regard the act of Congress, respecting half pay, as an honorable and just recompense for several years' hard service, in which the health and fortunes of the officers have been worn down and exhausted. We see, with chagrin, the odious point of view in which the citizens of too many of the States endeavor to place the men entitled to it. We hope, for the honor of human nature, that there are none so hardened in the sin of ingratitude, as to deny the justice of the reward. We have reason to believe that the objection, generally, is against the mode only. To prevent, therefore, any alterations and distinctions which may tend to injure that harmony which we ardently desire may reign throughout the community, we are willing to commute the half pay pledged, for full pay for a certain number of years, or for a sum in gross, as may be agreed to by the committee sent with this address. And, in this way, we pray that the disabled officers and soldiers, with the widows and orphans of those who have expired, or may expend their lives in the service of their country, may be fully comprehended."

Mr. C. said he would not detain the Senate by reading further extracts from this document. He had read all that was necessary to shew that great objections and prejudices existed, and had been openly expressed, against the half pay system. That the officers themselves too plainly saw that it was about to bring upon them the hatred and obloquy of the community. To avoid this, and as they apprehended the "objection generally was against the mode only," they suggested that a commutation should be made of the half pay for life, for "full pay for a certain number of years," or "for a sum in gross."

It was upon this memorial of the officers, that Congress proceeded to discuss the subject, and, after rejecting many propositions, finally they adopted a resolution on the 22d March, 1783, [see 4 vol. Journals Old Congress, page 178, 9,] agreeing to make the commutation in the shape of a proposition to be submitted to the officers of the Army, by Lines and Corps, for their adoption or rejection. The proposition was to commute the "half pay for life," for "five years full pay," such "full pay for five years," was to be made "in money, or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum." These securities were to be such as should "be given to other creditors of the United States," and, finally, it was submitted to the "option of the Lines of the respective States," and not to "the officers individually, to accept or refuse the same." Subsequently, on the 31st October, 1783, it appears by the Journals that most of the lines of the several States, and many of the corps and individuals of the Army, not attached to any line, did accept the proposition for commutation, as thus tendered. It is true, there is no evidence that some of the Lines did accept. But it may be said, with equal truth, that there is likewise no evidence that any of them refused to accept. On the contrary, it seems now to be conceded that they all did receive the five years' full pay, and, therefore, it may with truth and propriety be said that they all accepted.

And here, Mr. C. said, it should be remarked, that the preamble to the resolution of 22d March, 1783, proposing the commutation, expressly recites that it is because the officers themselves "did solicit a commutation," that one was granted.

Thus far, Mr. C. contended, it would seem that the officers had no right to complain of any injustice. They had been promised half pay for life. They discovered that this made them odious in the eyes of the People. They solemnly and formally solicit Congress to commute it for full pay for a certain number of years. Congress granted their request, and submitted a proposition of commutation for their adoption or rejection. They agreed to accept in the manner proposed, and, subsequently, actually received the five years' full pay. In the whole transaction, as far as it has been examined, there appears nothing unjust, nothing unfair, nothing forced. So far from it, Congress only acted in accordance with their own solicitations. The commutation, then, was a fair contract, agreed to upon full and mature consideration, and in which the Congress constituted one party, and the officers the other party.

It has been said, however, that the contract for half pay for life was made by the Government with the individual officers, while the contract for "five years' full pay," in lieu thereof, was made with them collectively, and in a manner in which the voice of the individual officer could not be heard. This, Mr. C. said, did not, in his opinion, alter the case. It certainly gives no greater plausibility to the bill upon principles of strict justice. The manner in which the proposition for the commutation was offered, does not appear to have been objected to from any quarter. There is not only no evidence of the officers having remonstrated against it, but the advocates of the bill do not pretend that the officers objected to it at the time. There is not on record one petition, or memorial, or protest against it. Those surviving officers who are now at the Seat of Government, acting in behalf of themselves and their brethren, urging and watching the progress of this bill, have made no representations, and submitted no evidence, that they themselves, or any other portion of the officers, objected to the manner in which the proposition was submitted, or to the proposed commutation itself. The irresistible presumption, then, is, that all were content, all accepted, and were satisfied.

But, again, it had been urged, and with great force, by the Chairman of the Committee, [Mr. Woodbury,] that the commutation was inadequate, because it was not of equal value with the half pay for life; and, for the purpose of proving this, reference had been made to the annuity tables. Mr. C. acknowledged that he had but little skill in the calculation of the value of annuities; but he thought that he could demonstrate, that, at the time of the passage of the commutation act, there were persons engaged in it whose skill and capacity could not be doubted, and that the subject underwent a full and deliberate examination. It is known that Col. Hamilton, who so much distinguished himself, subsequently, as Secretary of the Treasury, was himself one of the officers of the Army; that he had resigned his commission and gone into Congress for the express purpose, as had been suggested to him, of advocating the claims of the officers. Of his ability to calculate the value of life annuities, no one could entertain a doubt. The Journals of Congress afford abundant evidence that he was an active member upon this subject. It appears that there was, in the report of the Committee who brought in the resolution, a blank as to the number of years of full pay to be granted. Col. Hamilton moved to fill it with "five and a half" years. This was negatived. Mr. Gorham then moved to fill it with "five" years, and this motion was agreed to, and the resolution passed in that shape. [See p. 167 of vol. 4, Journals of Old Congress.] Here, then, is abundant evidence that this very point of the adequacy of the proposed commutation was fully discussed and deliberately settled by those who well understood what they were about; and it seems that the only difference between them was about

"one half year's" full pay. Finally, Mr. C. said, on this point, he would say that it does not appear that the officers themselves, at the time, protested against the commutation because of its inadequacy in value. Even after they had, many of them, sold their certificates, at immense discounts, to the speculators, it does not appear that they complained that the Government had cheated them, or dealt unjustly towards them. But, had the commutation been deemed inadequate at the time, is it not probable that General Washington, their friend and father, either then or subsequently, when President under the new Government, would have remonstrated against it, or recommended additional compensation? Who can doubt his capacity to understand the subject, or his willingness to come forward and claim justice, if he believed any thing due them—in favor of his companions in arms, who had so often sustained him in the most trying times of the war? Yet, from the time of the adoption of the commutation act, to that of the termination of his administration as President, a period of fourteen years, it does not appear that he ever mentioned the subject.

The strong conclusion to be drawn from these circumstances, is, that General Washington, Col. Hamilton, and all others, then believed that the Government had done the officers ample justice; had given them all they had a right to claim, and, indeed, all that they had asked; that, in accepting the commutation, the contract with the Government was executed by both parties, and all the demands of justice fully satisfied; nor was it supposed that the subject could ever again be agitated.

But it is said that the commutation was not paid in money, but in certificates, which the necessities of the officers compelled them to sell at a greatly depreciated value. This was a point, Mr. C. said, which his colleague [Mr. BERRY,] the great advocate of the strict justice of the provisions of this bill, has not thought fit to press. But, as allusion had been made to it by others, he would make one or two remarks on it. He would not deny but that the commutation was paid in certificates, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, and not in money. The fact was, that the Government had no money wherewith to pay. But this was as well known to the officers themselves as to any others. Indeed, from the very words of the commutation act, it was announced that the Government had its option to pay in money or certificates—and knowing that there was no money in the Federal Treasury, the officers expected to be paid in certificates, and in nothing else. The Government had nothing else to give at the time. It gave the officers what it gave all its other creditors; and, by the terms of the act, they were to be placed on the precise footing of the other creditors. Yet they did not remonstrate or object, so far as could be learned from any evidence before the Senate. From the moment, then, that they accepted that which was agreed on and tendered, being all that they had a right to expect, and being that to which they did not object, the Government was legally and morally absolved from all obligation to them upon the score of justice, other than the redemption of these certificates, so soon as the means of its Treasury would permit. In the course of time, this was done; not, indeed, by the Government of the Confederation, but by that now existing under the present Constitution. So soon as it was organized, it made provision for funding these certificates, with all others issued upon the faith and credit of the former Government, and provided ample funds for their redemption. Those who held their certificates, then, received their full par value. Such of the officers as had retained theirs, then received, in money, the amount which had been promised them. It may be, as had been said, that the necessities of many of them compelled them to sell, before this period, at a greatly depreciated value. This was, indeed, unfortunate for them. But no Government can provide against the necessities of its citizens, whether such necessities were the result of misfortune or imprudence. The Government paid as soon as it could.

But if the Government is bound to make good to these officers the loss incurred by the depreciation of their certificates, the same principles of justice would create a similar obligation to make good the loss incurred by all other creditors of the old Confederate Government, for the depreciation of their certificates. It would extend to the families of all the deceased officers and soldiers. It would extend to all certificates for whatever purpose issued. It would extend, with equal strength, to those who were paid in depreciated currency, during the late war. It was known to him, Mr. C. said, that the Georgia militia, in that war, were paid in a paper currency which, in Boston, could not have been sold for half its nominal value. It is also known that many persons were paid in Treasury notes, which, likewise, greatly depreciated in value. Surely, if a part of the creditors of the Revolutionary war was to be indemnified for their loss by depreciation, all the creditors of that war were entitled to a like indemnification. To indemnify these would require an immense sum. If to these be added the creditors of the late war, who incurred losses in the same manner, the whole revenues of the Government, applied to that sole object, for years to come, would be insufficient to satisfy the claims. Mr. C. asked gentlemen what they would say to a claim of this kind, made by those who lost by the depreciation of the currency in the late war? Doubtless they would reject it—and yet, in Mr. C's opinion, these had as fair a claim upon the Government, upon a principle, as the favored objects of this bill. It is true, no such claim has yet been made by the officers or soldiers of the late war; but, should this bill pass, at some future period he should not be surprised if one should be brought forward.

In every aspect, then, in which he, Mr. C. had been able to view the subject, he could see no ground upon which a claim to the provisions of this bill could be urged, in behalf of the surviving officers of the Revolution, upon the principle that there is any debt due them, or that strict and ample justice has not been done them. If the bill passes at all, its passage must be founded upon a different principle, and that is, that it is demanded by the gratitude which we owe them, for the services they have rendered. This, said Mr. C. places it upon the ground of a mere gratuity of $1,100,000 to be made to some two or three hundred individuals.

And here, Mr. C. said, he would venture to express an opinion, which might appear to be novel to many. It was, that he did not believe there was any power in Congress, derived from the Constitution, to bestow the public money in gratuities. It is true, that the Federal Government possesses an unlimited power of taxation; but it does not follow that it possesses a like unlimited power of appropriation. On the contrary, he thought that the objects to which the revenue, raised by this unlimited power to tax, could be appropriated, were all defined and limited by the other grants of power in the Constitution. Among these other grants he did not find one, either expressed or implied, to make gratuities of the public treasure. Upon this ground, alone, then, he could not give his support to this bill. He believed that such a mode of appropriating the money, raised by taxing the labor of the people, was of the most pernicious tendency, and at war with all the sound principles upon which a republican form of Government should be administered.

But, said Mr. C. if gratuities are to be bestowed, they should be granted upon principles of equal and impartial justice. Our grateful feelings, he thought, ought not to be expressed to the surviving Officers of the Revolutionary Continental Army alone. There were others equally entitled to our gratitude and our bounty. In adverting to these, as he should now do, he hoped he should not be considered as making unjust comparisons, or drawing invidious distinctions—such was not his intention. Against the surviving Officers of the Revolution, and the particular objects of this bill, he was sure he felt no unkind prejudices. On the contrary, he entertained the profoundest respect for their characters, and a grateful sense for their services. He would not utter a word that could tarnish the lustre of their deeds, achieved in the glorious war of the Revolution. He would not breathe a thought, which, in its effects, might blight the laurels they have won, and which yet bloom in the undiminished vigor of youthful growth upon their wrinkled brows. But, yet, he must be permitted to say, that there were others equally meritorious with them, and for whom, or their families, every principle of justice or gratitude, by which the Senate may be actuated to pass this bill, should equally impel it to make provision.

The first class of these to which he would call the attention of the Senate, was the Soldiers of the Continental Army.* To use the language of their zealous and eloquent advocate, the Senator from Maine, [MR. PARRE], they fought by the side of the officer: their hardships, their privations, and their sufferings, were far greater; their reward and their expectations far less than those of the officers. It has been said that, at least, they were clothed at the expense of the Government. If there is truth in History, this was not the fact; they were promised clothing, yet they seldom received enough to cover their nakedness. This bill, in its present shape, makes no provision for these. Yet, he thought their claims upon the gratitude of this Nation not less strong than those of their officers. Why, then, not make them also participants of this gratuity? But they had, in the gentleman from Maine, [MR. PARRE] a more efficient advocate than himself, and to him he would leave the support of their cause.

Another class of persons, to whom he would next advert, were such Officers as resigned their commissions before the conclusion of the peace, and, therefore, may be said not to have "served to the end of the war." The venerable Senator from Maryland, [MR. S. SMITH] who warmly advocates this bill, informs the Senate that he was one of them, and that he makes no claim to the provisions of this bill. Yet he [MR. C.] could not see why they were not equally entitled to our gratitude and bounty. Many of them performed the most glorious services, and encountered the greatest perils of the war. Many never resigned until hostilities had ceased, and the enemy had been expelled, though peace was not actually concluded. Who were more meritorious than these? But their brother in arms, the Hero of Mud Island, [General SMITH, of Maryland,] renounces their cause, and refuses to be their advocate! It was, then, not to be expected that he [MR. C.] should urge their claims, or defend their rights.

There was a third class of persons, for many of whom our warmest sympathies should be excited. These were the families of those deceased Officers, who, like the present applicants for the provisions of this bill, had served to the end of the war, and received the commutation. Whether the passage of this bill is to be referred to a sense of justice or gratitude, its provisions should extend to this class also. Are the Senate about to make this provision for the surviving Officers, because it is believed that there is a debt due them, and that it is but just now to give them that to which they were long ago entitled? The same debt was due to the deceased Officers, and was withheld from them in like manner. Are we about to express our deep sense of gratitude to those who contributed so much to achieve the liberties of our country, by making a gratuity of one million one hundred thousand dollars to a certain number of them? Those who are deceased were not less ardent or conspicuous in the glorious struggle, and many of them probably more so. It is urged that many of the survivors are poor and needy, and tottering upon the verge of the grave, without the means of comfortable subsistence. So, also, many who are gone, died in poverty, and bequeathed to their families naught but suffering and want. He [MR. C.] had been personally acquainted with five of those Officers, who had died in Georgia, within the last five or six years. Of these, two, Major Worsham and Captain Stevens, he knew to have died poor, and left their families in a dependent condition. They were both pensioners when they died. The latter had been supported for years by the industry, and cherished by the affectionate care of a son and son-in-law. Some years before his death, he made application to be placed on the Revolutionary Pension List. He was refused, because he was yet master of a piece of poor land, and a house, wherein he could shelter himself. He finally determined to visit Washington, and exhibit himself personally to the President. His visit was at a fortunate period. Lafayette had just landed upon our shores, and every heart beat with gratitude. In Captain Stevens he recognized a companion in arms. At such a period he presented his palsied frame at the War Department, and, as Mr. C. had been informed, was on the next day placed on the pension list. He lived but little more than a year thereafter. And is nothing to be done for the families of such men as these? Upon what principle of justice or gratitude shall provision be made for those surviving Officers whose necessities have never driven them to beg a pension, and all provision be withheld from the families of those who have died in want? Justice and gratitude revolt at the idea.

Another of these Officers had died in comfortable circumstances, though not rich. He was formerly a member of the other branch of Congress. He meant Gen. David Meriwether. From his knowledge of the man, he was impressed with the belief that, were he now a member of Congress, he would never give his assent to this bill, or any other, founded on similar principles.

The fourth and last class of persons, said Mr. C., of whom he would speak, was the Militia, already alluded to by the gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. SMITH.] He repeated that he did not intend to make any uncharitable comparisons. Yet he thought the merit and services of these equal to those of the applicants for this bill, or, indeed, any other class of persons engaged in the Revolution. If gentlemen would revert to the history of that war, they would find that, in the Southern States, and especially in Georgia, upon them was placed the burthen of the contest—they were the bulwark of our defence. The aid derived from the regulars was comparatively trifling. The British forces were not the only ones with which they had to contend. The Southern States were filled with Tories; and, in these, they encountered enemies a thousand times more rancorous than the British. During periods of disaster, to which a militia, contending with a regular force, are always more or less subject, they were hunted, by these, from the fields to the recesses of the forest, and again driven from thence to the caves of the mountains. From these fastnesses they would watch their opportunities, and, as these were presented, they would emerge from their hiding places, and, turning upon their enemies, make them feel the full weight of their vengeance.

* The provisions of the bill were altered, subsequently, so as to extend to them.

[JAN. 31, 1828.]

Mr. C. said that he had at that moment upon his table a petition from a man who had served in the militia during the whole war.* No man had encountered more perils, or passed, with life, through more dangers. He had been hunted from place to place like a wild beast, by enemies determined upon his destruction, by whom he was frequently shot, and who finally inflicted upon him what they believed to be a mortal wound. But he survived it, and yet lives. He states himself now to be in very reduced circumstances, and prays a pension, or some other provision. He has never received a dollar for all his services, his perils, or his wounds. I have not yet presented his petition, because I know that, under the provisions of the existing laws, he can obtain no relief. But, when we are about to bestow gratuities for services rendered in that memorable contest, who is better entitled to a share of them than such a man †

It had been stated, the other day, on another occasion, that General Sumpter, whose name is identified with the war of the Revolution in the South, was reduced to beggary, and had been dragged to the threshold of a jail. Of the value of his services there was no doubt. It would seem that his indigence was greater than most of the objects of the bill under consideration. Why is it that no provision is to be made for him?

It had been inquired, by some of the friends of the bill, whether, if it should be so altered as to extend its provisions to all those of whom he had spoken, would gentlemen, now opposed to it, give it their support? Answering for himself alone, Mr. C. said he would not. His reasons he had already endeavored to explain. He thought there was nothing due to them, which they had a right to demand, upon principles either of justice or gratitude. The old Congress had done all that it had promised, in such manner as the circumstances of the times permitted. It had done all that the officers expected, or had a right to expect. He believed that the system of pensions had already been carried to too great an extent in this country. He believed that the gratuitous appropriation of the public treasure was unauthorized by the Constitution, and pernicious in its political tendency. Yet, if the public money was to be thus appropriated, he thought that it should be applied in a just and impartial manner. Let all who were equally meritorious be equally rewarded.

Mr. C. said he was unwilling, at such a late hour, to impose longer on the patience of the Senate. He felt himself constrained, he repeated, to vote against the bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN then intimated that he designed to address the Senate, to-morrow, in favor of the claim.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1828.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a statement of facts, of great length, from Duff Green, in explanation of the provocation which produced the outrage complained of in the memorial of E. V. Sparhawk, the substance of which was, that a letter having appeared in the New York American, accusing Mr. Randolph of a concert with the editor of the Telegraph in misreporting the speech of Mr. R. in which he spoke of hanging any one who would introduce the "Irish" or "slaves" (on which the debate arose) into Virginia; that he (Duff Green) having received, from John S. Mehan, information that Mr. Sparhawk had acknowledged the authorship of the correspondence in the American—to use the language of the document, "Felt as every honorable man, he trusts, would feel in his situation, as the editor of a public journal of extensive circulation, the usefulness of which must mainly depend upon the character of the editor for veracity, which he has ever been anxious to maintain"—and that, accordingly, he (Duff Green) met Mr. Sparhawk, and inquired of him if he was the writer of the letter; and, not receiving a satisfactory answer, he (Duff Green) proceeded to assault Mr. Sparhawk, having no intention to offer personal injury to him, his sole object being, not to hurt, but to disgrace him. "Nothing was further from his (Duff Green's) intention, than to infringe, in any degree, on the dignity of the Senate," it being impossible that he could feel any other sentiment towards that body, than the most profound respect. He remarks that, "if Mr. Sparhawk be under the protection of your honorable body, in consequence of a permission to have a seat in the Chamber, as a reporter of the Debates, the duty which has been assigned by you to the undersigned, places him equally under your protection; and if it be an injury to Mr. Sparhawk to be disgraced, as he was, it is no less an injury (although accompanied by no disgrace) to be represented as a profligate instrument of falsifying the reports of the proceedings of the co-ordinate branch of Congress." The document concluded by an apology for its uncommon length, and the expression of regret for consuming the time of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. COBB, the letter of Mr. Green was ordered to lie on the table.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The bill for the relief of certain surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army, being the unfinished business of yesterday, was then taken up. On the question of filling the blank with $ 1,200,000 :

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, in prefacing a speech of considerable length, observed, that Mr. VAN BUREN, who had moved the adjournment on yesterday, had yielded the floor to him, being desirous, before addressing the Senate, of hearing all the objections that were to be made to the bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN followed Mr. S. at great length, in favor of the claims.

[The Editors have been unable to obtain accurate reports of either of the above speeches.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1828.

The unfinished business of yesterday—A bill to provide for the relief of certain surviving Officers of the Revolutionary Army—was taken up.

Mr. BRANCH, who moved the adjournment of yesterday, addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

Mr. MACON rose, and, after some general remarks, pronounced a high encomium on the military services of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH.] As to the claims of these officers, we all know the straits to which the Government was put to get along, at that time; and that the Old Congress was so hard run that they tried to get lands to pay their debts with. And, before the Constitution was adopted, the State of Virginia surrendered her lands to the United States; whether wisely or not, I don't pretend to say. The Government wanted these lands to raise funds to pay off their obligations. The States could not help them. A great portion of the country had been so destroyed that it was as much as the People could do to live. Almost every man had been burnt out at the end of the war; and that family which had a cow left, was considered fortunate. Well, sir, you now call on these People, or their descendants, to help these officers whose families were better off during the time of danger.

Sir, had I a talent for description, I would display to you a picture of those times, which would shake the stoutest heart. I would show you the wretched women, (whose husbands were defending the country in the militia ranks,) with their hungry, barefoot, almost naked children hanging round them, contemplating the burning ruins of their homes—without a shelter, and without a morsel to supply the wants of their weeping babes. These things have passed away; and thousands of instances like this are not now remembered. The Old Congress had the most difficult task to settle the accounts of the States. His own State paid millions, besides the vast amount of private losses. The People entered into the contest with the utmost spirit, and followed the enemy with as much avidity as ever Col. Boone followed an Indian in his life. There was a continual skirmishing kept up; and, on the British side, when the Americans were taken or surprised, it was whipping, hanging, and burning. When the paper money run out, what was to be done? It could well be recollected what was the state of the country after the battle of Guilford. The paper money had run out, and there was no specie. Congress then took up a new plan, and the Continental bills run down to one eighth of their nominal value, which the gentleman from Maryland very well knows. In my State there was but little Continental money. The State struck some paper of its own, which sold at 10 per cent., and, when the confiscated property was sold, the notes were redeemed. This was not done by any other State; and many of the States paid the interest on the Continental certificates. The last cow and the last horse went to keep up the contest; and perhaps nothing was less thought of than individual interest. There were no better troops in the war than the Lines of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Delaware; but it was no safer for the inhabitants to be with them, than with the enemy. The regular troops were, he knew, very much distressed; but were they more so than the militia? They were all paid alike with the Continental certificates. Every body was compelled to make sacrifices; and it was worse for the People to get along than settling a new country. The contributions had been so closely levied, and the ravages so great, that, where the two armies had been, there was no provisions, and few houses. The Continental money was the only currency in the country.

Gen. Hamilton was a man who undertook few things that he did not understand; and he took great pains to get this commutation done for the officers. It could hardly be supposed that he would do what would be injurious to his fellow officers. The gentlemen of the Committee had mentioned the climates of Carlisle and Montpelier as standards. They are both healthy places. But do they suppose that they will apply to this country? Col. Hamilton was sufficiently acquainted with the matter, and knew the rates of annuities, and he fixed upon five years. The commutation was, no doubt, a matter of gratification to the officers at the time. But it was maintained by the gentleman over the way, and by the gentleman from New York, that every individual among the officers did not assent to it. But it was decided by the majority of the Lines, and that was sufficient. The same principle applied on the adoption of the Constitution. That was done by the vote nine States. It was then argued that it must be done by the vote of the whole; but the majority ruled. And so it ought to in this case. It is said that the elder officers made a good bargain, while the younger ones suffered. But, is it to be supposed that the senior officers would make a good bargain for themselves and a bad one for their juniors? Nothing has the effect to produce mutual attachment more than mutual suffering; and these men had suffered together. Would General Wayne or General Smallwood, who began the Revolution, and went through it, have done so? I do not believe it. I say, sir, that, with regard to this bill, no man has any claim upon the Government for more than he received: neither these officers nor the militia. But, should I admit their claim, and allow that it was, as the gentleman tells us, founded on equity, will it be urged that a man's claims of this kind don't descend to his heirs? Does the gentleman from New York think so? But every thing was now different. Every thing was turned upside down. It was once supposed that when a man died he paid his last debt, and settled his accounts with the world. But it is not so now.

The history of the Revolution, as to the partizan warfare in the Southern country, had never given any idea of the truth. The memory of Sumpter and Marion was held in high esteem; but half that they did was never told, except by some old people to the children of the present day. But history don't stoop to the militia. The battle of the Cowpens is almost the only action that figures in the history of the war in the South. But I have a gentleman in my eye who did as gallant a thing in the militia as was ever done by regular troops. Nobody had a greater respect for the regulars and militia who fought at the Cowpens: but there was another action performed by—[The name of the officer escaped the Reporter, (he thinks it was Col. Tazewell,) as also the location of this battle. Mr. M., at this point of his remarks, directed his speech to another part of the Chamber, and was, consequently, not heard.]—That, he considered the most important event of the war. There were among the humbler officers many striking examples of bravery and patriotism. There were many others who sacrificed vast fortunes in supporting the cause of the Revolution. In the State of New York there were some striking instances of the kind. Governor Clinton was more honored by his actions than by the Vice Presidency; and his stubborn whiggery gave him the strongest hold on the affections of the People.

It was impossible to go into the Revolutionary war and make selections of individuals, or do justice to any one set of men. It was utterly impossible. He recollected when Mr. Monroe's bill was introduced in the other House, only four hundred thousand dollars was asked for. The sum has gone on increasing—and it only shows that this thing is like putting your hand to the plough—you never can get off again. You take one step, and you must go on. It is an unpleasant thing to oppose any measure which the Senate thinks founded in justice—but it was his honest opinion that this bill ought not to pass. He should be sorry to hurt the feelings of any one. The bill would have suited him better, had it pointed out how much each grade of officers was to receive. He should then have liked it better, although, even in that form, he should not have voted for it. The sum now put in was in the lump; and he did not know how it was to be divided. As to the sufferings of these officers, other classes of people had suffered equally. He knew instances where individuals had had their houses burnt over twice.

The gentleman from New York said, the other day, a great deal about the glory and honor of the country. But I like some other things much better. For, Sir, when I hear of glory and honor, I always think of war and bloodshed. The happiness of the People seems to me much better, and I should be more pleased to see the duty on salt taken off, than increased by a war, in which the country was to gain honor and glory. But the gentleman from New York don't want to see it lessened.

[Mr. M. here made an allusion to John Hancock and Samuel Adams, which was not heard by the Reporter.]

We are told, by the gentlemen over the way, [Messrs. WOODBURY, BERRIER, and HARRISON,] that it is a debt, which this bill is to pay. But I should like to know how, under that argument, they can bring forward their claim, with a receipt in full staring it in the face. And I ask whether this bill is any more a fulfilment of the contract than the commutation act? Do you propose to pay the full amount of the half-pay? No, you give them the old certificates, with interest. Fashions are continually changing. The time is within my memory when we were a free, content, and happy People. We go now for glory and honor, as the gentleman from New York observes. We are told continually that this is a great and growing People. I think we are growing rather too fast. The poverty of the People is never taken into consideration. We count the numbers only. I ask, if this was a claim, why it did not go to the Committee on Claims? What need was there for a Select Committee? It was, I suppose, to give force to the application. The real reason why the commutation act was passed was that pensions were thought disgraceful. This induced the Officers to consent to commute their half-pay. He thought the principle of this bill no better than that proposed in the time of Mr Monroe.

[Mr. BERRIEN here handed Mr. MACON a paper—on which Mr. M. made an acknowledgement of being in error—but in what respect, the Reporter could not hear.]

The gentleman from New York has said that it is a reproach upon the country that this debt has not been paid before. I should like to know who caused this reproach. If we had the wealth of all the world, we could not get rid of it. Do all you can, you cannot satisfy all the claims. You may live to be as old as Methuselah, and you could not do it. Some gentlemen think it could be done with a few millions. But we have enough to do to take care of ourselves. The gentleman also said that the commutation was inadequate—and, in the same breath, he praised the old Congress, who framed it, in the highest manner.

Mr. VAN BUREN explained. He had not attributed the deficiency of the commutation to any unjust or unfair intention towards the Officers. But he had said that seven years' full pay was their just equivalent, and that, the present applicants having lived so long, the operation of the act upon them was unjust.

Mr. MACON resumed. I'll say no more on that point. We've been told about Shylock doings, &c. What the remark applies to, I don't know. I believe I have said enough to show that it can't apply to the old Congress. I don't know but it may refer to those who vote against this bill. It must apply to somebody. Really, he did not see how this country could have been more lavish in expenditures. But every means must be taken to increase them. We must fund the public debt, and divide five millions among the States. Next to the army which achieved our independence, those men will deserve the thanks of the nation, who shall wipe the public debt from the records of the country. It had been said that one-third was lost by the funding system. I never heard that fact: for, as soon as the funding system began, there were riders from Philadelphia, and New York, and the Eastward, scattered all over the country, as thick as ever tin pedlars were, gathering up the paper—which gave a spring to the business, rather than otherwise. There were no post roads then, but people could travel, when their interests were concerned, without them. Will any gentleman lay his hand on his heart and say that he thinks there was any unfairness in the funding system? If gentlemen will examine the funding system, they will find that there was a plan to make speculators disgorge their ill-gotten wealth.

I look upon the object of this bill to be to take so much money out of the pockets of the descendants of the soldiers, to pay to these individuals. We are more disposed to help people whom we know, than whom we don't know. We feel more for our neighbors than for indifferent persons. We associate with the officers, and we sympathize with them. But we know nothing of the soldiers. As to the statement that the Maryland Line did not agree to the commutation, he believed they accepted it, and that was agreement enough. He had heard much of suffering women. If their husbands did not provide for them, he knew that they had a hard struggle. Women have no political rights, and are necessarily passive sufferers. There were no petitions from women, and no Committee appointed on their claims. They sat at home and exercised the virtues of patience and industry.

I am not for glory and honor. I go on a different principle. I do right if I can; and, if I do wrong, my people will tell me of it. I wish that equal justice should be done—not give one a silver spoon, and the other a horn one. It was curious to look at the two Houses—one debating on economy, and the other opening roads and canals in every direction.

Mr. M. here reverted to some circumstances which occurred several years since, relative to certain applicants for pensions, and observed that he had then as much zeal in favor of the Soldiers of the Revolution, as lack of it now.

Mr. BELL said that he agreed with the gentlemen of the Committee that these applicants had a just claim—but he differed with them upon the amount. He believed it was the same as that of the Revolutionary Soldiers. They endured the same privations together, and ought to be provided for by the same bill. His object was to strike out the whole bill, and to propose another, as an amendment, which should remunerate the Officers and Soldiers for their losses by the depreciation of the Continental money.

Mr. B. then handed in his amendment—but,

The CHAIR said he was under the impression that the motion was not in order, as the question before the Senate now was that of filling the blank.

Mr. BELL moved that his substitute be printed.

The CHAIR said it was not in order, unless the Senate consented.

Mr. WOODBURY said that there was no objection to the printing—and he would now observe that the Committee were ready to consider any modification at the proper time.

The printing was then ordered.

Mr. TYLER, in reply to the several gentlemen who had supported the bill, then said, that he owed an apology to the Senate for taking part in the discussion of the question now under consideration, after the somewhat protracted debate which had arisen on it. Did he listen to the admonitions arising from his state of health, as well as the conviction under which he labored, that he could impart no new interest to the subject, he should certainly remain silent. But there were considerations operating upon him which he could not disregard. The solicitations of some of the members of this body, united with the strong desire which he had to remove from him every shade of imputation which might rest either on his justice or gratitude, led him to obtrude himself upon the notice of the Senate. He trusted that he was incapable of either injustice or ingratitude. He felt, also, that this country could not be accused either of the one or the other, and his remarks would be intended to relieve himself and the country from the imputation of either.

The chairman of the committee who reported the bill now under discussion, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] who so eloquently advocated its passage, placed it exclusively on the footing of a legal claim. We were told by those gentlemen, that the Government rested under an actual, existing, and binding obligation to pass it. That it was a debt due and unpaid. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN BUREN] who addressed the Senate yesterday, while he seemed disposed to concede the legal obligation, sought to enforce its enactment upon principles of liberality and equity. The horizon of this debate has become, therefore, greatly enlarged, and the question to be settled is one of no ordinary interest. I propose to examine both propositions in their turn.

Does there rest, then, a legal obligation on the Government to pass this bill? In other words, does it stand indebted to the memorialists, in virtue of contracts entered into during the Revolutionary war? If so, Mr. President, it is our solemn duty at once to cancel the debt: but, if it be so, then, sir, I should be led to blush for my country. Deep is the stain which rests upon its honor. For nearly half a century it has been guilty of the gross injustice of withholding from the hardy veteran of the Revolution, the earnings of his toil and blood. At the close of that glorious war, upwards of two thousand of the comrades of the present memorialists survived. All have descended to the grave, save the small remnant of two hundred and thirty. The same promises were made to all alike; and if those promises have not been fulfilled to the survivors, they were also violated to those who are no more. Many have died in penury and want, and have left to their descendants nothing but their honor as an inheritance. If, then, sir, this Government has withheld from them that to which they were entitled, the Revolution accuses it of injustice; all that is associated with the past or the present, loudly proclaims its injustice to the world. We have committed an irremediable sin. Tears of penitence may be shed, but they are shed in vain; they cannot awake the dead. Justice may be done to those who now show us their many scars, received in the days of their youth, in support of the holiest of causes, but that justice can only reach the living. The honor of our country is thus implicated in this claim of legal right, which is now asserted, after the lapse of forty-four years, and it behooves us to look narrowly into the subject ere we form our opinions.

Upon what, then, does this legal claim rest? The plain state of its origin is this: In consequence of the worthless currency in which our armies were paid, the officers and soldiers had suffered so much for the means of procuring even the smallest comforts, that dissatisfaction with the service had increased to such an extent as to require imperatively at the hands of Congress the adoption of some expedient calculated to retain a sufficiency of officers in the Army. Resignations had become numerous and alarming. General Washington addressed himself to Congress, and urged upon them the propriety of enacting a law which should promise half pay for life to such officers as should remain in the service until the end of the war. Congress adopted the expedient, and accordingly, in 1780, passed the act containing the provision and stipulation which had been recommended to their adoption. By that act, all officers who served to the end of the war became justly entitled to half pay for life. Has the Government acquitted itself of the obligation which it had thus voluntarily assumed? If not, sir, then has it been guilty of a violation of its plighted faith, and the claim now set up is well-founded.

I contend, sir, that the act of 1783 totally changed the character of the provision which had been made for the officers by the act of 1780, or, in other words, entirely abrogated its provisions. The act of '83 commuted the half pay for life into five years' full pay, and the only question which remains, would seem to be, whether the officers had accepted the act of 1783 in discharge of the act of 1780. If so, the old bond, to speak with greater precision, created by the act of '80, is discharged, and the new bond, created by that of '83, is accepted in its stead. Of that acceptance there is no question. In the absence of all positive proof upon the subject, the presumption which arises from the lapse of time, would, of itself, be sufficient. No man can believe that a claim so interesting to a large majority of those entitled, would have been permitted to slumber for nearly half a century. But this question is rendered no longer debatable, by the confession made by the memorialists themselves. They admit the acceptance, by them, of the commutation, and seek to place their claim upon another footing. Complaints are now urged against the act of '83, and the measure which it dealt out, is pronounced unequal and unjust. I have a ready answer to make to these complaints. The act of '83 was passed at the earnest entreaty of the officers themselves. They memorialized

Congress, and urged strong and satisfactory reasons for its interposition. Congress listened to their entreaties, and the commutation act was accordingly passed. The motives which influenced the officers to solicit the commutation, were of two sorts—those of patriotism, and self interest. The Revolution had overturned the privileged orders, and whatsoever looked even remotely to the creation of a privileged class, was extremely obnoxious to the People. The act of '80 was considered—I will not stop to inquire with what justice—as producing this effect. The officers, wisely and properly, concluded to get rid of the odious idea of being pensioners on the Government, and therefore asked the passage of that law. They resolved to lose, as speedily as possible, the officer in the citizen, bearing about them no other badge of distinction than that furnished by honorable scars. I do them no injustice when I also ascribe to them the influence of self-interest; that is acknowledged to be the main-spring to human actions, and operating, to a greater or less extent, over all men. Their fortunes had, no doubt, suffered severely during the war, and it became, therefore, a matter of high moment to them, individually, that they should be able to control as large a sum as circumstances would permit. This was effected by the commutation of their half-pay into full pay for five years. They thereby were placed in possession of Government securities to a large amount, which, if their situation justified it, they might retain until brighter days beamed on the finances of the country, or, if compelled to sell, would place in their possession larger resources. It was objected, by the Senator from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN] that they did not receive cash. This is admitted—but they received Government certificates, the Government having stipulated, by the act, to pay either in money or securities. Nothing justifies the belief that the officers, when they asked the commutation, expected to receive payment in cash. They knew the wants of Government most thoroughly—a dollar in specie was scarcely any where to be found—two hundred millions of dollars of paper money had been thrown into circulation, which had depreciated to a rate so low as to be worthless. The only means that the country had to meet its engagements with the officers, or its other creditors, was by issuing certificates. With a full knowledge of these facts, the commutation was asked, and was granted; and now, Sir, after so many years have elapsed, we hear complaints uttered against it. Nor does there exist, Mr. President, the slightest circumstance to induce the belief that the officers received an unjust measure by the terms of the commutation; but, on the contrary, every thing opposes that idea. I have said that they themselves asked Congress to commute; that they acquiesced in that commutation up to a very recent period—that all but a mere remnant had descended to their graves, and that no complaint had, until lately, been uttered against the Government. These facts could not fail to be satisfactory—but there exist other facts, equally conclusive, upon this head.

The time which was selected for the application was, of all others, the best for their interests. The battle had been lost and won. The banner of America floated in triumph. After having annihilated the power of Great Britain in this hemisphere, nothing remained to be accomplished, but to obtain a recognition of our rights as a free, sovereign, and independent Nation—and this recognition soon thereafter followed. Like the Israelites of old, our fathers had passed through the wilderness of doubt and danger, and had already entered upon the possession of the promised land. Every breast was filled, and every eye beamed with gratitude towards those gallant men, who had fought the good fight. This was the era of their application to Congress, and one more fortunate in itself could not possibly be imagined. But the time of their application was not more propitious than was the tribunal to which they applied peculiarly favorable. That tribunal was composed, in part, of their brothers in arms, and, for the residue, of those ardent patriots who achieved victories in the cabinet, as great as had been won in the field. Such was the tribunal to which the appeal was made—and I, for one, will not, for a moment, believe that it was capable of practising injustice towards those who, in their very presence, had poured out their blood and devoted their lives in defence of their country's rights. No, Sir, I will not agree, by any vote which I shall give, to stamp upon their memories this seal of dishonor. Their fair fame constitutes no small portion of the wealth of this Union, and I will not consent to throw a stain upon it. I might repeat what has been said by others, that the Chairman of the Committee who reported and advocated the commutation law was General Hamilton, a distinguished officer and civilian. That Gen. Washington, when President, never called this decision in question, as he would most assuredly have done, had he esteemed it unjust; nor was it ever adverted to by any of his successors. Who, then, is now at liberty to infer that the commutation was based on improper principles, or that a hard measure was dealt out to the officers? Shall we, at the distance of forty-four years, undertake to reverse this decision of our predecessors, and to brand their memories with the charge of injustice? They stood in the midst of the era for which they were legislating, and were surrounded by those for whom they legislated. They weighed all the circumstances applicable to the case, and were qualified to decide correctly. We, on the contrary, are but the men of yesterday, and have but a dim and indistinct view of the condition of those times. We are not, then, Sir, qualified to legislate understandingly upon this subject; and, for one, I shall leave untouched the decision which was pronounced in 1783.

But, Mr. President, if the Senate felt at liberty to go into this matter, at this day, and to inquire into the correctness of the basis on which the commutation was placed, the bill upon your table would find in that inquiry no claim to our support. The officers had a life annuity, and sold out for a ten years' purchase, paid in advance; the five years' full pay being rather more than equal, including interest, to ten years' half pay. Would any discreet man be willing to purchase an annuity, even from the most youthful and healthy annuitant, at a greater purchase? Considering "the various ills that flesh is heir to"—the numberless enemies to human life—I ask if a period of ten years is not a liberal term to allot for its continuance? The common law has been said to be the essence of pure and correct reasoning, and the period which it has prescribed as the ultimate thule of life is seven years. If one be gone beyond seas, and shall be unheard of for seven years, that law numbers him with the dead—dis-solves the tenderest of ties—pronounces his wife a widow, and delivers over his effects to his legal distributors.

It has been urged, however, sir, by the advocates of this bill, that the Government has gained by this proceeding a large sum of money, by reason of the elongation of the lives of the present applicants. The memorialists may have lost; but it does not, therefore, follow, that the Government has gained. Recollect, sir, that this commutation law embraced about two thousand four hundred and eighty persons, of whom but two hundred and thirty have lived to this day. Now, in order to have a correct account of profit and loss stated, we should ascertain the various periods at which each of the decedents have departed this life. For all who died within the first ten years the Government necessarily sustained a loss equal to the unexpired term of the ten years. Upon all such losses, interest should be calculated up to this day, as has been done in the case of the memorialists, and the balance might then be fairly struck. Do I hazard any thing in the conjecture that the Government has lost by the operation?

We have no correct data on which to proceed in making up such account; but I do not think it unfair to conclude, that the want of those very data constitutes an objection to this claim. If the gain of the Government be rested on in support of the claim, the Senate has a right to require it to be shown, and the burden of proof devolves properly on the memorialists.

It has been intimated, that the Government also gained in the process of funding. It is true, that, although the certificates were funded in the year 1791, at their nominal amount, yet that the interest on a part of the amount was deferred for a few years. But can any man doubt but that the funding system was most eagerly desired by the holders of the certificates? We know the fact to have been so. That measure met with decided opposition from many parts of the Union; but it nevertheless prevailed, much to the gratification of the certificate holders. It was a day of jubilee to them, and made the fortunes of many. If the officers had parted with their certificates, it was their misfortune, but not the blame of the Government.

Thus, then, Mr. President, this commutation was made at the request of the officers themselves; was accepted by them; was based upon fair principles; and the certificates, issued in pursuance thereof, were funded at the request of the holders. Forty-four years have passed by, and no murmur of discontent has been expressed. No debt, then, is due from the Government, and it stands acquitted from the charge of injustice.

An appeal has been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN BUREN] to our liberality; our equity. I listened to the gentleman with great pleasure; and if I had dared to have given audience to my feelings, turning a deaf ear to the suggestions of duty and sound policy, I might have been led captive. Before we yield the reins to our feelings, it behoves us to inquire whither, and how far, they will carry us. The gentleman seemed to admit the claims of the dead to be equally strong with those of the living. Sir, the rights of the representatives of the deceased officers must, of necessity, be as strong as those of the survivors. The acts of 1780 and '83 embraced all alike; and if, as has been contended, the full pay should have been allowed for seven instead of five years, it is equally due to all who were embraced under its provisions. Then, sir, if 1,200,000 dollars be due to the survivors, 230; if the representatives of the deceased, of the 2,480 be included, the Government must necessarily make provision for the payment of $11,860,869, that being, upon the hypothesis assumed, the sum that would now be actually due. This is the first fruit of a liberal policy. A result from which there is no escaping. Let us not be deceived by the expectation that the widows and orphans of the deceased officers will not apply for their share of this claim. They will apply. This morning I have received an application on behalf of one of them, and the applications will become constant and unceasing. Nor is this the only consequence which should, I will not say will, flow from it. The soldiers of the Revolution, who stood by the side of this corps of officers, and encountered the heat of the war, are equally entitled to the exercise of our liberality. The gentleman from New York, has said that the officers stand on a different footing from the soldiers—that their claim rests on a compact with the Government. And I would ask, sir, if the soldier might not rest his claim also on a compact? Did not the Government agree to pay him six dollars per month? Has it complied with this contract? I contend that it has fulfilled, as far as could have been demanded of it, its agreement with both officers and soldiers; but I inquire of those who hold a different opinion relative to the officers, to say, whether the soldiers have not equal, or greater cause to complain? They were paid in paper money, in miserable trash, which depreciated a thousand for one. The payment became merely nominal. From the lips of one of those who had shouldered his musket during the whole war, I learned that, practising great economy, he had treasured up a part of his pay, up to the end of the war; that then he had found the Government wholly unable to redeem its paper, and that he had given it to the winds. And yet, sir, it is said that the soldier has no claim upon that liberality which is invoked on behalf of the officer. But it is urged that the act of limitation, of 1794, bars the soldier's claim—and why not that of the officer? It is equally applicable to all Revolutionary claimers. How feeble, Mr. President, would have been the defence, arising from that source, yesterday. The barrier reared by the act of limitation would have yielded before the fervid and glowing appeal which the gentleman made to our liberality. The Treasury would have found no security behind it. And I cannot admit the justice or propriety of disregarding its provisions as to one class of men, and enforcing them as to another.

Acting upon the principles which the gentleman attempted to enforce, there still remains another class of Revolutionary sufferers, who should possess our regard. I allude to those who fought our battles in the cabinet, "who legislated with halters round their necks," who gave their all, and died bankrupts in fortune. I will name but one of them—Robert Morris. Who than him was more deserving! Who adventured more largely, or suffered more severely? He literally gave all to his country, and died either at the door or within the walls of a jail! Here is a theme for impassioned eloquence—one which addresses itself almost irresistibly to the feelings. The gentleman referred us to certain acts which had passed into laws, as incitives to the passage of the present bill. I will not analyse them minutely. The Government must, at all times, exercise a sound discretion, and I have no doubt but that it acted wisely in the instances alluded to. But, if precedents of recent legislation are to be urged in support of the bill, why do not gentlemen report a bill to remunerate the Jerseys, and other States, for losses and injuries which they sustained in the Revolution? An example of liberal legislation was at hand, in the law making provision for the sufferers on the Niagara frontier during the late war. Sir, we cannot repair losses which were then sustained. To do so would make bankrupt all the exchequers in the world. It was a revolutionary war. The husbandman can oppose no resistance to the tempest, which prostrates, in its course, whole forests; neither can Governments repair the ravages of revolutionary war. It is a political tempest, fraught with lightnings that render desolate the face of nature.

To these surviving worthies, then, sir, I would say, Brave men, your country venerates and reveres you. Your honorable scars and silver locks are your passport to her affection and gratitude. She has done for you all that justice required—that you yourselves demanded. She commuted at your request, and funded as you desired. She has thus cancelled the debt which she imposed upon herself. She cannot discriminate in your favor without creating thereby a burthen which would bankrupt her exchequer. Let not these hoary-headed veterans indulge in vain regrets. Sir, they have sources of consolation, and of rejoicing, which can never be dried up. They have the recollection of a well-spent life to brighten the decline of their years. They have fought the good fight, and their lives will terminate in honor. Would they exchange their well-bought honors for all the wealth which could be poured out upon them? Would the honorable Senator from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) (I beg his pardon for alluding to him personally) exchange the glory which he won at Mud Island Fort, and at Baltimore in the late war, for aught that could be offered him? Would those gallant men exchange a single scar which they obtained under the banners of liberty, for all the money in the world? No, sir; it would be exchanging immortality for mortality—an undying name for the perishable wealth of this world.

This country has not been unjust—it has not been ungrateful. When was it, sir, that a Revolutionary man, possessing worthiness, asked for office, that he did not receive it? Offices have been dealt out to them by State and United States' Governments, with a liberal hand; and to secure them against suffering and want, this Government has provided for them a liberal resource, in an existing law. I must then, Mr. President, enter my dissent from the idea that we have either withheld what was due, or denied what should have been granted.

The Senate adjourned to Monday. -

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1828.

The CHAIR presented a communication from Mr. John Agg, in relation to the concert to misreport the speech of Mr. Randolph, assumed to have been entered into between the reporters of the Intelligencer and Journal, by Duff Green, in his statement in answer to the memorial of E. V. Sparhawk.

Mr. EATON remarked that he did not think it at all incumbent upon the Senate to go into the examination of the matter contained in this communication. It had no direct relation to the affair which had brought the memorial and the answer before the Senate. In the first place, Mr. Sparhawk came forward and complained of an injury. They had consented to receive his memorial; and were therefore, in a manner, bound to hear Mr. Green, in answer. But he thought they ought to go no farther. If both sides were heard, it was surely sufficient without going into the consideration of affairs which had no bearing upon the matter in hand. He understood the question now to be, whether the statement of Mr. Agg should be received. He hoped it would not be, and made a motion to that effect.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, thought that the paper was already received.

The CHAIR stated that the receiving of a memorial, or other application, was a matter of course. But it was always in the power of a Senator to make a motion that it be not received. The gentleman from Tennessee having made that motion, the question was now before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said that he did not see any good reason why this paper should not be received. If one communication upon this subject were received, he thought all should be. The subject was an unpleasant one to enter upon at all; but as the memorial had been received, as well as the answer to it, he wished that whatever had any legitimate connexion with the affair in question, might be laid before the Senate. In relation to the cause of the first complaint, he knew very well that, as a criminal matter, they had nothing to do with it. As an assault and battery, it was a case to be settled by a court of justice. But he was far from thinking that the Senate had no jurisdiction over the place in which the offence was committed. They had, it was true, no legal jurisdiction; but they had a police jurisdiction, and he thought they ought to act promptly to its enforcement. The building in which they held their deliberations had been appropriated to the use of Congress. The part in which this body sits, is allotted to the Senate, and a police jurisdiction over its apartments undoubtedly exists, which is placed in the hands of the President. The members were, doubtless, willing on all occasions to aid him in any measures which he might think necessary to adopt for its regulation and execution. He was very far from supposing that the body had any punishing power. But he considered that if, in any case, the Chair did not see fit to act in relation to a violation of good order, it was the duty of the body to take up the subject, and express their opinion upon it. It was not for them to say whether the parties were right or wrong, or whether the offence of one party deserved chastisement from the other. But the time and place were to be considered. The commission of violence in the rooms appropriated to the use of the Senate, ought to be strongly reprobated. Such acts ought never to be countenanced, whether a member, a citizen, or an officer of the body, were the persons committing them. He thought the matter came within the power of the President of the Senate; but if it did not, it was certainly in the power of the body to pass upon such conduct. The Senate had a perfect control over its apartments. It could admit citizens or stenographers upon its floor, or it can reject them. And having admitted them, it could make such arrangements for their benefit as it might think proper. He did not at all intend to enter into the merits of the affray to which their attention had been called. But, as the Senate had given seats in the chamber to the reporters, he considered that they ought to be so far under the protection of the body as that they should not be prevented from pursuing the duties for which they were admitted by menace or force. He had merely risen to express his opinion on the power of the Senate to act in the matter. He thought that means should be employed to prevent persons from coming into the rooms occupied by them, to push their quarrels, or to commit violence on any one.

The CHAIR remarked, that, as the power of the President had been mentioned by the gentleman from Louisiana, he would state, that his power only extended to the regulation of the chambers, and to the providing rules for their arrangement. The Chair had certainly no power of punishing offences.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, observed, that he did not apprehend that the communication of Mr. Agg had any thing to do with the subject of the memorial presented by Mr. Sparhawk. It was a matter totally foreign to the application which the Senate had received from Mr. S. and he saw no reason for its reception.

Mr. ROWAN said, the facts were, that Mr. Sparhawk presented a memorial, to which Mr. Green had replied, and in replying, he had mentioned the journal to which Mr. Agg was attached. He, therefore, presents a statement in answer to that allusion. But Mr. R. considered, that if this were admitted, there would be no end to the statements. The chain would be interminable. This paper had nothing to do with the matter; and if it had, he should be not the less opposed to receiving it. He had been against receiving the first papers presented by Mr. Sparhawk, because the affair of which they treated was not a matter for their consideration. As to the dignity of the Senate, he thought it had been far more compromised by receiving those papers, than by the act of which they complained. He wished that, at this time, the whole subject might be disposed of. He wished to get rid of all this stuff, for he maintained that they ought not to act upon it. As he had said before, it was a subject for the examination of a court of justice, and there it ought, if at all, to be discussed. To the gentleman who said that the Senate had jurisdiction over the transaction, he answered, Where is your jury, your deciding body, before whom the case can be tried? He assured the gentleman there was no power in the Senate for the purpose. They could not go into the examination of the case, for where was the machinery by which it was to be done? There was none. He hoped, therefore, that the Senate would not receive the communication now presented, and that the several individuals might have leave to withdraw their papers.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, expressed his belief that the Senate had no jurisdiction over this subject. How [said Mr. S.] can you proceed? Have you the power to punish the offence complained of? Have you power to imprison the offender—and if you have, how far can you go in its exercise? How far are you licensed? How are you limited? And, if you go on, where will you end? These questions were of serious importance, and could not easily be answered. Was the business of the Senate to be obstructed by memorials brought in from day's end to day's end, upon every trivial occasion? He thought not. And suppose [said Mr. S.] you were to refer the matter to a committee, and they were to report that one of the parties has assaulted the other in your premises, and triumphed over him—What will you do with him? I cannot conceive. If the application was for the dismissal of an officer of the Senate for malpractices, it would be a different matter. As it was, he thought it a subject on which they could not act with propriety, and he had wished that the memorialist had been allowed to withdraw his papers when the motion was made the other day by the gentleman from Kentucky. It ought to have been withdrawn in its incipient stage. Of Mr. Sparhawk, Mr. S. said he knew nothing. He might have great cause of complaint; but this was not the place for him to apply to. He had nothing to say against accommodating the Reporters. They were useful individuals, and he believed the Public was much indebted to them. There were, he knew, complaints that they sometimes committed errors—but he thought they were generally correct—and indeed to him it was matter of wonder that they did not make ten mistakes where they made one. They certainly exhibited a desire to be correct, and ought to be admitted to all proper privileges. But Mr. Sparhawk's resort for the injury he complained of, was not here. He must apply to a court of justice. If a complaint had been lodged against the Printer to the Senate, he should have been ready to consider it and vote upon it. In the present case, he wished the matter might drop where it was; and hoped that the motion to allow the parties to withdraw their papers might be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, remarked, that he did not attempt to assert any right on the part of the person now applying here. But he thought all the papers ought to be put together; and was therefore in favor of receiving the communication.

Mr. NOBLE desired to hear the statement read.

Mr. EATON observed, that it could not be read if it was not received; and that the question upon receiving must first be taken.

The CHAIR said, that, if the motion to read was sustained by the Senate, the paper might be read.

Mr. EATON repeated, that he could not see any just ground for considering it at all, as it had nothing to do with the quarrel.

Mr. KING said, that the reason why the object of all memorials, etc. was stated on being presented, was, that the fact might be ascertained whether they were proper subjects of consideration. The object of this paper had been stated, and it was evident that it had nothing to do with the case before the Senate. For this reason, he was against receiving it.

Mr. NOBLE rose to make some remarks, but

The CHAIR interposed, and observed, that a question on reading could not be debated; and read the rule to that effect from Jefferson's Manual.

The question being then put on reading the statement offered from Mr. Agg, it was negatived.

The question occurred on receiving the communication, when it was rejected.

Revolutionary Pensioners.—Discriminating Duties.

[SENATE.]

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1828.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other Pensioners of the United States was again taken up.

Mr. SMITH moved to strike out the words "in addition to an unexpended balance of former appropriations, of five hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars, two hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars," and to insert eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SMITH said that he was instructed to make this motion by the Committee on Finance. The Committee, since the subject was last discussed, have had a correspondence with the Secretary of War, on the subject. It appears to the Committee that the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars will be sufficient for the pensions of the year 1828. The unexpended balance, five hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars, added to the sum of two hundred and thirty six thousand dollars, proposed to be appropriated in the bill, will answer the same purpose, so far as regards the pensions of 1828. But the unexpended balance, five hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars, might be called for this year, by those to whom it was due; and, there being no money in the Treasury to meet the demand, the pensioners would be compelled to apply to Congress for relief. The Committee thought it best to leave the unexpended balance subject to the claims upon it, and to appropriate, independently of that, a sufficient sum to meet the pensions of the year 1828.

The Secretary of War thought the appropriation should be made, as proposed in the bill; yet he would have the right to take up the unexpended balance and pay it away if it should be called for. The Committee were not of this opinion. Though this had been the practice of the Government, it was illegal. The act of 1820 forbids it. No inconvenience could arise from the course proposed by the Committee. The sum unexpended would, after the usual time, go to the surplus fund. The Chief Clerk of the Pension Office, Mr. Edwards, had given it as his opinion that the five hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars would be called for. It was also evident, from calculations which Mr. SMITH made, that all those were not dead, whose pensions had not been demanded. Mr. S. had suggested, he said, the propriety of enacting a law that all pensioners, who did not, for two years, apply for their pensions, should be considered as dead. But he had been informed that a law was unnecessary for the purpose, as it could be done by a regulation of the Department.

Mr. HARRISON would vote, he said, for the appropriations proposed by the Committee. The reason why the pensioners had not applied for the sums due to them, was not that they were dead, but that the pension system is complicated. The process of drawing the money was tedious and difficult. Mr. H. would take occasion, he said, at a proper time, to call the attention of the Senate to this subject, and endeavor to devise some easier means by which these meritorious men might be enabled to receive from Government their scanty pittance.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act concerning discriminating duties on tonnage and impost," having been taken up—

Mr. WOODBURY said, the bill now under consideration, relates to a subject of no small magnitude. As it is not accompanied by any report of facts or principles in its support, because such a report was made at a former session to this body, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate a few minutes, to recall to their minds the history and present condition of our discriminating duties, the changes that will be effected by this bill, and the reasons in favor of those changes. The duties imposed on American vessels, coming from abroad, were always, prior to the year 1815, only six cents per ton. Those imposed on foreign vessels, prior to that period, were fifty cents per ton on the vessel, and ten per cent, additional impost on the cargo. Since 1804, these last have also been subjected to fifty cents per ton light money. Thus making the discrimination forty-four cents per ton without, and ninety-four cents per ton with, light money on the vessel, and ten per cent, on the cargo. Since the 3d of March, 1815, the discrimination remains the same, except in certain cases, and as to certain nations which I will now proceed to particularize. In no cases has the duty on American vessels been altered, except the addition of fifty cents per ton, March 1st, 1817, whenever their crew and officers were not two-thirds Americans. But, in respect to foreign vessels, it was proposed, by an act of the 3d of March, 1815, to abolish all discriminating duties whatever, upon them or their cargoes, when the last was the "growth or produce of the country" where the vessel was owned, provided a reciprocal rule was there adopted in relation to this country. Some doubts arose as to the application of this act to countries where no discriminating duties had existed to be "abolished"—and, also, as to cargoes not the "growth or produce" of a particular country, but of some other country, in the interior of a continent, and, transported thence by land, or boat navigation, were "usually first shipped" at the ports of a different nation. Hence, January 7th, 1824, the phraseology was altered from "abolished," &c. to "imposed;" and the privilege of the cargo was extended from the "growth and produce of the country," to any articles "first or usually shipped" at any ports in the Netherlands, or Prussia, the Hanseatic cities of Hamburg, Lubec, and Bremen—and at any ports in Norway, Sardinia, Russia, or the Dukedom of Oldenburg. It is, by the way, somewhat singular, that this last privilege should have been limited to particular places, when the rule is old as the navigation law of 1651, wherever foreign vessels are allowed to bring their own produce, to admit in them all other produce "usually first shipped at their ports;" and, on this principle, Venice, Genoa, and Leghorn, have long been places from which Asiatic goods from the Levant were permitted to be, in their vessels, introduced into England. In this way, now, American produce descending the St. Lawrence, is mostly shipped from Montreal and Quebec, with the character, and all the privileges of Canadian produce. Under the laws of 1815 and 1824 before mentioned, and under certain commercial Conventions, since completed with foreign nations, the following changes as to duties on foreign vessels, have occurred since March 3d, 1815. British vessels, by the Convention of December 22, 1815, pay only the same duty as American ones, unless coming from places where American vessels are prohibited; but when coming from these last places, they pay $2 per ton, by our act of March 3d, 1817. I say nothing now as to the laws about the Colonial intercourse with the British West Indies. French vessels, by the Convention of June 24th, 1822, and by our act of March 3d, 1823, pay only $1 duty, per ton, on the ship, and $5 75 per ton, on the cargo, diminishing one-fourth annually, after September, 1834. Swedish vessels, by the Convention of 1818, are placed on the terms of the act of March, 1815, so that the discriminating duties now exist, as to England and France, only to the extent above named: but as to Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Russia, Prussia, Sardinia, the Hanse-towns, the Dukedom of Oldenburg and Guatemala, they do not exist at all as to their vessels and cargoes, when bringing cargoes of their own produce or growth; nor, in the most of them, when cargoes not of their produce, if usually first shipped at their ports. But, with the exceptions hereafter to be named, discriminations still exist as to all other nations; and, as to those places before enumerated, with two or three exceptions, discriminations still exist on all vessels with cargoes, not of their "growth or produce," nor "usually first shipped" at their ports.

The present act proposes to do away the whole of these remaining discriminations. It removes, whenever a reciprocal rule may prevail, all extra duties on tonnage, in all cases, and all extra duties on merchandise in all cases, whether the last be the produce and manufacture of the nation owning the vessel, or usually first shipped there, though not her produce and manufacture: or whether it be produce and manufacture, however frequently re-shipped; or coming from nations however remote. What are the reasons in favor of these important changes? Do they spring from sound authorities, and are they well supported by principle? More than twenty years ago, some of our most sagacious and intelligent merchants urged this policy upon this country, and one of them, most venerable for his experience and public services, now in my eye, attempted its adoption in vain.

After the embarrassments to our commerce, commencing in 1807, and ending with the peace in February, 1815, this policy was again essayed, in part, by the able negotiator of our Convention with Sweden in 1818. One article in that Convention provided for the admission, without discriminating duties, of any West India produce in our vessels, and for an admission in the same manner, in their vessels, of any produce of the Baltic. But the article was rejected by the Senate. It was not till 1825, that the subject was again renewed and recommended in the annual Executive message to Congress. The Chairman of the Committee of Commerce for that year made a very full report and speech in explanation of the subject, and a bill like the present passed the Senate without a division. But in the other House an amendment was attached to it, embracing the removal of discriminating duties as to the British Colonies; and such was the diversity of opinion, then, unfortunately, entertained on the Colonial question, that the bill, with that amendment, was never pushed through either House. The same fate, from a like cause, attended a separate bill in the Senate, the same Session, on the subject of that amendment, as all who hear me, and were then present, have good cause to remember. This measure, for some reason unknown to me, perhaps the want of time, was not revived during the last Session. But within the past three years we have ratified treaties with Guatemala, Denmark, the Hanseatic Republics, and Sweden, based on the grounds of this bill; and the subject being now re-called to the attention of this body, it remains for the Senate to decide whether the principles in its favor are such as to meet their full approbation. Those principles embrace the great paramount one of all liberal Governments, that trade should be free; that all shackles on commerce should be stricken off; and, in accordance with the lights and spirit of the present age, that every thing in navigation should be left to the fair competition of industry, enterprise, and skill. That, in a country which justly boasts of the freedom and superiority of its institutions, nothing is to be feared from a rivalry on this subject, free as air, and extensive as the widest range of civilization. Perhaps the only just limits to this general principle in commercial affairs, are the necessities, which sometimes exist, to favor the multiplication of seamen and vessels for national defence; or, by discrimination, to obtain a revenue for the customary expenses of Government. These reasons justified the English navigation laws in 1651, and our own discriminating duties in 1790; but would ill apply to our present condition and prospects.

As regards revenue, the discrimination yields but little, since the foreign tonnage is now so small; and that little is far from being wanted to meet the ordinary demands of the Treasury. As regards national defence, we have already a navy second to none of its size; the appropriations for its increase are liberal, and our navigation, inferior to only one Power in the world, can now furnish seamen to meet any call whatever, in any national emergency. Again: we are the carriers for other nations, rather than the employers of them to transport for us; and instead of foreign vessels engrossing nearly half the tonnage in our foreign trade, as in the year 1789, or having 100,000 out of 234,000 tons, they now constitute only about eight-hundredths of it, or something like 92,000 out of 1,000,000 tons. Again: we are known by experience, the surest test of all theories, to possess a skill and economy in building vessels, a cheapness in fitting them out, an activity in sailing them, which, without discrimination, would give us an advantage in coping with any commercial Power in existence. Persons of more practical knowledge than myself have, during the last ten years, become convinced, that such are the accurate calculations of our merchants, the youth and agility of our seamen, and the intelligence of our ship-masters, that American vessels can, on an average, make three trips to Europe, while a foreign vessel is making two. It must be manifest to all, that circumstances like these, rather than any discriminating duty, must always give and maintain to us a superiority and protection, which leave nothing to be feared from the fullest competition. Again: the manufacture of vessels, so far from needing the duty, is, in fact, encumbered by its operation. Look a moment at the facts. Of all the present tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States, about nine-tenths is American; and since the last war, the foreign tonnage has never exceeded thirteen-hundredths, and has sometimes been as low as eight-hundredths. On the supposition that discriminating duties existed every where abroad, as well as here, we have nine-tenths of the tonnage in our foreign trade taxed to us by those duties; while we tax to others, in return, only one-tenth. Such is the comparative disadvantage to American vessels, under this system, and on this hypothesis. Again: we export annually from sixty to eighty millions of produce, which, without any of the regulations since 1815, pays, or is taxed abroad with a discriminating duty; while, in 1825, out of $96,340,075 imports, only $4,437,565 were in foreign vessels, and taxed in return for sixty or eighty millions, with a discriminating duty of only ten per centum on the cargo. In 1826, out of $84,974,477, the imports in foreign vessels were only $4,196,357, leaving the disparity against us in the discriminating duties on the cargoes in about the same proportion as in 1825. I know that many of our exports went to countries where no discriminating duties under the acts of 1815 and 1824, and under the treaties made since, are imposed upon articles of our own growth and produce; but, at the same time, it is to be remembered, that many of the imports here, out of the four millions and a fraction in foreign vessels, are entered under the same laws and treaties, without any discriminating duties. I have not time now to furnish the Senate with the exact details; but it is fair to presume the ratio in both cases is not very unlike; and the comparative disparity against us about the same.

In considering every view of this subject, it is proper to reflect, also, that though the 99,417 tons, or about one-tenth of the tonnage in our foreign trade, in the year 1825, belonged mostly to England, France, and the Han-seatic towns, and not a vessel of it to any other nation in the trade between this country and Russia, Prussia, Turkey, the Levant, Austria, Africa, the East Indies, China, Hayti, the Pacific Ocean; nor in 1825, to Mexico or Colombia; yet the discriminating duties in some of those countries might, and in some instances do, still exist, against both our vessels and cargoes where these countries have not entered into the liberal policy of 1815. It has been suggested, in opposition to the extension still further of the policy of 1815, to all kinds of merchandise whatever, that, since the year 1815, our foreign tonnage has declined, and the decline might be attributed to the introduction of that policy. But a moment's consideration will show, that here, as in many other cases, events following each other in date, are not connected as cause and effect. Our foreign tonnage in the year 1816 was, to be sure, 1,300,000, and is now, or was in 1825, only about 1,055,446. But it is not to be forgotten, that, in 1816, foreigners enjoyed 238,000 tons, or one-fifth of the whole; while, in 1825, they enjoyed only 95,060 tons, or about one-tenth of the whole. So that the American tonnage in the foreign trade is now in a proportion nearly double to what it was then. The decline, then, is not comparative; neither is it from the removal of the discriminating duties; but it undoubtedly has arisen from the long peace in Europe, which naturally diminishes our exports, and from the circumstance, that, as the many old vessels in 1816 cease to be sea-worthy, they have been supplied by smaller vessels in the coasting trade, where their employment could be more profitable. As proof of this, the coasting trade, including all enrolled and licensed tonnage, has risen, from 1815 to 1825, over 200,000 tons, or from 513,833 to 722,323 tons. Indeed, in 1816, it was only 571,458 tons, while it now exceeds considerably all our tonnage engaged in the foreign trade.

But we not only want the discrimination removed abroad, wherever it still exists on our products, freighted in our own vessels; because our products transported are much more valuable in amount than theirs in their vessels; but because ours being necessities of life, and raw materials, will always hereafter be much surer in demand than theirs, as mere luxuries of life; or manufactures, for which we, at home, are able, generally, to furnish substitutes. A very direct tendency of the present measure will, also, be to relieve our present exports of foreign products, amounting, in 1825, to 32,590,643 dollars, and in 1826, to 24,539,612 dollars, from that discriminating duty, which does not come within the scope of the act of 1815, or 1824, and which has never been removed abroad, reciprocally, to any great extent, except by recent treaties with Central America, Denmark, the Hanseatic Republics, and Sweden. By those treaties, as before named, every species of discrimination, whether on vessels or merchandise of any kind, is entirely abolished. These exports of foreign articles, if burthened with only ten per cent. increased duty, equal to what is now imposed here in like cases, would expose us abroad to an annual tax of over 2,000,000 dollars, while the same increased duty on the amount of all kind of imports here, in foreign vessels, would be only about 400,000 dollars. Should we, in this country, extend the period of drawbacks, and adopt more extensively the warehouse system, as now contemplated, it will become still more useful to us to assort the cargoes of our vessels to all nations, without encountering, as to any part of those cargoes, either prohibitions or discriminations. The removal of every unequal and odious distinction will promote harmony in our foreign intercourse. It will extend to them the same favors we ask in return. It will reciprocate every privilege. It will invite free and full interchange of surplus commodities of every kind, and remove the usual occasions for angry relations and expensive wars. Where nature, or habit, or political foresight, has given any advantages to one nation over another, she will enjoy them while deserving them. But none will dread a monopoly; and exchanges will profitably happen on those liberal principles, which ought always to distinguish an age of free and thorough inquiry from one of limited enterprise and narrow views. The present state of our intercourse with the British West India Islands is a strong illustration of the folly of such collisions. I shall not travel out of my present path to investigate the origin of those collisions, or to fix censure either upon one party or the other. But this much is clearly manifest, that while, by the Treaty with Denmark, of April 26, 1826, we have a free trade with her Colonies in the West Indies, in all kinds of merchandise, except in navigation directly to the mother country; and by the Treaty with Sweden, of July 4, 1827, a still freer trade with Saint Bartholemews; and by a French Ordinance, of February 5, 1826, a copy of which is laid on our tables this morning, a trade to the islands of Martinique and Gaudaloupe, on an equal footing, in many valuable staples; yet, with the islands belonging to England, whose geographical position and habits make an intercourse still more profitable to both parties, we have in being on both sides, total prohibitions.

By means of these prohibitions, over 100,000 tons of our shipping have the last year been diverted from their accustomed channel of business; while, on the part of the British, only about 8,000 tons have been so diverted, and that chiefly to their own ports in New Brunswick and Canada, further Northeast. The consequence to us has been, that this kind of shipping, though forced abroad with cargoes, rather than to rot at our wharves, has been compelled to seek new markets or a circuitous voyage to old ones, thus taking the produce with higher freights and double commissions, and has consequently fallen in value at many American ports more than twenty per cent. Without including the depressing influence of this on the price of our produce, and the prospects of its growers, this may prove an useful lesson to all nations of the impolicy of an unprofitable, if not obstinate adherence to discriminating duties, or of any tardiness to adopt, when offered, reciprocal liberality in their commercial intercourse.

By this bill we now hold out the olive branch to all. If our terms are accepted, we may obtain most of the transportation now enjoyed by foreigners in the eight or ten hundredths of our foreign tonnage; as they now are enabled to compete with us to that extent, chiefly by the discrimination they enjoy at home. We may relieve our own existing foreign tonnage from some onerous duties, now imposed in some foreign ports. We may send our own products and manufactures, as well as our large exports of foreign articles, to every region unincumbered, wherever nature or custom may render them desirable and useful. On the other hand, by this arrangement, we may enable foreigners to make greater sales of their own produce and manufactures, to cheapen their transportation, to procure at a lower price their wanted supplies, and in these, and other particulars, to become amply remunerated for every indulgence granted to strangers. But, whether accepted or not, by nations, other than those who already have adopted the basis of this bill, we shall, at all events, by its passage, act in conformity to the boasted principles of our free Government. We shall second the liberal spirit of the present age; and if our advances are repulsed with an unconciliating temper, we shall still enjoy the satisfaction of having attempted, on our part, to discharge, with all good fidelity, our duty, both to that age so interesting as our own, and to that country of our birth and affections so forward, if not foremost, in the improvements of that age. I shall forbear to detain the Senate with any further detail on this subject, unless called for by objections to the bill, or by inquiries from gentlemen, which it may be in my power to answer.

Mr. SILSBEE made a few remarks—which were not heard by the Reporter. He was understood, however, as agreeing, generally, in opinion with Mr. WOODBURY, but differing in details.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, had considered this subject for a long time, and was a firm advocate of the principle of the bill. But, so clear a view of the question had been taken by the gentleman from New Hampshire, that, when called on, as a commercial man, to express himself on the subject, he hardly knew what to say. When this country came out of the Revolutionary war, discriminating duties were imposed. At that time Baltimore owned ten times the number of three-masted vessels as New York, and was extensively engaged in the coasting trade. The advantages derived from the passage of that act were instantaneous. The trade of this country was benefitted, and that of Great Britain somewhat prejudiced. That nation then contemplated a retaliation upon us. They waited until a good opportunity offered, and that they found at the negotiation of Mr. Jay's treaty. This treaty enabled them to retaliate the discriminating duty upon us—and, had it not been for the war which ensued, they would have carried all the trade from the United States to Great Britain.

I introduced this subject, said Mr. S. in the year 1802. Our Eastern brethren doubted the policy of the measure. At an after period such an act passed, extending, however, to but a portion of our commerce with foreign countries. What was then the language of our merchants? They said let us alone—give us a free and open trade, and we can take care of ourselves. From that time the principle has gradually gone on. The advantages have been great to the country, and, if this bill pass, they will still be enlarged. It relieves us from the apprehension of retaliatory measures on the part of foreign nations. A free and open trade is the only true American System. It is no new-fangled plan for the benefit of a favored class, but is a policy that has been long acknowledged as good, and satisfactorily tested. We ask no more from other nations; and, if they universally reciprocate the measure, we feel confident that we can excel them in taking advantage of the system, from the superiority of our navigators, and the general enterprise of the country. The prospect in such a case is fair that we shall become the carriers of other nations. He would venture to say that, if this principle were extended to the ports of the Mediterranean, this country would have the carrying trade to a great extent. Holland treats us as she has always treated us, with great liberality. She admits us into the ports of Java. We are, to a considerable extent, the carriers for England, and also for France, since the Convention. And he believed that every Power with which we trade will admit us into their ports on equal terms, if we hold out to them inducements to do so. Bonaparte saw the benefit of such a system; and put his finger on it, when he established his Continental System. Immense numbers of our vessels were now employed in the carrying trade of the Mediterranean, and gained, as they were entitled to, a liberal profit. And when the obstructions to the British Colonial Trade were removed, we should be able to go all over the world. This country had set the example of liberality, and it had been followed by many foreign Powers already. A paper had been laid on the table which showed that we were admitted reciprocally with almost all the articles which we carry to France. She rejects nothing but our pork and flour, and, if we can hold out, during this session, some amicable proposition to that country, we may hope that she will admit our flour. One good turn deserves another, and generally begets another. A different subject would probably come before the Senate in a few days, in which an opportunity might be given to conciliate France. Would it not be good policy to reduce the duty on her wines, an article in which she takes the greatest interest? Mr. S. hoped such a measure would be adopted—and he trusted that, if it were, France would reciprocate the act. The conduct of that Government had been highly liberal towards us, compared with that of Spain and Portugal, who had refused to receive any of our products, except in the Islands of Teneriffe, Fayal, and a few others. Now, as France has shown a friendly spirit, why should we not take her by the hand, and fully reciprocate this amicable disposition? Whatever might be said of the politics of the Minister of France, he had certainly shown a friendly disposition towards us, even against his own interest, as that part of his administration had been disapproved by the merchants of Bordeaux. He had not intended to say so much when he rose, and would conclude by repeating his desire that the bill should pass.

Mr. WOODBURY said a few words in reply to the remarks of Mr. SILSBEE.

Mr. FOOT said he did not apprehend any opposition to the principles or provisions of this bill. He had long been in favor of it, and had advocated the same principle on former occasions. He believed that, whatever doubts might formerly have been entertained in relation to the policy of this measure, there was but one opinion among the commercial men in this country, at the present time, viz: that nothing was wanted for the commerce of this country but a free and perfect reciprocity of intercourse and trade; that we did not fear a fair competition; but, Mr. F. said, although he fully agreed with the Chairman of the Committee, in relation to the present bill, he regretted his allusion to the Colonial trade with Great Britain. He understood the Chairman to state that one hundred thousand tons of our shipping had been thrown out of employ, by our exclusion from the British Colonies. The Chairman must, he thought, be mistaken in point of fact. Although the direct trade to the British Colonies had been closed against us, this tonnage was not thrown out of employ, but merely diverted into other channels; and for himself, Mr. F. said, since the treaty with Sweden had been ratified, opening the ports of St. Bartholomews, without any discriminating duties or charges, in addition to the opening of the French ports, as appeared by the French Decree, this morning laid on our tables, he was not disposed to even ask Great Britain to open her West India Colonies to our trade: for he was confident that the direct trade with her Colonies, under the limitations and restrictions under which they have ever been open to our trade, has never been as valuable as it may, and will be, under the present exclusion from British ports, with the facilities now afforded by the treaty with Sweden, and the French Decree: for surely we have the long carrying trade to the Islands, and are not subject to the heavy charges in the British ports; and, by the Convention between Great Britain and Sweden, our produce is not chargeable with the duties and charges which have always been levied on our vessels and cargoes in their ports, when carried, as it will be, in the vessels of St. Bartholomews, or in British vessels, from the Swedish to the British Islands.

Mr. WOODBURY said that he had not said this tonnage was thrown out of employment, but that it had been diverted from its former channels.

The question was then put on engrossing the bill, and was decided in the affirmative, without a division.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

The special Orders of the Day then occurred, and the bill more effectually to provide for the organization of the Militia of the United States, and the discipline thereof, was taken up.

Organization of the Militia—Columbian College.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CHANDLER explained the objects of the bill, among which is a provision authorizing the classing of the Militia into two bodies, the one to be composed of men between the ages of 21 and 28, to be known as the Junior Class; the other to be composed of men between the ages of 28 and 45. A provision was also made that, whenever the Militia of any State will turn out for discipline four days in the year, they shall be supplied with tents and camp-kettles by the United States. This, Mr. C. observed, was held out as an inducement to them to encamp for that space of time, as men were taught much more by being drilled for four days at one time, than by the same number of days at different periods. Mr. C., after having explained the various provisions of the bill, moved an amendment, to provide for any Militia officer or soldier who should be wounded while in the service of the United States.

Mr. NOBLE expressed himself in opposition to the amendment, as threatening to establish a pension system, and moved, to postpone the bill until Monday next, to be made the order for that day.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. supported the bill, but suggested some alterations in the details.

Mr. CHANDLER acquiesced in the suggestions of the gentleman from Maryland, and observed that he had no wish to push the measure, desiring that the aid of the Senators might be given to correct the bill. He was willing to agree to the motion to postpone, if gentlemen desire to examine the bill farther.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. thought to postpone would place the bill too far down on the list of special orders. He therefore moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER assented to the motion, and the question being put upon it, it was agreed to.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE.

The bill for the relief of the Columbian College in the District of Columbia, being next on the list of special orders, was taken up.

Mr. EATON made a few favorable remarks upon the bill.

Mr. WHITE said, that he had read a statement of the affairs of the College, by which it appeared that they were very much deranged. He wished to be certain, when the United States gave up its claim on the College, that some other creditors should not step in and take away the property, with which they were to go on with the institution. He, therefore, asked of the gentlemen who formed the Committee, information as to who are the other creditors, what the amounts due to them, and whether they were willing to agree to the compromise. He wished to see what was the amount of funds possessed by them, to meet the demands of such creditors as would not give up their claims; because, if the benefit contemplated by this bill was not likely to operate upon the institution, it was useless to give up the claim of the United States upon it. All that he wanted was to be able to vote safely, and he asked for the requisite information, which he had not as yet received.

Mr. EATON said that he could not give the information asked, because it was not the duty of the Committee to investigate the private debts of the College.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, explained the history of the transaction, by which the College became indebted to the United States, at considerable length. As far as the Committee had investigated the affairs of the institution, he believed a disposition was generally displayed by the creditors to accept a compound, by which they should receive 75 dollars in the hundred. It was understood that contributions, in various quarters of the country, had been or would be made, under the condition that Congress should be induced to release the College from this demand. If this bill was passed, all the creditors would receive 75 cents in the dollar, and the institution be allowed to go on. If it were rejected, the institution would be ruined. The United States could not compromise. It must either insist upon its claim or give it up. He asked whether it was better to hold on upon a demand, which was in itself worth nothing, or by its relinquishment enable the College to go on prosperously? He gave it as his candid opinion that, if the bill were passed, the institution would receive, and by the next session have, upwards of one hundred students, and all this would be effected by giving up a demand, which was not worth the pen he held in his hand. He hoped, therefore, the bill would be allowed to pass.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed that he was a member of the committee that had reported the bill. He held in his hand a statement, which the gentleman from Tennessee could examine, and which gave a list of the assets of the College. By this it appeared that the only available means of the institution was a certain quantity of bank stock. As to the debts of the institution, the particulars were not known to the committee. He remarked, that Government, in obtaining this demand upon the College, parted with no valuable consideration—they parted with that which would have never produced any thing; and by giving it up they would not be losers, if this worthless demand were not given up, the College could not go on.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, objected to the grant. It was said that there was no value in the demands which were disposed of to the College; but he was sure that a portion of the sum was secured to the United States by Thos. L. McKenney. He was then an officer of the Government, and is so still, and draws a salary of 1,500 dollars, which was pledged for the payment of this sum of 14,000 dollars—so that the Government was safe for a part, at least, of this sum. A report, to which Mr. S. referred, was, he observed, proof of this fact. It stated that Mr. McKenney was anxious to be able to draw his salary, and this arrangement was made, by which the debt was shifted upon the Columbian College. As to the debt of Mr. Luther Rice, of 11,000 dollars, it did not appear how it was contracted. But, the 14,000 dollars was secured by Thomas L. McKenney, who had a good salary, and did not seem desirous of giving it up. He thought the subject ought to be examined closely. The debt of the College, it appeared, was about 100,000 dollars—contracted in the four or five years of its existence—how, it would be useful to know. It was said to be flourishing—to have students—and it was well known to be no charity school, no gratuitous institution, and he should like to know how they had contracted so large a debt. The demand also struck him as an improper one, to give up the debt; for it appeared to him nothing more than equity that the United States should share with the other creditors pro rata. He had another insuperable objection to acting upon this subject. It was, that it had been proposed to establish a literary institution here. It had been recommended by General Washington, and by the present Chief Magistrate. He was against it: for he knew not where they should find constitutional power for its establishment. He was against it, because, if this relief was granted, there would next year come up a proposition to establish a literary institution in this city, and this bill would be referred to as a precedent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. did not anticipate that, at this time of day, the question of constitutionality would be brought up. At this late hour there was no time for its discussion. If the arrangement made in regard to the 14,000 dollars, was an improper one, at least it was directed by one of the first men in the Union. Mr. Crawford had made that transfer, and it was to be supposed that, when he did it, there was a probability of getting something. He knew that Mr. McKenney was bound to pay it; but he also knew that, if it were pressed upon him, he would be obliged to throw up his situation; for his salary was necessary for his own support; and in that case the Government would gain nothing. The character of Mr. Crawford admits of no other supposition than that he believed he was doing what was for the best interests of the country, in making the arrangement.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that the demands of the United States on Mr. McKenney were of a doubtful nature, as two Auditors, in settling his accounts, had disagreed; and having no other means of subsistence but his salary, the demand was not enforced, and the arrangement was made with the College, so as to allow him to draw his salary. As to the question which had been broached by the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. C. thought with the gentleman from Kentucky, that it was too late in the day, and too late an hour in the day to discuss the constitutional power of establishing a literary Institution in this District, which was entirely under the control of Congress. He thought the principle fully established in favor of such a project, by the opinions of many of our greatest statesmen.

Mr. WHITE said he was sorry to obstruct the bill; but he thought the Senate ought to have more information, in order to act properly upon the subject. He was still in the same doubt as he had previously expressed, as to the condition of the Institution—and he wished to know whether this grant was to be productive of the benefits contemplated by it. It had been said that a Committee had reported upon it last year. But it was well known that the condition and value of property changed essentially in the course of 12 months. It was, therefore, necessary to inquire into the present condition of the College. To procure the necessary information, he moved that "the bill be recommitted, with instructions that the committee ascertain and report the amount of the debts due by the College, to whom they are payable, for what they were contracted, and when they are payable; And, also, that the committee ascertain and report the whole funds owned by said College, and in what they consist; and, whether there is any arrangement by which the United States are to be restored to their former situation, should the present debtors be released."

These were the points on which he wanted information, in order that the Senate might act understandingly upon the matter. Without this information could be afforded him, he was in the dark. If it should prove, that, by releasing the College from the debt due the United States, it would be enabled to go on prosperously, he was in favor of the bill. But, if it should be found, that, in doing this, Congress was only providing funds for the payment of other creditors, no more meritorious than the United States, he should be against it. He thought no gentleman would be in favor of giving up this debt, if it would be of no service to the College. To prevent the possibility of falling into such an error, he had offered his motion.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, read a passage from Mr. Rice's statement, inserted in a report of a former year, in which he says, that McKenney told him a demand was held against him, by which he was prevented from drawing his salary, and that he wished to shift the demand, so as to be able to remove the obstruction to his pay. Therefore, said Mr. SMITH, I say again, that the portion of the amount held against McKenney was, in part, secured, and was not, consequently, worthless. He thought as highly of Mr. Crawford as any man; but he pinned his faith on no man's sleeve. There was no doubt of his high qualifications and inflexible virtues; but he was not infallible, and he might err. He was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, observed, that the delay which would arise from a recommitment, was his chief ground of objection to the motion. As to the debts of the College, he thought it would be a disagreeable task to take up all the grocery bills that had been purchased. Besides, it would arrive at no practical result.

Mr. WHITE thought no man could have any reasonable objection to such an investigation. He had no design to injure the feelings of any one, and it could not be injurious to any individual to have it known that he had given credit to a public institution. If the names of the creditors were disclosed, the Senate would be enabled to decide whether they would accept the compromise to be offered, in case the debt was relinquished by Congress.

Mr. BERRIEN hoped the bill would be recommitted. One of the objects of the motion was to ascertain how those debts were contracted. If they originated in the ordinary way, the same vigilance would not be requisite. But if it should appear that those debts have been contracted in any other than the ordinary way, and out of the ordinary duties of the public officers, without in any manner intending to impeach their conduct, he thought this subject one of serious import. The inquiry he thought would be greater in authorizing, or countenancing these extra judicial contracts, than that which could result from the delay of the bill. He should vote for its recommitment.

The motion offered by Mr. WHITE, was then adopted, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CAPTORS OF THE PHILADELPHIA.

The bill for the relief of Susan Decatur and others was taken up, and the question being on filling the first blank in the bill with one hundred thousand dollars—

Mr. HAYNE (Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) said, that, so deep was his conviction of the justice of the claim under consideration, that he could not believe it was necessary for him to do more than present a clear statement of the facts, and to explain the grounds on which the committee had proceeded in reporting this bill. In doing this, said Mr. H., I shall avail myself of the report, which, under the direction of the committee, has been submitted to the Senate; to which I will add such observations as may be necessary to give the Senate a full view of the whole subject. The claim which it is the object of this bill to satisfy, is founded on the recapture and destruction of the frigate Philadelphia in the harbor of Tripoli, in the year 1804. I do not think it necessary, Mr. President, to go back to the causes which led to the Tripolitan war. It is well known that depredations on our commerce in the Mediterranean, the demand of tribute, and the capture of American citizens, for whose release a ransom was always demanded, sometimes amounting to $3,000 a man, compelled the United States at length to appeal to arms for the redress of these grievances. As soon as the war with Tripoli commenced, Commodore Preble was dispatched with a small squadron to the Mediterranean to prosecute hostilities; and not long after the arrival of his squadron on the Barbary coast, the frigate Philadelphia of 44 guns, then commanded by Commodore Bainbridge, was stranded on rocks, in a situation which rendered resistance impossible, led to her capture by the enemy, and the imprisonment of her officers and crew, amounting to between three and four hundred men, in one of the dungeons of Tripoli. On the flood tide the frigate was got off, and being taken into the Tripolitan service, was moored in the harbor of Tripoli, "within pistol shot of the whole of the Tripolitan marine, mounting altogether upwards of 100 pieces of heavy cannon, and within the immediate protection of formidable land batteries consisting of 115 pieces of heavy artillery." It is stated that "besides this force, there were encamped at the time, in the city and its vicinity, twenty thousand troops, and that upwards of 1000 seamen were attached to the fleet in the harbor." In this situation, sir, and while the force of Commodore Preble, originally small, was, by the loss of the Philadelphia, so much reduced as to prevent his carrying on his operations against the enemy with any prospect of success, Stephen Decatur, then a very young man, and a junior lieutenant in the fleet, conceived the idea of entering the harbor of Tripoli in the night, with the small schooner Enterprise, of 12 guns and about 70 men, which he then commanded, and of boarding and recapturing the frigate. That this scheme originated with Decatur is asserted by the committee in their report; but, as this fact has been questioned, I shall proceed to establish it beyond the possibility of a doubt, if the evidence before us is to be relied on. It is due to the memory of one of the most gallant officers that ever adorned the Naval service of this or any other country, that the truth should be put beyond all question; and I know that this act of justice to her lamented husband will be more grateful to the feelings of the petitioner than any pecuniary grant you could possibly make. I will now refer the Senate to the statements of Commodore Charles Stewart, who served under Commodore Preble, and who, in command of the Syren, accompanied Decatur in his expedition against the Philadelphia.

The evidence on this subject will be found at page 46 of the Documents on the tables of the Senators.

Commodore Stewart, in a letter dated December 12th, 1826, addressed to Mrs. Decatur, says:

"You state that your late husband has given you to understand that the project of burning that frigate at her moorings, and thereby remove a serious impediment to the future operations of the squadron against Tripoli, originated with him. This understanding was perfectly correct—it did originate with your late husband, and he first volunteered himself to carry it into effect, and asked the permission of Commodore Preble, off Tripoli, (on first discovering the frigate was lost to the squadron) to effect it with the schooner Enterprise, then under his command. The Commander-in-Chief thought it too hazardous to be effected in that way, but promised your late husband that the object should be carried into effect on a proper occasion, and that he should be the executive officer when it was done."

In another letter, dated January 5th, 1827, Commodore Stewart says:

"The Squadron under the command of Commodore Preble had been detained some time, as they severally arrived at Gibraltar, (with the exception of the frigate Philadelphia and the schooner Vixen) to counteract the hostile designs of the Emperor of Morocco. As soon as the Commodore had accomplished his objects in that quarter, he proceeded off Tripoli, in the Constitution, accompanied by the schooner Enterprise, commanded by your husband. On arriving off Tripoli, where the Commodore expected to find the frigate Philadelphia and sch. Vixen, blockading that port, he discovered that frigate at moorings in the harbor. It was at this time your late husband proposed to destroy the frigate, with the Enterprise, under his command—and at this time, as I stated in my former letter to you, Commodore Preble assured your husband that the frigate should be destroyed, and that he should be the executive officer when done, for his having so handsomely volunteered his efforts to effect it with the schooner Enterprise. I give you these facts as I received them from Commodore Preble and your husband, at the time, as well as from several officers then on board the Constitution. Some time after this I arrived at Syracuse, in the Syren brig, from Algiers, and offered my services for the expedition, which were accepted by Commodore Preble.

"Some time after this, when the expedition was a subject of conversation in the cabin of the Constitution, (which was frequently the case, from the extreme urgency on our part to have it effected immediately, and unwillingness on the part of the Commodore to have it executed at so perilous a season of the year, and his reluctance to put any thing to hazard in a force originally so small, but then much reduced by the frigate and her crew,) that letters were received from Capt. Bainbridge, at Tripoli, I think by way of Malta, which were partly written in lemon juice, and which the Commodore read to us, after rendering it legible before the fire. In this letter the practicability of destroying the frigate was strongly urged by Captain Bainbridge, and the mode he pointed out was by a surprise. This dispatch fully confirmed all our ideas and previous conversations on that subject, decided the Commodore at once to carry it into effect—which was done soon after, in a manner set forth in his reports, on that subject, to the Secretary of the Navy."

In support of this statement, we have the evidence of the late Captain Spence, and of Commodores Chauncey, Ridgely, Crane, and Rodgers. Capt. Spence says:

"The destruction of the frigate Philadelphia is associated with the name of 'Decatur only,' and I had always supposed him to be the projector of the enterprise, from the circumstance of his having been entrusted with its execution. There could be no other good reason assigned for the preference given him, in the presence of older officers. I am under the impression that Commodore Decatur was the first to suggest the re-capture of the frigate Philadelphia."

Commodore Chauncey says:

"I state that I was not in the Mediterranean when the Philadelphia was destroyed, but I joined the Squadron soon after, and it was generally understood among the officers that the plan for her destruction originated with Decatur; and that the execution of it was, in consequence, entrusted to his management. I acted under this impression when I urged on the then Secretary of the Navy the propriety of promoting the gallant Decatur to the rank of Post Captain."

Captain Ridgely says:

"I have a most distinct recollection of all the circumstances attending the preparation for burning the Philadelphia, and I have no hesitation in saying that the whole originated with Commodore Decatur—it was he who suggested to the late Commodore Preble the possibility of the enterprise."

Captain Crane says:

"My recollections are very distinct relative to the re-capture of the frigate Philadelphia. It has always been my belief that Commodore Decatur planned, as well as executed the enterprise."

Commodore Rodgers says:

"I had always supposed the plan by which the frigate Philadelphia was destroyed was projected by Commodore Decatur."

In claiming for Decatur the merit of suggesting the daring scheme which he afterwards so nobly carried into effect, it is not my intention in the smallest degree to detract from the merit of Commodore Preble, who incurred the heavy responsibility of sanctioning the enterprise. The Commander of the Squadron, in determining to commit to Decatur the conduct of the expedition, was not unmindful of the extreme hazard of the undertaking. He well knew that its success would entirely depend on the celerity, secrecy, and gallantry of its execution; and, conceiving that any attempt to bring out the frigate must be attended with extraordinary hazard to the captors, and possibly expose the vessel to the risk of being re-captured—and believing that the destruction of the Philadelphia would sufficiently restore the balance of power to enable him to carry on his operations against Tripoli successfully—and being, perhaps, moreover, of opinion that the destruction of the frigate, under the very eyes of the Turks, was calculated to make a deeper and more lasting impression on their forces, even than her re-capture, he resolved that she should be destroyed; and, therefore, issued peremptory orders “that, in case of success, “Decatur should be sure to set fire to the gun-room, “births, cock-pit, store-room forward, births on the “birth-deck,” and then, after “blowing out her bottom,” to abandon her. In looking at these orders of Commodore Preble, I have been forcibly struck with their remarkable tone. In every part of them he uses a language which one here might be supposed to use to another, by whom all dangers and difficulties were to be trampled on as nothing. With the utmost precision, he instructs Decatur to proceed to the harbor of Tripoli, to enter it in the night, to board the “Philadelphia,” to carry every thing by the sword, and, having caused her entire destruction, to return and report to him! As if the execution of such an order, by a Lieutenant and seventy men, in a small ketch, under the fire of several hundred pieces of cannon, was a matter of course! The real state of the Commodore’s feelings, however, keep out in the conclusion, when, in spite of his tone of confidence, he commends the little band to the protection of Heaven, and “May God prosper you in the enterprise!”

But, to return to the expedition. Decatur sailed from Syracuse, where the American Squadron then lay, on the 3d of February, in a small ketch, of sixty tons, called the Intrepid, with about seventy officers and men, all volunteers, accompanied by the schooner Syren, commanded by Lieutenant (now Commodore) Stewart, to whom was assigned the duty of supporting him with the boats of the Syren, and covering his retreat. After several days of very tempestuous weather, he arrived off the Harbor of Tripoli, and, on the night of the 16th proceeded into the harbor, ran up alongside of the Philadelphia, (moored as I have described) boarded, and carried her, after a short but severe conflict, on the decks of the frigate, in which upwards of twenty Turks were killed on the spot, and the rest driven below or overboard. At this critical period, Lieutenant Decatur found himself in quiet possession of his prize—not a gun had been fired—the alarm had not yet been spread, and it was the opinion of the Pilot who conducted the expedition, as well as of several Naval Officers, acquainted with the circumstances, and (the Committee have been assured) of Decatur himself, that the vessel might have been brought out of the harbor in safety; and, if that had been accomplished, the officers and crew of the Intrepid would, by the laws of the land, have been entitled to the full value of the frigate, certainly equal to two or three hundred thousand dollars. But the peremptory orders of his Commanding Officer prevented the attempt; and having deliberately set fire to the vessel, in the very manner pointed out in his orders, and, having remained on board until the flames “burst out of the port-holes, and had reached the rigging and the tops,” he finally abandoned her, bringing off the whole of his crew, under a heavy fire from the batteries and the shipping, without the loss of a single man!

To attempt, Mr. President, an eulogy of an exploit like this, would be a vain and fruitless effort. I must borrow the language of others. A gallant Officer, now no more, assures us that it acquired for Decatur the meritorious appellation of “the terror of the foe.” In the language of your Committee, it was an achievement, the “gallantry of which has very seldom been equalled, and “never surpassed, in the Naval History of the world.” And, in the official despatches of Commodore Preble, it is declared that “its merit can hardly be sufficiently estimated—it is above all praise.” To this, Sir, there is nothing to be added.

But, Sir, I must be permitted to dwell, for a moment, on the consequences of this victory, and the benefits which the country has derived from it. The Tripolitan war of 1804 has always been considered as having contributed largely in laying the foundation of the naval glory of this country. It kindled that spirit among our young naval men, which has, on every occasion, blazed forth with so much lustre. It elevated the American Naval character in the eyes of foreign Nations, and inspired among our officers that confidence in themselves, which, at the commencement of the late war, (when it was feared that our ships would, in a few months, be absolutely swept from the ocean,) enabled them to meet the enemy in equal fight, and to achieve so many proud victories on the ocean and the lakes. From that dark hour when Decatur, in a small ketch, with sixty men, illuminated the Castle of Tripoli with the blaze of the Philadelphia, the whole career of our Navy (with but a single exception) has been a series of daring enterprises and brilliant achievements. Its path has been a flood of glory. But it is in the effects of the destruction of the Philadelphia, upon the Turks, that I would at this time more especially insist upon. It is emphatically stated by the Committee, and no doubt justly, that it is to the profound impression produced by this and other exploits in the Tripolitan war, (especially the affair of the gun-boat, in which Decatur was again so proudly distinguished,) that the commerce of this country is indebted for a greater exemption from depredations, on the part of Turkish cruisers, than has been experienced by any other nation, and that when difficulties have occurred, they have been adjusted with unexampled celerity, and at an expense of blood and treasure altogether insignificant, compared with that to which, under similar circumstances, the greatest maritime Powers of Europe have been subjected. In illustration of the truth of this position, and to show how largely the destruction of the Philadelphia contributed to produce these results, I beg leave to refer to one or two facts. It is stated by Dr. Ridgley, formerly Surgeon of the Philadelphia, in a document, on the table of every Senator, that “He has a distinct and indelible impression of the leading events of his imprisonment. The Pacha and his Court did not attempt to conceal their exultation on the capture of the frigate Philadelphia. It was a jubilee in Tripoli. So extravagant were his calculations, that he would not listen to any proposal of peace and ransom for a less sum than one million of dollars. In this condition of affairs, it would have been impolitic to have opened a negotiation. It would have been regarded as an evidence of fear and imbecility. This tone of confidence and triumph continued, until the daring enterprise, led on by your gallant and lamented husband, illuminated his castle with the blaze of his trophy. The sensation produced by the achievement was indescribable—consternation and dismay were depicted on every face. But the best evidence of its impression was the frequent conferences of the Pacha with the Consul, his undisguised desire to make peace, and his proposition to that effect, on terms much more moderate—I think two hundred thousand dollars. The terror inspired by the re-capture and conflagration, (increased by the attack of the gun-boats, on the third of August, 1804,) was felt during the war, and its influence was acknowledged when the treaty of peace was signed.”

Such were the immediate effects of this exploit. But they ceased not with the war—we no longer pay tribute.

Captors of the Philadelphia.

[SENATE.]

Our seamen and our ships in the Mediterranean have, for upwards of twenty years, enjoyed as much freedom among the "licensed pirates" of the Mediterranean as on our own coasts. Until the war with Great Britain, I believe no depredations on our commerce, of any consequence, had been committed by any of the Barbary Powers. Being thus led to believe that our ships would necessarily be annihilated in that contest, our rights were violated by Algiers, Tripoli, and Tunis. The moment peace was made with England, our Government determined promptly to redress these wrongs, and Decatur was dispatched for that purpose, with three frigates, one sloop, one brig, and three schooners. His was but the van of a larger squadron destined for that service. But, sir, his name alone accomplished the object at once, almost without cost, and without bloodshed. Sir, it is almost incredible, it is a fact, unparalleled in the annals of warfare, that in fifty days after the squadron sailed from Sandy Hook, a treaty was signed between Algiers and the United States, which included indemnity for the past and security for the future. In that short space of time, Decatur "had cruized in the Mediterranean, fought and captured a Turkish frigate and some smaller vessels, killed the Algerine Admiral, sailed into the harbor of Algiers, and ratified a treaty at the cannon's mouth." From Algiers he proceeded to Tunis, and insisted on and instantly obtained payment for American property (to the value of near 50,000 dollars) which had been cut out of that harbor by the British. From Tunis he passed on to Tripoli, and there effected a settlement of all our differences, with the same celerity and ease. To show that in the extraordinary success which attended these operations, Decatur was aided by the impression of his own great name and his former exploits, I will read a few lines from the statement of a gentleman, then American Consul at Tunis, who tells us "he was on the spot at the time, and perceived the effect of that influence." He thus describes the interview between the Bey and the messenger of the Commodore. "Tell your Admiral to come ashore and see me," said the Bey. "He declines coming, your highness, until these disputes are settled, which are best done on board ship." "But this is not treating me with becoming dignity; Hamuda Pacha, of blessed memory, commanded them to land and wait at the palace until he pleased to receive them." "Very likely, your highness, but that was twenty years ago." "This Admiral is the same one who, in the war with Sadi Yusef, of Trablus, burnt the frigate." "The same." "Hum! why do they send wild young men to treat for peace with old Powers? then you Americans don't speak truth; you went to war with England, a nation with a great fleet, and said you took their frigates in equal fight; an honest people always speak truth." "Well, sir, and that was true. Do you see that tall ship in the bay, with a blue flag, (the Guerrier?) that was taken from the British; that one near the small island, (the Macedonian,) was also captured on equal terms; that sloop near Cape Carthage, (the Peacock,) was also taken in battle." The Bey laid down his telescope, reposed on his cushions, and with a small tortoise-shell comb set with diamonds, combed his beard.

"A small vessel got under weigh, and came near the batteries; a pinnace with a few men rowed about the harbor, and one person, dressed in the garb of a sailor, was taking soundings—it was Decatur. "Tell the Admiral to land," said the Bey, "and all shall be settled to his satisfaction," which was done.

The rapidity and success with which Decatur brought to a conclusion our differences with three of the Barbary States, forms a striking contrast with the difficulties experienced almost immediately afterwards by Great Britain, and Holland, and more recently by France, in settling their disputes with one of them. Not many months after Decatur had concluded his treaty with Tripoli, Lord Exmouth, in command of the combined British and Dutch fleets, endeavored to accomplish the same thing, and what was the result? With a force consisting of five ships of the line, eleven frigates, and a great number of smaller vessels, he was hardly able, after a most bloody battle, (in which he lost 150 men killed, and had 700 wounded,) to extort a peace, on terms less advantageous than those which Decatur had obtained in a few hours, "without the sacrifice of a single life, or the loss of a spar or a rope." And even now, while I am speaking, a powerful French fleet, which has been engaged for months in vain attempts to extort peace from the same nation, has nothing to boast of but a single drawn battle. It has been remarked, sir, by one of our most distinguished citizens, "that the greatest statesmen of the last war were the heroes of our army and navy," and I think I may add that they have proved themselves, on more than one occasion, our ablest negotiators.

Without dwelling longer on this topic, I will come directly to the inquiry, whether any, and, if any, what pecuniary reward is now due to the captors of the Philadelphia. On this branch of the subject, sir, I adopt as my own the views of the Committee. At the time of the capture of the Philadelphia the navy was young, and it was the opinion of many, even of our wisest statesmen, that it was not the true policy of the United States to strengthen this arm of the national defence. The system which has since been introduced, and which seems now to unite all suffrages in its favor, had not yet been established, and appropriate rewards for distinguished services had not been provided. Congress, therefore, though appreciating very highly the valor and good conduct of Decatur and his gallant associates, contented themselves with bestowing mere honorary rewards, unless it can be considered as an exception to the remark, that they voted two months' pay to the officers and men; which, it is understood, the former unanimously declined to receive. When, at a later period, however, the people of the United States came to feel and acknowledge the importance of a navy to the national defence—when our officers and men were every day covering themselves and their country with glory, a better and more liberal spirit sprung up, and was cherished, towards this long neglected department of the public service. Prior to the capture of the Guerriere by the Constitution, we believe, no case had occurred in which a pecuniary reward, for a naval victory, had been paid out of the public treasury. A share in the thing captured was all that the laws or usages of the country allowed: and, if that perished in the conflict, the victors went without their reward. When, however, the navy had fought itself into favor, and our naval heroes came to be regarded with the gratitude and affection which could no longer be withheld, the rule was adopted of paying, out of the public purse, for vessels destroyed in battle; and the principle is now settled, from the uniform practice of the Government, for fourteen years, that a reasonable compensation is to be allowed for vessels sunk in battle, or necessarily destroyed in consequence of injuries received in the conflict. Conceiving, therefore, that it is the established policy and settled practice of the Government, to allow compensation in all such cases, though they do not come within the provisions of the prize acts, the question now presents itself, whether the same liberal principle ought not to be extended to the case of the Philadelphia, and whether compensation is not as justly due to the captors of that vessel as to the captors of the Guerriere and the Java, or of the gun boat destroyed on Lake Ontario? On this point, the Committee were clearly and unanimously of opinion, that both justice and policy concur in support of the claim. Where all the facts are notorious, and the merit of the claimants is confessedly of the highest order, the Government ought not to avail itself of the mere lapse of time ; nor can I conceive any sound reason why a rule, founded on justice and enlarged principles of public policy, should not be extended to those who have achieved signal victories, before as well as after its adoption. I come to the conclusion, therefore, with great confidence, and I know the Senate will concur with me, that a reasonable compensation ought now to be granted to the captors of the Philadelphia.

I proceed next to consider the amount which ought to be granted. On this point I propose to look to precedents, all of which are collected and annexed to the report of the Committee. On examining these, it will be seen, that the amount granted by Congress, for vessels burnt, or destroyed in battle, varied from one-fourth to the full value of the vessel so destroyed. In the cases of the Java and Guerriere, about one-fourth was allowed, but in the case of the British sloop of war Hermes, destroyed in the attack on fort Bowyer, her full value was paid to the garrison. Without examining all of the precedents, there is one to which I will call the particular attention of the Senate. During the operations on Lake Ontario, carried on by Commodore Chauncey, a British gun boat, called the Black Snake, was destroyed by two barges, under the command of Lieut. Gregory. For this exploit no reward was ever claimed by the gallant officer who achieved it. But some years afterwards, one of the persons concerned in that affair, came here and presented a claim to Congress. The subject was referred to a committee, of which a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (no longer a member of this House) was chairman, and of which I had the honor to be a member. The subject was fully investigated, all the precedents examined, and a bill reported providing for the payment of three thousand dollars, which was certified by Commodore Chauncey to be the full value of the gunboat, to Lieutenant Gregory and his party. Here, then, it will be perceived that, if Congress at the commencement of the war found itself constrained, by the pecuniary embarrassments of the country, to grant to the captors of the Guerriere and the Java only one-fourth part of the value of the vessel destroyed—after the conclusion of peace, in a more prosperous condition of the country and of the treasury, they have not hesitated to grant the full value. Viewing the subject in all its bearings ; taking into consideration the extraordinary merit of the achievement ; the delay which has taken place in granting compensation ; and the small number of persons engaged in the enterprise : it has seemed to the committee that one hundred thousand dollars would be a reasonable sum to be now granted to the captors of the Philadelphia. The only remaining point to be considered is, the proper distribution of that amount. On this branch of the subject, the committee have experienced some embarrassment. The case does not, in this respect, come within either the letter or the spirit of the prize act. That act provides for the distribution of the proceeds of vessels captured and condemned. Where vessels have been destroyed, the captors can only be compensated by virtue of special acts of Congress, and under such provisions as may be adapted to the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. The mode of distribution prescribed by the prize act, is most obviously applicable only to a full crew. In regulating the proportions of prize-money which the captain, a midshipman, and a common sailor should receive in a frigate of 44 guns, it is manifest that the calculation must be founded on the idea, that there would be a certain number of midshipmen, as well as of sailors, on board of such a ship : for, otherwise, if there were but one midshipman, for instance, he might receive more than his commander. From this view of the subject, it is clear that a rule of distribution properly applicable to a full crew, cannot be justly applied to a skeleton crew—filling up none of the classes arranged in the prize acts. The capture of a frigate of the largest class, by a lieutenant and 70 men, in a small ketch, is so out of the usual course, and so contrary to all reasonable calculation, that the very existence of such an extraordinary case seems to produce the necessity of providing a new rule for the case itself ; and, in the present instance, this can be the more readily done, as the proposed grant is not founded on the law, but, resting entirely on the liberality, may be regulated by the sound discretion, of Congress. After looking carefully into the subject, and consulting experienced naval officers, the committee could not discover any more equitable rule of distribution than that recommended by the Navy Commissioners, viz: that, after reserving for the commanding officer of the squadron one-twentieth of the whole sum, the residue be divided among the officers and men in the same relative proportions which each would receive if the crew of the Intrepid had consisted of the same number as that of the frigate Philadelphia at the time of her capture by the Tripolitans.

Mr. H., in conclusion, said, that the bill before the Senate was prepared in conformity with the views he had submitted to the Senate, and he expressed an earnest hope that the country would this day pay in part that debt of gratitude so justly due to the captors of the Philadelphia, and which had remained so long, not only unsatisfied, but almost unacknowledged.

Mr. ROBBINS rose and said, the claim for the capture and destruction of the frigate Philadelphia, in the harbor of Tripoli, so far as it is a claim upon the justice and policy of the country, depends upon the merits of the case ; and these again upon its circumstances and its consequences : and so far as it is a claim upon the legal obligation of the country, it depends upon the 5th section of the prize act, so called, passed the 23d April, 1800. I beg the indulgence of the Senate whilst I consider the claim upon both grounds ; pledging myself not to trespass upon that indulgence further than is necessary for a brief exposition of both.

It will be recollected that the United States' frigate Philadelphia, some time, I think, in 1803, unfortunately got aground on the Barbary Coast, and in consequence fell into the hands of those barbarians, then at hostilities with the United States. She was got off undamaged, and added to their maritime force, to be employed in their piracies against our commerce on those seas. The commander of our little squadron on that station deemed it very important to the interests of the United States, as in truth it was, that these barbarians should, if possible, be deprived of this frigate. But how was this possible ? She was now moored in the harbor of Tripoli ; she had a full complement of men kept on board ; her guns were all mounted and ready loaded ; she was close under the protection of all the guns of the castle and the principal battery ; and she was guarded on different quarters by armed vessels kept ready for action.

A young lieutenant in that little squadron, then in the early prime of manhood, then unknown to fame, but no longer to be so, conceived and planned an enterprise for the capture of this frigate ; and by means too of a mere handful of men, and a small drowsing vessel, called a ketch—when all more ostentatious, and seemingly more adequate, because more formidable, means must have failed. As he had conceived and suggested, so he prepared and led on in the execution of this daring and seemingly desperate enterprise ; foreseeing every peril of the attempt, and forewarned against every peril ; calculating means to ends, and seconding means by resolution, and a mind bent on its purpose, and adequate to its exigency, he accomplished the object ; an object deemed impossible by others, who measured its difficulties by their own powers to overcome them ; and possible to him only because he saw its possibility in his own great and daring mind.

This lieutenant, this then unfledged naval hero, was your Decatur—afterwards, and thenceforward, so distinguished in your naval history; so identified with the naval fame of his country, of which he makes so conspicuous a part: your Decatur—now, alas, no more! but in the moments of his naval achievements, and in name which can never die; a name which the muse of history will give to fame, as one of her elect, to live forever; as one of those precious few whom she redeems from that tide of oblivion which time is forever rolling on to bury beneath its waves the memory of the past.

He, in the guise, and under the disguise of a market droger, made his way to the side of that frigate, instantly boarded her, laid twenty of her men dead upon the deck, and drove all the rest overboard; some to escape in their boats, and some to perish in the sea; and was in complete possession of the ship, and might have brought her off to the squadron, but for the peremptory orders under which he acted, which were, to destroy her: yes, he might—for, after destroying her, he did escape in his market droger, unhurt, and without the loss of a man. In pursuance of his orders, he set fire to her in different parts, and waited till the fire broke out from all those parts, and had got the uncontrollable mastery of the ship; by which she was burnt down to the water's edge, and all of her that was above water was consumed in the flames.

The noise of this exploit resounded over Europe: it was spoken of and admired every where; the hero who performed it was no longer unknown to fame; he was the theme of conversation in every language, and the name of Decatur became associated in the minds of men with all that is chivalrous in human character.

This exploit, great in itself, and per se to the United States, was still much greater to them in its beneficial consequences. In the first place, it impressed those barbarians with that salutary terror which, from that moment, made them glad to be at peace with us, without exacting from us any tribute as its price. It struck at once from our national condition that onerous and disgraceful badge to which it had long been subjected. It was that salutary terror which laid the foundation of that treaty, which has secured that peace, and kept it inviolate to this day; and with it has secured the safety of our commerce, and our citizens, in those seas.

For when that same Decatur afterwards appeared upon that coast in hostile array, and made his own demands upon that power as the price of peace to her; and prescribed his own period for a compliance with those demands; and that the shortest period in which that compliance could be perfected; that power bowed itself before the terror of that name; signed the treaty offered by him, and literally as offered, without a moment's delay or hesitation; remarking, that "we must comply, for there is no knowing what that man may do, who, in the night, could come in a droger, and take and destroy a frigate in my harbor, and under the guns of my castle; yes, we must comply."

Here, too, was laid the foundation of the naval fame of our country: antecedently that fame did not exist. Here was kindled that spirit of emulation, which caught from breast to breast, and made or found in every commander a naval hero, ambitious to emulate, to excel, if possible, every competitor in that field of glory. It was the first in that series of brilliant achievements which subsequently followed to throw a glory around our navy, and to make it the object of our national pride; achievements numerous almost as the stars of that banner under which the battles were fought; and so brilliant and so rapid in succession, that their united lustre makes one halo of glory, which, like the galaxy of the starry heavens, dims the distinctive splendor of each particular star.

And let not this naval fame be considered merely as a garland, ornamental indeed to the nation, but of no substantial advantage. It is indeed the best of all our treasures; more than all our works of defence; more than all our treaties: it guaranties to us and our rights the respect of the world.

Such are the merits of this case; and the question put to the Senate is, Shall these merits go, as they hitherto have gone, unrewarded? If the appeal is made only to the justice and policy of the country—is it just that distinguished national services should not meet a national reward? Can it be policy to say to your national heroes who perform those services—if the paths of glory, which may lead you to the grave, should leave your families to want, we will not relieve them? But in my view of this case, that appeal is not necessary, for I cannot doubt the legal obligation of the country to satisfy this claim. The statutory provision which I referred to when I began, is in these words:

"The proceeds of all ships and vessels, and the goods taken on board of them, which shall be adjudged good prize, shall, when of equal or of superior force to the vessel or vessels making the capture, be the sole property of the captors."

Does this provision embrace this case? As I said before, I cannot doubt it. I begin, however, my interpretation, by admitting that the case does not come within the letter of the provision. For, the provision speaks of proceeds, importing a sale; this vessel was not sold: it speaks of adjudication as good prize; this vessel was not condemned. It is not, therefore, a case within the letter of the provision. But it is a case of the capture of a vessel of superior force—vastly superior—and therefore within the intention of the provision. The provision intended to reward extraordinary merit in the capture; and surely it is not material to that merit that the vessel was not either sold or condemned. It would be even ridiculous to suppose that the intention was to make the reward depend upon circumstances not material to the merit. Further: the object of the provision obviously was, to stimulate our Navy, not to rash, but to great undertakings, sustained by great efforts. What then becomes of the force of this stimulus, if you make the reward depend, not on the greatness of the undertaking, not on the greatness of the successful effort, but upon subsequent circumstances which may be accidental, and must be immaterial? If you do not entirely destroy, do you not very much impair the force of that stimulus? For who would go upon the "forlorn hope," the success only possible, and the failure certain death, if, after running the hazard, he may lose the fruits of his successful valor by a quibbling about the letter of the law, in opposition to its obvious intention and obvious object?

All this would apply, if the frigate had been destroyed, from the necessity of the thing, and on the judgment of the captors; and in that case would be a sufficient ground for claiming the indemnity. For this was the only ground in the case of the Guerriere, and of the Java, and of the Hermes, and of some others; in all which cases this ground was allowed to be sufficient, and indemnity was granted accordingly. But here the captured prize was destroyed by the express orders of the Government; for the order of their agent was their order, and the Commodore of the squadron was their agent; and his order to destroy was peremptory. How, then, can the Government allege that the prize was not condemned, when they themselves ordered it to be destroyed, and when it was destroyed in obedience to that order? How can the Government urge the letter of the provision as excluding the case, when its not being included within the letter was owing to their own act? Surely the Government is estopped from alleging, in order to defeat a claim, that that was not done which they themselves prevented from being done. And it is very evident, from the circumstances before mentioned, and from other circumstances, that, but for the order, the frigate might have been brought off. But whether she might or might not, that makes no difference in this, so long as the frigate was destroyed under that order, and in fulfilment of that order; and so long as the captors were restrained by that order from making the attempt to get off with their prize.

Again. The Government have disposed of this prize frigate as they thought best for the public interest; whether they judged well or ill in this disposition, is not material to this claim—they did dispose of it. They then have this property, which was the property of the captors, for they have controlled its disposition. How, then, can Government refuse to pay for this property, disposed of by them, which did not belong to them, but did belong to the captors? Suppose this frigate captured, but not destroyed nor condemned, and the Government had restored her on treaty or on ransom, or to redeem our citizens from captivity or bondage, Would Government have any pretence for saying the capture did not come within the letter of the provision, and that, therefore, the captors should not be indemnified for the captured property? Surely Government would have no pretence for saying this. In principle, this case is identical with those—for in both, the Government have disposed of the property belonging to the captors; and the mode of disposition, as I said before, is the affair of Government, and cannot be material to the claim of the captors. The Algerine frigate and brig, which afterwards were captured by our squadron, were restored to the Algerines, yet the captors were indemnified for the loss, and to the amount of the captured property.

I hold, then, that this is a case within the intention of this statutory provision; one within the object of this provision; and one in which the Government have precluded themselves from saying is not within the letter of the provision.

Mr. CHANDLER made some inquiries as to how far the rule to be established by this bill would extend? He supposed many other cases of the kind would be brought forward, and he wished to know to what extent Congress would be committed by this bill.

Mr. HAYNE replied that the committee who reported this bill knew of no other similar claim. He believed this case stood alone.

Mr. SEYMOUR said, that, being one of the committee by which the bill was reported, he wished to explain why he had differed from the chairman as to the sum to be appropriated. He thought, by the granting $50,000, the principle of the precedent upon which the bill was founded would be fully acted up to; and he thought it highly improper to legislate upon the individual merit of officers. In his opinion, the small number of individuals engaged in the exploit ought to be taken into consideration, in the sum to be granted. He intimated that, should the sum proposed be rejected, he would propose to fill the blank with $50,000.

Mr. HARRISON said, that the small number of the individuals engaged in a gallant exploit, would, with him, be rather a cause for increasing than decreasing the amount to be paid to them. The intention of the Government in giving prize money was to encourage the seamen; and, if a small vessel should conquer a large ship, their reward ought to be increased, because the action would be more perilous and intrepid. To reduce the proportion of prize money according to the number of the captors, was, he thought, against the principles of the Government.

Mr. SEYMOUR remarked that he had grounded his remarks on the precedents which had been consulted in framing the bill.

Mr. HAYNE said, that the difference between the Senator from Vermont and the committee, was, that he had taken from the various amounts to be found in the precedents to which he had alluded, the lowest sum mentioned. The committee had not taken the highest, but had chosen a medium. The award alluded to by the gentleman was made during the war, when the pressure of the times caused it to be placed at a low rate.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked that the gentleman from Vermont would find, by turning to the books, that, in cases where the disparity of the forces was great, the appropriation varied accordingly. If the very lowest sum to be found in the precedents were to be adopted, the interest since 1804 would make it double the amount. He hoped, therefore, that the blank might be filled with the sum proposed by the chairman.

The question being then taken on filling the blank with $100,000; it was agreed to.

Mr. HAYNE then moved to fill the remaining blanks with the following sums:

For the legal representatives of Commodore Preble, $5,000.

For Susan Decatur, legal representative of Stephen Decatur, of the first class of officers, $31,412.

For the second class of officers, (James Lawrence, Joseph Bainbridge, and Jonathan Thorn,) $12,564.

For the third class of officers, $14,958.

For the fourth class, $12,215.

For the fifth class, $11,074.

And for 43 seamen, $12,773.

The question was put upon the first of these sums, but was not taken—when

Mr. CHAMBERS rose, and said, that, before the question was taken, he would discharge a duty which had devolved upon him, by presenting a paper containing an extract from the journal of F. C. DeKrafft, a midshipman on board the Syren, who believed that the officers of the Syren had a claim to some share of the sum awarded to those who took part in this gallant achievement. Mr. C. thought, as far as that paper was an evidence, the crew of the Syren shared the common danger, and were therefore entitled to a portion of the reward.

[Mr. C. here handed the paper to the Clerk, who read it. The journal stated that the Syren took a position without the harbor of Tripoli, within a mile of the fort, at the time Lieutenant Decatur entered with the Intrepid; that a signal was received from the Intrepid, and answered by the Syren, and that two boats fully manned, were despatched by the latter to reinforce the Intrepid.]

Mr. CHAMBERS continued his remarks. He found, by the prize act, that individuals composing the crews of vessels in sight when a prize is taken, were entitled to a share of the prize money. It was not exactly the provisions of the prize act that entitled these individuals to a share of the sum to be given.

He understood that the money was given to encourage the spirit that leads to such exploits. If so, all who partook of the peril should share the reward. It might be said that the individuals named in the bill were not aided by the crew of the Syren. He thought it would prove otherwise. The Syren was so situated as to have given assistance if needed. She was within a short distance of the fort; she did send off men to reinforce the Intrepid, and received and answered a signal from Lieutenant Decatur. The person who had handed him [Mr. C.] this paper, was a resident in the District of Columbia; and, therefore, to obtain information on his claim, he would move to recommit the bill, assuring the chairman of the committee that his design was not to obstruct its progress. Had he thought, that, by making this motion, he should have caused any delay of the bill, he would not have made it. The evidence in this matter was at hand, and a decision could be speedily obtained. He then moved that the bill be recommitted to the committee who reported it, together with the paper purporting to be an extract from the journal of F. C. DeKrafft, with instructions to examine the claims of the officers and crew of the brig Syren to share the sum granted by the first section of the bill.

Mr. HAYNE said, that it was somewhat extraordinary that this claim had never been heard of before. The subject of this bill had been a matter of discussion for two or three years. It had been before the public, and had formed a topic of some interest in the public newspapers during all that time; yet the author of the journal, an extract of which was now before the Senate, had never until now put forth his claim. The commander of the Syren, Commodore Stewart, had never set up any claim for himself or his crew—and such a claim had never been thought of until this late period. He would, therefore, put it to the Senate, whether it was fair or just for an individual to step in at so critical a juncture to retard the progress of the bill. It had been under the examination of the committee at an early stage of the session; had been reported in due season; and had now been for three weeks before the Senate, waiting its turn for consideration. He [Mr. H.] had even been so particular in bringing it before their notice, that he notified the Senate previously, of the time at which he intended to call it up; and now, after all these preliminaries, just at the time when they were about to reap the fruits of their labors, and secure to that gallant crew the reward they so richly merited, an unknown claimant comes before the Senate, and asks us to forego the prospect of carrying the bill through this session. For, said Mr. H., if it is recommitted, there is scarcely a hope that it can pass in time to be acted upon by the other House. If the claim now put forth deserved to be acted upon at all, it ought to go to the other House, instead of obstructing the progress of the bill in this. But he had another objection to the claim, if claim it could be called. The paper which had just been read, was accompanied with no testimony. It consisted of nothing but loose memoranda. It proved nothing; whereas there was ample proof to show its unimportance. There was sufficient proof that the Syren did not aid in the exploit of burning the Philadelphia—that she was not even ordered to do so. The official statement of Commodore Preble amply proved the fact. He says that the Syren was ordered to support Lieutenant Decatur, and cover his retreat, but could not get into the harbor. Decatur, also, in his despatches, says that the Syren obtained a position without the harbor, to cover and defend his retreat. The fact was further established by that part of Commodore Preble's official report, in which he speaks of Lieutenant Stewart; and, as if with a desire to console that officer for the misfortune of not having been able to join in the enterprise, he remarks that it was an exploit in which but few could be engaged, and praises the alacrity with which he performed the services within his power. He also goes on to say, that, if Decatur had waited half an hour for assistance from the Syren, the enterprise must have failed. But what was the conduct of Commodore Stewart? Did he ever claim any part of the glory of the achievement? Never. Instead of attributing to himself any part of the glory of that act, he has always, with the generosity which is always found among brave men, extolled the conduct of Decatur, and given to him the entire glory of that brilliant action. Commodore Stewart on that occasion displayed a disinterestedness that redounds to his immortal honor. He was the senior officer of Decatur—yet, far from entertaining jealousy towards him, he allowed Decatur to take the command, and willingly acted under him. He always was, and is to this day, enthusiastic in his praises of Decatur's valor. And Stewart and Chauncey, although the Seniors of Decatur, allowed him to go over their heads in promotion to the rank of post captain.

Such is the generous spirit that characterizes our Navy. He hoped the motion to recommit would not be sustained.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that he did not pretend to decide upon the merits of the claim of the officers of the Syren. He had merely put forward a statement which he hoped would be examined. The testimony in relation to it was within half an hour's walk of the Committee room, and he hoped that it might be inquired into. He did not, farther than this, pretend to enforce the claims of the applicant. As to the belief of the chairman, that the Syren was not employed in the service of burning the Philadelphia, he [Mr. C.] thought all the evidence in favor of the supposition that she was so employed. The Syren was ordered to accompany the Intrepid, and aid in the enterprise. She did so, and took a position to support Decatur, and cover his retreat; and, if the crew of the Syren shared the danger, they ought to share the reward. It was as necessary for Decatur to have the means of escape as the means of entering the harbor; and if for this purpose the brig was placed in a position of danger, she aided in the achievement. How far her crew were entitled to reward, Mr. C. did not know, but thought it ought to be examined. He had been told by the gentleman from South Carolina, that Commodore Stewart always spoke of Decatur as the individual who performed this deed. He never supposed the claims of the Syren detracted from the merit of Decatur. It was a forced inference from any thing that had fallen from him. It was, he believed, the last object of the individual who presented this paper, to detract from the merits of Decatur. He merely wished the facts of his claim looked into; and he [Mr. C.] was convinced that it would not at all delay the progress of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON said, it was a bad precedent to allow a claim so long subsequent to the action which created it, founded on a statement by a junior officer, in direct opposition to the report made by the commanding officer, who certainly ought to know the object of the movements which were made by his orders. The situation of the Syren was such that she gave, nor could have given, Decatur no kind of aid in the capture. He hoped the Senate would not allow the examination of a claim which would go to contradict an official report which had been for so many years uncontradicted, and which was founded on the best evidence.

Mr. TAZEWELL observed, that, if there could be shewn any practical object in the recommitment, he should not be opposed to it. But he thought he could shew the best of reasons, from the journal itself, why it ought not to be acted upon. How does it stand? This bill has been for several years before this and the other House. It has been fully discussed in and out of Congress. The witnesses that have been called are of the most distinguished character: for instance, Commodore Stewart, who commanded the brig Syren. No claim was ever set up by him or his officers or crew, for the twenty-three years that have intervened since that action. But now, on the 7th of February, 1828, there comes forth a statement on oath, on which the ink is scarcely dry, to establish a claim on the part of the officers of the Syren. The applicant has held back until this moment, and, when the blank is just filling, claims his share of the appropriation. I differ, said Mr. T. from the gentleman from Ohio, not in opinion, but in the manner in which he states it. I do not call this applicant a junior officer, but a young gentleman, writing a journal for his own amusement; and it is not wonderful that he should differ from his commanding officer as to the kind of service on which the vessel to which he is attached is despatched. We know that every young officer differs in opinion with his commander, for the very reason that the former knows nothing, the latter knows all about the matter. If any gentleman who has the least knowledge of nautical affairs will look at this journal, he will be convinced that the writer makes erroneous conclusions. Here it is stated, first one sail is set, then another. One tack is first taken; then it is changed: now she runs in upon the shore, where the water is shallow, and then she runs out again into 35 fathoms. Will any man say to me that she meant to fight? Any one knows better. If she did intend to fight, would she be shooting about in the manner here described? If fighting was her object, why did not she go straight forward? The same wind that carried one vessel into the harbor, would have carried in the other. The truth was, that the young journalist knew nothing of the matter. He formed his conjectures; but they are little worth. He was not consulted by his commander. He was not told why one sail was shifted now, and another afterwards. His business was to mind his duty, and obey orders. What was the real case? Several weeks previous to the burning of the Philadelphia, the plan had been conceived by Decatur, who communicated his project to Commodore Preble, and exacted from him a promise that the enterprise should be entrusted to no other officer. How then could Preble refuse to allow Decatur to prosecute his enterprise? He was bound in honor to grant his permission. For he who had planned was entitled to the privilege of executing. He therefore manned a small, worthless vessel—I say worthless, said Mr. T., for I assisted afterwards to condemn her. She had been captured for attempting to violate the blockade of Tripoli. In this vessel, with four carronades as her armament, he entered the harbor in the night. As to the vessel, she was not cared for. If she was burnt, nothing would be lost. But to bring off the gallant crew was the object; and for this the Syren was ordered to cover and assist in their escape. The time will come, said Mr. T., when the true character of Decatur will be known and appreciated by his country—when the unequalled gallantry of his achievements will receive its meed of renown. No man was more deliberate in his conduct than Decatur. In carrying into effect this most daring project, he was directed by the coolest judgment. There was nothing rash in his conduct, although nothing could exceed his intrepidity. He knew that he should be carried into the harbor by the wind; but that the same wind that carried him in, would prevent his coming out; and that for his escape he must depend upon his boats. But, sir, said Mr. T., there was in this event a memorable circumstance. That Providence which has so often seemingly interposed to direct the destiny of our country, ordained that, at the very moment when the flames were enveloping every part of the Philadelphia, and when the batteries had opened a tremendous fire upon the Intrepid, the wind changed, and she came out of the harbor with swelling sails. All the circumstances of the enterprise were previously communicated to Preble. He knew the tenfold perils to which it would expose the hero who planned it, and those who accompanied him. And would he have allowed those seventy gallant men to go alone from Syracuse to Tripoli, on so hazardous an exploit, without some force to aid them in their escape? Would he expose those heroes to perish for want of assistance? If he had done it, he would have deserved to be shot: therefore, he assigned to the Syren to accompany the Intrepid—not to fight, but to cover her retreat—to pick up the boats as they came out of the harbor, and save them from a pursuing enemy. Commodore Stewart performed the part allotted to him with judgment and promptitude; and he deserved the praise which he received for his conduct. Such is the account given by Decatur, and such is the account given by Commodore Preble. But here is the account of the affair by a young man, whose only misfortune was, that he did not understand his commander's intentions, which would give an entirely different view of the matter. By a reference to the official accounts, it will be found that they had waited seven days for that kind of wind that would enable them to enter the harbor. And when it occurred, the Intrepid sailed in, and the Syren waited without, in accordance with her orders. Her crew afterwards saw the flames from the Philadelphia; and, shortly after, the Intrepid sailed out of the harbor, so that the aid of the Syren, in picking up the boats, was not required, as was anticipated. But, if you look at your prize law, you will perceive that, to be entitled to a share of the prize money, a vessel must be in sight of the action. Now, the Syren was not in sight. She was outside of the harbor, as the journal states, in 35 fathoms of water. The principle is, that if, by being in sight, a vessel gives to another, if not actual, potential assistance, her crew is entitled to a share of the proceeds of the prize. For instance, if a sloop of war sees another sloop of war approaching her, and also within sight of a seventy-four gun ship, she will run—she ought to run—not from the sloop of war, but from a superior force that may be brought against her. If she is taken, the prize money is distributed to the two vessels—to the one for capturing—to the other for the potential aid given in the contest. But it does not apply to this case, nor, indeed, to night attacks in general. The Syren rendered no aid, whether potential or actual, in burning the Philadelphia. Her only office was to protect the crew of the Intrepid in their retreat from the harbor. But, in cases where being in sight gives a title, to what does it give a title? Why, to a share of the proceeds of the captured vessel. Such is the provision of the prize act. Here, however, is a new case. Here are no proceeds, nor does the case come within the scope of the prize act, and, therefore, the crew of the Syren have no kind of claim. That the officers and crew of the Syren did their duty had already been admitted. But that duty was not to take any share in the exploit which was entrusted to Lieutenant Decatur. The application, therefore, now made, could not be sustained; and he trusted the Senate would reject the motion to recommit.

Mr. CHAMBERS said that he had presented the statement of Mr. DeKrafft in pursuance of his duty, and he now rose to defend him from the animadversions of the gentleman from Virginia. He could not see in that paper any cause for the remarks of that gentleman. The remark that this journal was the language of a young gentleman who did not know as much as his commanding officer, and yet undertook to contradict him, seemed quite gratuitous.

[Mr. TAZEWELL rose to explain. He said no such thing. He said that this young man might be correct in his statement; but did not know the motives of his commanding officer.]

Mr. CHAMBERS resumed. I stand corrected. The gentleman admits that the young gentleman's account agreed with that of his commander; but his inferences were incorrect, because he did not know as much as his superior officer. Now, sir, let us see what proof we have that the Syren took a position to aid Decatur in his attack on the Philadelphia—there is the fact, not denied, that Decatur sent for a reinforcement; and the order of Commodore Preble to Decatur, that he "would proceed in company with the Syren, which would assist with her boats and crew, and would cover his retreat." The gentleman had asked why, if the Syren was associated in the expedition, she was not in the harbor? And Mr. C. supposed he intended to imply that she was not associated with the Intrepid. The answer to that question is not to be given gratuitously by me; but is to be found in the official report. The Commodore there says, that the Syren, not being able to enter the harbor, anchored at some distance from it, and was thus not able to render so efficient service as she would otherwise have done. But does he neglect the fact that assistance was given? No. He only remarks, that it was not as efficient as it might otherwise have been, and as was intended. Decatur, in his statement, also says, that the Syren gained a station without the harbor. The opposition which the document presented by me has met with, has induced me to make use of the materials which I have at hand to support the claims of the officers of the Syren. I maintain that they were detailed upon that expedition, and that they did render the service required to the utmost of their ability. But we are asked why they have delayed to bring forward their claim? And why, at this late moment, it is pressed? I speak, said Mr. C. from the information of the same gentleman who handed me the statement, when I say that when the bill was first brought before the other House rendering compensation to the heirs of Preble, the officers of the Syren did apply. But there may be difficulties in the way of this claim. Capt. Stewart, who commanded the Syren, makes no claim, and it may be that he wishes those who served under him should not. It is not for me to inquire into his motives, or those of the other officers. If their claim, as appeared to Mr. C. was good, it was a display of modesty and forbearance which was highly creditable. This was not the question before the Senate. They were now to consider the claims of this man, and he certainly was entitled to a hearing. I am informed by a person, now in the Senate Chamber, that the facts stated in this journal, are the same as those entered in the log book of the Syren. The facts are accessible, as they are to be obtained within the limits of the District of Columbia. And all that is asked is a delay sufficient to investigate the merits of the claim.

Captors of the Philadelphia.

We are also told, said Mr. C. that the claims of the officers of the Syren do not come within the prize act. Well, sir, suppose they do not. I say also that the prize act does not authorize the payment of the heirs of Decatur, or the crew of the Intrepid. The bill is founded on a kind of analogy. The case is not admitted under the prize act, but it bears so close a resemblance to those that do, and exhibits a species of claim so similar to those which come under that act, that justice seems to reason strongly on its side. Those who have achieved daring acts, and destroyed the property of an enemy, are, on such a principle, deemed worthy of reward. It has been questioned whether the Syren was in sight or not. But there seems no cause for that doubt, as signals were made and answered by the Intrepid and the Syren.

These explanations, said Mr. C. I have made to show that there are circumstances, which can be brought before the committee, and which are within their reach, which give good reason to look upon the claim of the officers of the Syren, as probable at least. He would not have advocated this application, had he believed that it would delay or seriously obstruct the bill. But that could not be, as the witness was now on the spot ready to be examined. The consumption of time could be but inconsiderable, and in a few hours the Committee would be able to report upon the application. Neither did he think that the fact that these meritorious officers had declined, for twenty years, to bring forward their claim, ought in the least to affect the question, which related alone to the merits of the case. He, therefore, could not but desire that the paper might be referred to the Committee.

Mr. VAN BUREN was not pleased with the time which had been chosen for presenting this document. But the statement itself was a very lame one, and he thought failed to sustain the claim of its author. In the first place, it did not appear by whom this statement was sworn to. And then, the grounds on which the co-operation of the Syren was sustained, were very slight. The gentleman supposes that a signal for reinforcements proves this fact. But the signals, it is said, were exchanged at half past ten, and the boats were not sent off until some time after; nor does it appear that they were sent off in consequence of the signal. At half past midnight, he goes on to state that the boats of the brig, and of the Intrepid, appeared, and were received with three cheers—so that it is clear that the reinforcement did not assist Decatur in destroying the ship. They were probably sent off to pick up the crew of the Intrepid. The paper came before the Senate without any name attached to it, and without any satisfactory proof of its validity. He hoped no time would be wasted in its consideration.

Mr. COBB could not, readily, see why gentlemen opposed so strenuously the re-committal of the bill. No delay was proposed which could prejudice the bill. Time was merely asked, to allow an inquiry whether the officers and crew of the Syren were not entitled to a share of the sum to be given to the participants in the destruction of the Philadelphia. Gentlemen wish to reject the application without any inquiry. Now I am not so certain that this claim is not a valid one. Commodore Preble tells Decatur that the Syren will accompany and sustain him with her boats, and will cover his retreat. It is proved that the boats were dispatched, and, if so, what was it done for, but to support the enterprise, and aid in its completion? The Syren was not there, as had been represented by the gentleman from Virginia, to sail about the harbor, but to fulfil the orders of Commodore Preble. He did not know whether, in similar cases, persons so engaged had or had not a claim to consideration, or whether they came under the prize act. The gentlemen who opposed this statement did not state that, in all the particular prize acts, there was no such precedent. Let us have the facts, and let the Committee, who understand the matter, report upon them. Commodore Stewart was now in the city, and all the circumstances could easily be ascertained. He would make one additional remark. It appeared to him that the Senate was hurrying this bill too fast. The event happened twenty-three years ago. Decatur never asked for compensation, and his legal representatives did not present their claim until several years after his death. And now they were hurrying this bill through the Senate with a despatch, which was, at least, uncommon. They would not even allow of sufficient delay to inquire whether there were not other equally meritorious claimants. He thought the Committee ought to inquire whether these men, especially the crews of the boats, were not entitled to share in the compensation. Let us have their views on the subject. He would have moved to lay the bill on the table, but would not interfere in the course taken by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HAYNE said that the Committee had been charged, by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, with hurrying this bill through the Senate. In reply, he would observe, that the bill was reported six weeks since, and that it had laid upon the table during the whole of that time—and that he had given notice, several days since, that he should move to take it up—and had been prevented from doing so, from time to time, by the interposition of other business. And now, after this subject has been repeatedly delayed, they were asked to prolong it, because a paper, of the very lightest kind, that had ever been presented to a legislative body, carrying with it no semblance of evidence, was thrust in its way. And the gentleman from Georgia thinks the bill is urged with ominous haste, because we are not willing to accede to this proposition. Who, I would ask, is Mr. De Krafft, for whom we are to stay the action of the Senate on this matter? Had he a plain and sustainable claim, would he not have presented it before—when this bill has been two years before Congress? Such a precedent would be a bad one, and would lead to an endless protraction of business. The Senate ought not to consent to the re-committal; and, for myself, I will never consent to it. But, said Mr. H., suppose all the allegations in this worthless paper to be true—I will read it, to show that it does not establish any thing. What does it tell you?

[Mr. H. here read the statement.]

The Syren arrives at the harbor, and sends off what he calls reinforcements—that is, two boats' crews of men. And what did they do? Did they aid in the fight? No. They merely did what they were ordered to do. They aided in the escape, or, rather, guarded the escape of the victors. And now that I look more closely into the papers, it appears that the two vessels were despatched for entirely distinct purposes—the Intrepid to burn the Philadelphia, and the Syren to cover the retreat of the Intrepid's crew. I hold in my hand, said Mr. H., the despatch of Decatur, than whom a more disinterested being never breathed. And does he say that he received any aid from the Syren? No. He says that the boats of the Syren covered his retreat, and in no other part does he mention her. And, had he received assistance from the Syren, would he not have admitted it? Nay, more. When he returned home, he was required to give a list of the officers and sailors who partook in the enterprise of burning the Philadelphia. He did so—but he did not give the name of a single officer or sailor belonging to the Syren. Here, also, is the despatch of Commodore Preble. He declares that this gallant action was achieved by Lieutenant Decatur and the crew of the Intrepid. He performed the deed alone, and to him and his associates belonged the renown and the reward. Had he waited another half hour, for aid from the boats of the Syren, he would have failed in the expedition. The boats sent off, as mentioned in this statement, were intended to cover his retreat—in that they performed their part. But it gave the crew of the Syren no share in the enterprise. He would ask, in conclusion, if gentlemen could believe that any man, who was not in the Intrepid, was entitled to come in and receive a share of the compensation awarded to the gallant seamen who withstood the perils and achieved the glory of that action alone? As a Senator, standing in his place, he protested that he could not conceive how the least shadow of right could be assumed for delaying the bill a moment on such grounds as the flimsy statement in question offered.

Mr. CHANDLER could not look upon this subject in the same light as it was viewed by the Chairman of the Naval Committee. It was said that the boats of the Syren gave no aid to Decatur. That might be: but, supposing the action had been protracted, would they not have rendered their aid? Besides, he could not think that they rendered no assistance. They certainly covered the retreat of the crew of the Intrepid, which was all, perhaps, that the circumstances would admit. As to the reason why they had not applied until this time, he believed it was because they thought, with Decatur himself, that they had no claim. But, seeing that the bill might probably pass, they come in for their share.

Mr. VAN BUREN remarked, that a list was reported of the officers and sailors engaged in this brilliant action, in order that they might receive double pay—and not an individual belonging to the Syren had been mentioned in that list. Now, can it be tolerated, that, at this late day, the officers and seamen of any other vessel than the Intrepid shall be allowed to step in and share the glory and the reward of these brave men? The proposition was, he thought, in the highest degree offensive.

Mr. CHANDLER thanked the gentleman from New York for having given him some knowledge which he did not before possess. It now appeared to him that the Government settled the whole affair at the time, and, therefore, Congress need do no more about it.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that the officers refused to receive the double pay. The sailors did receive it. But it was given by the Department, and Congress had nothing to do with it.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed that the paper had been handed to him this morning, and he had not at first perceived that the name of the applicant was not subscribed to it.

Mr. NOBLE asked the yeas and nays on the question; which call being sustained, the motion to re-commit was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Berrien, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Eaton, Knight, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Thomas, Tyler, Williams—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Boulogny, Branch, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Parris, Robbins, Rowan, Ridgely, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Willey, Woodbury—30.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HAYNE, for filling the several blanks of the bill, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, offered the following proviso to the bill—which was agreed to:

Provided, That the Accounting Officers shall in no instance pay over any portion of the moneys herein appropriated to any other person or persons whomsoever, the distributive share due to the proper persons herein provided for, to any other person or persons whomsoever, than to him, her, or them, for whom it is appropriated, or to his, her, or their legal representative or representatives, first fully ascertained to be such by the said accounting officers. Nor shall any contract, bargain, or sale, of any such distributive share to any other person or persons be in any wise obligatory on the vender, but shall be held to be null and void, to all intents and purposes.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1828.

CASE OF ABRAHAM OGDEN.

The general orders of the day then occurring, the bill for the relief of Abraham Ogden and others, was read.

The report of the Committee of Commerce on this bill, was read, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked, that a motion had formerly been made to fill the blank in this bill with the sum of one thousand dollars. At that time he had stated that the difference of opinion in the Committee arose upon the question whether the whole time of the demurrage ought to be paid, or only that part of the delay which was caused by the United States' Agent. The majority were in favor of paying only for the delay caused by the Agent of the United States.

Mr. FOOT remarked, that, before the petitioner can be entitled to the relief proposed by this bill, it is incumbent on them to prove that the loss has been occasioned by some act or negligence of the Government, or its agents; and that there has been no fault or negligence on their own part; and further that the claim might be enforced against an individual, either in a Court of law or equity. The report of the committee did not satisfy my mind, [said Mr. F.] that the petitioners were entitled to such relief; and the explanation of the Chairman created still greater doubts. The committee have very correctly decided that the petitioners can have no claim on the Government for the loss of the vessel; and they reject the claim on the ground that the petitioners have not used due diligence and care to avoid the loss, because they say this loss might have been prevented by insurance. But, Sir, the ground on which the committee found the right of the petitioners to the relief proposed by the bill, is, to my mind, far more objectionable. It is on a contingency, against which the petitioners might have guarded with much more care, and without any expenae or trouble, merely by inserting in the charter party of affreightment, a provision for a certain number of lay days, and fixing a rate of demurrage for any detention beyond the number of lay days agreed on. It also appears, by the explanation of the Chairman, that the Committee have allowed twelve years interest on this claim—so extremely doubtful in its character, that the petitioners did not present it, and, I venture to say, never would have presented it, but for the fact of Congress having made an allowance for a claim supposed to be somewhat analogous. This allowance of interest on claims, I believe, has never been recognised by the Government, and is wholly untenable. A plain statement of the facts in this case, in my opinion, would convince the Senator that this claim ought not to be allowed. It appears that the United States, by their agent in New York, contracted with the petitioners for the freight of a quantity of provisions to the port of Laguaira, at a rate of freight agreed upon, and paid before the vessel sailed. Here, Sir, is an important distinction, and which the committee appear not to have noticed. The United States were mere freighters of part of the cargo only; for it is evident the petitioners had some cargo on board, which sold for fourteen hundred dollars, as appears from the account of sales among the papers. Of course the United States were not the charterers, nor were they insurers, of the vessel, and therefore not liable for the loss. The petitioners insured the vessel to the port of Laguaira only. On her arrival, it appears, from the petitioners' own shewing, that there was an embargo on all vessels in the port, which continued until the arrival of the Spanish army, and the seizure of the vessel. This embargo caused the detention and loss of the vessel; it was not the act of this Government or its agent, but a municipal regulation of that country, of which we had no right to complain, but which the petitioners should have guarded against by insurance. In the protest of the captain we find no complaint of detention by the agent. The captain states explicitly, "that, not considering his vessel in any kind of danger, he took no steps to despatch her until the arrival of the Spanish army." On this plain statement of facts, I ask, on what foundation does this claim rest? Was the vessel detained by the agent? There is no proof of this fact. The petitioners make no such claim. Suppose the freight had been discharged in four days, would this have prevented the loss? No: Besides, it does not appear that the captain wished the freight taken out; for, if it had been, he must have procured ballast for the vessel; as no prudent man would leave his vessel stark light in that country at that season. It is very apparent the captain managed the landing of this freight at his own discretion; occasionally loading, as he could procure his return cargo, to keep his vessel in ballast trim.

But, Sir, we are told by the Chairman, that a precedent has been established in the case of Forrest, &c. which ought to govern in this case. Although I am not disposed to admit the omnipotence of precedent in all cases, yet, in the examination of that case, it will be found that there is no analogy between the two cases, in the most important, and indeed the only material points in the case. In the first place, it appears in the case of Forrest et al. that the agent was solicited, day after day, to receive the freight, because the captain had engaged a return cargo, which he was anxious to get on board; and that, in consequence of the neglect or refusal of the agent to receive the freight, he lost the chance of procuring a return cargo. In the second place, it does not appear that the vessel was detained by an embargo, but that the loss was sustained wholly through the negligence of the United States' agent. In the third place, it does not appear that there was any other cargo on board, except the shipment by the United States. From this comparison of the cases, it is evident that the case of Forrest forms no precedent for this case. It must stand on its own merits; and if I have succeeded in showing it has no solid foundation on its own merits I trust this bill will be rejected.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that the general principle was, that, unless there was a stipulation entered into by the charter party, the party freighting the vessel was liable to discharge her. The vessel was fully freighted by the United States; and it had been decided by Judge Johnson that, if a vessel were detained by the United States, they were liable. It appeared by the papers, that the delay was caused by the United States, as the vessel would have been discharged, had it not been detained by Mr. Lowrie, the United States' Agent: and the reason why he detained her, was, that the city had been destroyed by an earthquake. As to the embargo, it was laid after the arrival of the vessel, which was not detained at Laguaira for the purpose of taking in her return cargo, but on account of the difficulty in discharging—although, as fast as the cargo was discharged, the return cargo was taken in, so as to prevent the vessel from becoming light, which would have been injurious to her. As to the embargo, it appeared that it was laid after the vessel arrived. There was no difference in this head. The only question was, whether, if this vessel was detained by the United States' Agent for 20 or 30 days, and lost her voyage in consequence, the Government ought not to pay the demurrage, and at least compensate for the delay. It was not asked that the Government should pay for the vessel, which was lost on account of this delay. The voyage, it would be recollected, was a voyage of charity, and it would certainly be hard to make our own citizens suffer from a fault not their own. The case of Forrest was a similar one to this. His loss was caused by being detained by the Agent of the Government; and such was the case in this instance. The loss suffered by Forrest had been paid by Congress, after much discussion; and this was a case equally entitled to be remunerated.

Mr. FOOT said, that, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire, in relation to the embargo, he would refer to the memorial of the applicant, by which it appeared, that the embargo was laid previous to the arrival of the vessel. As to the freight, he was still confident that the vessel was not freighted entirely by the United States. In support of this opinion, he would observe, that, among the papers, was a bill of sale of various articles, which surely made no part of the freight of the United States on board. Whether the delay was occasioned by the United States' agent, was doubtful, as it was not certain that the captain importuned the agent to discharge his vessel. No evidence of the fact appeared among the papers. In the case of Forrest it was different. He applied continually to the agent, urging him to discharge the vessel. He alluded to the protest of the captain, to show that the embargo was laid previous to his arrival; and, therefore, it was not competent to him to deny in his affidavit a statement made in his protest.

Mr. WOODBURY observed, that the vessel arrived at Laguaira in June, and in July a change took place in the Government, and the embargo was laid. Besides, the petitioners state that Mr. Lowrie, the agent, was frequently called on by the captain, and urged to expedite the discharge of the vessel. Whether the schooner was fully freighted by the United States, he did not know; but he presumed it was.

The question being taken on filling the blank in the bill with the sum of one thousand dollars, it was agreed to.

The question on engrossing the bill then occurring, the yeas and nays were called for by Mr. WOODBURY, and the call having been sustained:

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, inquired whether there was evidence, that any part of the cargo belonged to the owner. It was clear, that, if a part of the cargo was the property of the owner, he ought to bear part of the demurrage.

Mr. FOOT observed, that he had adverted to the sales of articles not belonging to the United States. He had since referred to the documents, and found that the amount of the sales was $1,300.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that those sales were chiefly of articles taken in as a return cargo, with the exception of the stores of the vessel, and not part of the cargo carried out.

[At the request of Mr. FOOT, the account of sales was then read, and comprised a variety of articles, such as beef, pork, cheese, hog's lard, etc.]

Mr. WOODBURY said, that unquestionably all the articles, excepting the provisions, were taken in at Lagaira. It would be recollected that the vessel was broken up there; and consequently all her provisions and stores were sold. They comprised all but a few of the articles named in the account of sales, and those few were part of the return cargo.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that this bill had been twice before the Senate, and had each time been favorably reported upon by the Committee on Commerce. The amount only of the compensation has formerly been disagreed upon. The amount now proposed, was the lowest estimate that had been mentioned. Whether the principles by which the other House decided claims like this, were applicable to the Senate, he did not know. But the House of Representatives had, he was informed, given a decision in favor of two claims, exactly similar to this.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana said, that this claim had been examined last year in the Committee on Commerce, and the facts appeared to be these. The vessel in question was engaged by the United States to carry out provisions to the distressed inhabitants of Lagaira, where an earthquake had caused great suffering. The harbor of Lagaira is such, that vessels are not able to approach the port; but are discharged at a distance by the means of lighters. On the arrival of the vessel there, the captain was obliged to keep his cargo on board, and discharge it as he could—and as he discharged, to keep his vessel in proper trim; he also took in his return cargo. While thus waiting to discharge his freight, a change in the Government took place, and the Royalists took possession of the vessel, supposing that the provisions on board were intended to supply the patriots. After holding her a considerable time, she was given up. The chief cause of her seizure, was the fact of her having no papers, as the Spanish authorities could not give papers to a Patriot port. The vessel was seized, because the United States' agent could not discharge the cargo; and in consequence of the seizure and detention, she was entirely lost, being condemned as unseaworthy. The applicants came to the Senate, to be remunerated for their loss. In the Committee, the question had been discussed, as to whose duty it was to discharge the cargo—and it was stated by a gentleman of great commercial experience, that it was an universal rule that, in ports where it was necessary to discharge the cargo by the means of lighters, the discharge was the duty of the consignee. The captain was not, in such cases, required to land his cargo on the wharf, because it was out of his power to do so. The agent of the United States at Lagaira, in this case, could not, and did not, provide lighters for the purpose, and, in consequence of the delay, the vessel was seized, condemned, and finally lost. The question now was, whether the United States would give one thousand dollars, to remunerate the owner for the detention. It was thought that the principle which applied to a case between two individuals, was equally applicable to one between the Government and an individual. Suppose, said Mr. J. two persons enter into a contract, by which one of them is to carry a cargo to a certain port, there to be at the disposal of the other party. If the consignee in this case refuses to receive the freight, or neglects it in such a manner that the owner of the vessel suffers injury from detention, the consignee is liable for the demurrage. If what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Foot] says be true, that part of the cargo belonged to the owner of the vessel, it formed another case. But he, [Mr. J.] never heard that any part of the cargo belonged to any other individual; if it did, that individual ought to pay his proper share of the demurrage. If he owned one third of the cargo, one third of the demurrage ought to be paid by him, and in that ratio. The principle on which this bill was framed, was the same as that in the claim of Forrest, and he could see no difference between the two cases.

Mr. CHANDLER said that the Government had often done what ought not to have been done, and this appeared to present one of the instances. He did not know by what authority the Government had, in the first place, taken the money of the People to carry it abroad for the benefit of foreigners. It appeared, however, that they did do so. The intervention of hostilities had caused the loss of the vessel. It appeared that there was other cargo on board than that belonging to the United States, and he could see no reason under Heaven, why the Government should pay more than a share of the loss.

Mr. FOOT asked an explanation of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. Johnston] of one remark made by him. He had, in speaking of the sale, said, "if the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut be true." I, said Mr. Foot, in making that statement, referred to the documents themselves, and I wish to know whether the gentleman questions the fact?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana said, by no means. The gentleman from New Hampshire had expressed a doubt whether the goods sold were part of the cargo carried to Lagaira; and upon that doubt he, [Mr. J.] had grounded the hypothetical remark, as to the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut. The Senator from Maine had taken a wrong view of the case. The damage done to the vessel was caused by her detention by the United States' agent. The detention after the seizure, was of a different nature from that previous to that event, although all the detention, even after that, was consequential upon that caused primarily by the Agent.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he did not think it necessary to explain the circumstances of the case, after what had been said by the gentleman from New Hampshire. He would, however, remark, that a claim put in in the case of Forrest, of exactly similar character, had been formerly allowed. If the Senate rejected this bill, it would be a declaration that they had one rule for Forrest and another for Ogden.

Mr. FOOT called the attention of the Senator from New York to the difference in the testimony in the two cases. In that of Forrest it was proved that the captain called on the Agent every day, requesting him to discharge his vessel, and by his own neglect was prevented from obtaining a return cargo. While the proof in this does not shew any such application, or that the delay was caused by the Agent: for the captain allows that there was an embargo. In the case of Forrest there was none. The captain also states in his protest, that, considering his vessel safe, he did not take steps to secure her, until the arrival of the army. Shewing that, until his vessel was seized, he did not consider the delay at all important.

Mr. WOODBURY said that the protest of the captain was made in regard to the loss of the whole vessel. But in the affidavit of the captain, he declares that Mr. Lowrie was repeatedly called on and would not discharge the vessel. All the articles named in the list of articles sold would be found to be, with one or two trifling exceptions, the stores taken on board for the use of the crew. It appeared, therefore, that the vessel was entirely freighted by the United States, and her loss occasioned by the act of the Agent of the Government.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, would say but a few words. This case was exactly similar to that of Forrest, in which he had formerly some agency. It was twice rejected, and at length the demand was granted. In that instance reference had been had to the charter-party; and he would refer to that instrument in this. If the charter-party had stipulated that the United States should discharge the vessel at Laguira, then they would be bound, in default of their Agent to do so, to indemnify the owner for his loss. But the charter-party states no such thing. On the contrary, it goes on to state that the captain "shall proceed to the port of Laguira, and there discharge his cargo." He was to discharge it. He was not to call on the Agent, but to do it himself. And he would have been justified, after having called on the Agent, in putting the goods on the wharf, and leaving them. Mr. S. said he recollected that Forrest's claim was rejected at first, on that very ground. But in this case also, the loss for detention (the very loss complained of) was provided for in the policy of insurance. It belonged to the captain to discharge the vessel; and after the refusal of the Agent, he should have landed his cargo on the wharf and left it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the custom, in relation to discharging, was different in various ports. In some it was done at the wharves; in others, in the stream. In the latter case, discharging consisted in delivering the goods from the deck. And when the consignee had received them in his lighters or boats, the captain had no more liability for their safety. It was so in Laguira,—it was also so in Holland—the Captain is discharged from his obligation when he drops the articles from his crane. Such was also the custom in the Havana. So that, in those ports, the master of a vessel could not undertake to discharge into lighters on his own responsibility, without assuming the risk of the cargo from the vessel to the shore. He could not discharge, in such cases, if the consignee refused to do it: because he would not run the risk. As to the underwriters, he did not think they were bound for this delay, or to make good any loss occasioned by it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, considered that the gentleman from South Carolina had narrowed the subject to a point, on which the only question before the Senate rested. Mr. J. said, he had no doubt whatever, that, if the captain had laid the cargo on the wharf, he would have been perfectly justified. But Laguira is peculiarly situated. A vessel cannot approach the wharves; and, therefore, the captain could not be bound to discharge the cargo on the wharf. The law is as stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, in ports where vessels can approach the wharves; but it is different in ports where they cannot, and on this subject the Committee last year made inquiry. In such ports the master delivers the cargo to the consignee in lighters; and the consignee is accountable if he does not receive it. At the time of the arrival of the vessel in question, the place was in great confusion. An earthquake had visited that town, and the inhabitants for whose relief this vessel was carrying provisions, were in great distress. At this juncture the Government Agent could not get a sufficient number of lighters to despatch the vessel promptly. The captain was compelled to allow a gradual discharge of the cargo; and while this was going on, the forces of the Spanish army arrived and the vessel was seized. Now the only question, said Mr. J. is, on whom must the consequences fall? Must it be on the Government or the owner? The Captain was not in fault. He did not stay there willingly—but by force. He had every object in hastening his departure. His manifest interest was to take in his return cargo, and return home. It seemed, therefore, that the responsibility fell upon the United States. He thought it clear from the law observed in regard to ports where vessels were discharged by lighters, that the United States ought to pay for this loss.

Mr. SILSBEE remarked, that it was the practice in Laguira to discharge with lighters. It was also the case in Amsterdam; yet no different statement was made in the charter-party or the bill of lading, between those ports and others.

Mr. BELL said, that the equity of the claim rested on the allegation that the delay which caused the loss of the vessel, was occasioned by the Agent of the United States. But, said Mr. B. has he established that fact? I think not. There is also another fact, of importance. It was, that an embargo was laid upon trade at that time; by which it is to be presumed the vessel would have been detained, even had the United States' Agent caused no delay. It did not appear when this embargo took place. Mr. B. believed it was in the month of July. He would ask whether it had been proved conclusively what detained the vessel after the embargo? Whether it was the Government Agent, or the embargo? If it was the latter, the Government are not accountable; if the former, they are. If it could have been proved that it was not the embargo that delayed her, he should suppose that it would have been done. As it was extremely doubtful, Mr. B. wished that the bill might be allowed to rest where it was, until these questions should have been answered.

Mr. BRANCH said a few words. He wished to know whether interest had been added to the claim, to make the sum one thousand dollars? If it had been, it ought to be stricken out. He was opposed to the gift first made, as he saw no right that Government had to make it.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that the gentleman from New York seemed to argue that this bill ought to pass because that, in Forrest's case the money was granted. But that was not at all wonderful. Congress rejected such applications from year's end to year's end: yet they came back again. The applicants were not easily discouraged: they watched a favorable opportunity, and although often refused, at last succeeded. He knew that this was not the first case of the kind; and he would be bound to say that it would not be the last. People were not disposed to take one or two or three denials, for a decision. It is said, by the gentlemen from Maryland, and Louisiana, that it was the custom to discharge with lighters at Laguira. But was it the part of the United States to inquire whether they landed cargoes with lighters or not? No, Sir. The Captain was bound to discharge his freight even where there was no stipulation to that effect; but here was an absolute agreement on his part to do it. It might be a custom to discharge in the stream at Laguira; but it was not a custom sanctioned by law. Individuals might make what agreements they please; but the United States were not bound by the custom of the port, unless they agreed to go by it. The other parties agreed to discharge the cargo. Had the United States agreed to do it, then the claim now made would be a just one. I do maintain, [said Mr. S.] that the Captain would have been justified in landing the cargo at the risk of the Government. He did not do so; yet he now comes in with a demand for demurrage, as though the remedy against his delay had not been in his own hands. The presumption would have been against the Government had not the stipulation been made in the charter party that the Captain was to discharge his vessel. Are we then to sit here, at the distance of fourteen years, to argue upon claims from year's end to year's end, to reject from session to session, until, having been tired out, Congress at last yields to the applicants? He knew but one way to prevent it. He could think of no rule by which this waste of time could be prevented, but by establishing a rule that the Senate, after having once fully decided upon a claim, would not hear it a second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that if he understood the gentleman from South Carolina, he said that if the United States, in the charter party, had stipulated to discharge the cargo, then, and then only, would they have been liable for the delay which is said to have been caused by the Government Agent. But, [said Mr. S.] I maintain that the Captain was not obliged to put the goods on shore. What is a discharge? It does not mean always the putting of goods on the shore. Whatever method is followed, whether the goods are put on a wharf or into a lighter, the moment they leave the deck of the vessel they are discharged. In answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, I say, [said Mr. S.] that the United States is bound to know that, at Laguaira, cargoes are landed by lighters. It is the custom of the port, founded upon local necessity, and the laws are regulated accordingly. For instance, [said Mr. S.] the Captain of a vessel is engaged to go to Rotterdam, and there to discharge his cargo. Well, sir, he goes there, and he discharges his cargo thirty miles from the port. It is the custom to do so, and when he puts the goods into the hands of the consignee, along-side, he does effectually discharge the cargo as much as though he had seen them landed on the wharf. In the ports of Baltimore and Boston it was the custom to discharge upon the wharves; it was not so in Rotterdam or London; and in each place Captains were obliged to follow the custom of the port. Then it was clear that the obligation to discharge was limited to putting the goods on shore, and each party to a contract was bound to know the law in relation to discharging in the port for which the vessel is cleared.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, made a few observations. He had been told that this was not the first time this application had been before the Senate, and to him it seemed useless and improper that the Senate should be employed from year's end to year's end, on a transaction of fourteen years' standing.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that, in reply to a remark of the Senator from South Carolina, he would merely state, that this application had never been refused. Two committees had reported favorably upon it, and the only point of difference was, the sum to be awarded.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, remarked, that if it had not been refused, he should suppose the petitioners would, by this time, have received their money.

Mr. WOODBURY made some explanations as to the nature of the charter-party, which our reporter did not hear. In relation to the embargo, in answer to the inquiries of his colleague, he would state, that the testimony on the subject went to show, that, had not the vessel been delayed by the Government agent, the embargo would nothave operated upon her. The affidavit of the Captain states this most positively, and, if it was not so, he was perjured. No better testimony could be had. He states positively, that he was delayed by the United States' Agent, until the change took place in the Government, and the embargo was laid, and he closes his affidavit with a statement, that he should have been able to leave before the change in the Government, but from the refusal of the agent to provide means for discharging the vessel. As to the charter party, Mr. W. said he was obliged to the gentleman from South Carolina for calling attention to it, because it established a fact, concerning which there had been some debate. That instrument shewed clearly, that the vessel was wholly freighted by the government. [Mr. W. here read an extract from the instrument, to show, that the whole vessel, with the exception of room for sea stores, &c. was engaged by the United States.] It had been established by a decision of the Supreme Court, that the demurrage should be made good by the party by whom the delay was caused.

The same principle had been established by the Senate in the case of Forrest. As to the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BARNES he would remark, that interest was not calculated on the amount of demurrage. But, the question in the committee had been whether it ought to be extended, not only to the delay occasioned by the Agent, which amounted to about 600 dollars, but to the delay occasioned by the embargo. It was thought equitable to give demurrage on the whole period of delay, making it amount to a thousand dollars.

The question being then taken on engrossing the bill, it was negatived, by the following vote:

CAPTORS OF THE PHILADELPHIA.

The unfinished business of yesterday—the bill to compensate Susan Decatur, (widow of the late Stephen Decatur) and others—was then taken up; and the amendments offered yesterday having been agreed to—

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he did not rise to renew the motion which the Senate had yesterday refused to adopt, nor to offer any amendment to the bill. His sole object was, to perform an act of justice to the individuals, at whose instance, and on whose claims he had asked an inquiry, and particularly to the individual by whom the paper was furnished which he had presented when the bill was last before the Senate. Since then he had attentively compared that paper with the log-book of the brig Syren, and though it purported to be copied from the journal of Mr. De Kraft, then a junior officer of the brig Syren, and no doubt was so copied, yet, in fact, it was, verbatim et literatim, a copy of the log-book of the brig. However, therefore, gentlemen might treat it as the work of a young gentleman writing for his own amusement, and with less knowledge of the facts than his superior, it certainly did contain a faithful narrative of the events of that day, and of the movements and counter movements of the brig, notwithstanding the opinion that these statements were in conflict with all nautical rule and propriety.

He had also learned, that, at the same session of Congress to which Mrs. Decatur had first presented her claim, or at the session next succeeding it, so soon as information of the fact was carried into the country, some of the officers of the Syren had furnished facts, and statements, to enable an honorable member of the other House (where the claim was pending) to urge and enforce their demands. At the first practicable period, they had presented themselves as of the number of those entitled to share in the munificence of the country. Without the least design to lessen the merit of their brave companions, who acquired imperishable glory, they allege, and then alleged, that they participated in the common peril of the brilliant enterprise. When the motion to recommit the bill was yesterday under discussion, the supposed failure to present these claims at an earlier period, seemed to be the most prominent objection to the proposition, and it was due to the parties concerned, now to correct the error, into which the Senate was led, from the want of information.

Mr. HARRISON said, that it was due to the individual who yesterday laid a paper before the Senate, to say that he, Mr. H., did not intend to attribute to him a wilful incorrectness in his statement. He merely intended to oppose receiving a statement differing from the official one, which was so fully supported by testimony.

Mr. HAYNE said, that he did not wish to say any thing further on the subject. But he would observe, that, since yesterday, he had examined the documents in the Navy Department, and was ready to show, from Commodore Stewart's official statement, that the boats of the Syren never formed a junction with the Intrepid.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote :

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Berrien, Bouigny, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Parris, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Willey, Woodbury.—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Eaton, Knight, Macan, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Thomas, Williams.—13.

The bill to graduate the prices of the Public Lands was then taken up, and the motion to amend, made by Mr. HENDRICKS, on the 28th ult. being under consideration : Mr. KANE, addressed the Senate at considerable length.

Mr. VAN BUREN then moved to lay the bill on the table, with the understanding that it should be called up on Monday.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1828.

CAPTORS OF THE PHILADELPHIA.

The engrossed bill to compensate Susan Decatur, and others, came up for a third reading.

Mr. HAYNE said, that, since this bill was last before the Senate, he had been shewn a statement, said to have been made by a respectable naval officer, in which it is alleged, that the report of the Naval Committee is incorrect in one or two particulars. Mr. H. said, as he was extremely unwilling to have it supposed, for a moment, that a measure like this was indebted for its success to erroneous statements, however unimportant in themselves, or however unconsciously committed, he felt himself called upon to notice these alleged errors. It was stated, in the first place, that the condition of the Philadelphia, at the time of her capture by the Turks, and her destruction by Decatur, was much worse than the report exhibits. It is stated in the report that she was got off the rocks without material damage, and that, at the time of her destruction, she was moored in the harbor, "ready for sea." These facts were asserted on the authority of the report of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, made by the late Doctor Holcombe, in 1826, and that statement never having been questioned, it was taken for granted that they were correct. The fact was so immaterial, that it was hardly deemed necessary to make any very minute inquiries in relation to it. I am now satisfied, however, that the condition of the frigate was not such as is stated in these reports. It is further alleged that the condition of the Philadelphia was such as to preclude the possibility of her being brought out of the harbor in safety. This, however, is a matter of opinion merely, and it will be seen, on referring to the report, that no opinion is expressed on the point by the committee, and the evidence only is submitted to the Senate on which the petitioner relies in support of her position. The committee did not consider the claim as resting, in any material degree, on that fact.

In conclusion, sir, I will only remark, that nothing was further from the intention of the committee than to impute to the gallant officer, who commanded the Philadelphia, at the time she was unfortunately lost, any blame whatever, nor to imply that she was prematurely abandoned ; on the contrary, I am satisfied that the committee concur in the universal opinion, that, on that occasion, as on all others, the conduct of Commodore Bainbridge was such as conferred honor on himself, as well as on his country.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, if the sum of $100,000 was inserted, on the ground that the Philadelphia could have been brought out of the harbor of Tripoli, and it now appeared that this was a mistake, he thought a less sum ought to be granted.

Mr. HAYNE, in reply, said, he had before risen expressly to contradict the idea, that the grant was, in any respect, influenced by the fact, whether the Philadelphia could or could not have been brought out of the harbor of Tripoli. The committee, if they had considered it material, would have distinctly reported their opinion upon it ; which they had not done. Nor did Mr. H. wish it to be understood that he now volunteered any opinion on that point. The fact was asserted by the petitioner ; it had been insisted on elsewhere ; but the committee not deeming it material to the support of the claim, had left it to the Senate, on the evidence adduced. Mr. H. said, he did not intend to say now that she could not have been brought out, and he had never asserted that she could. He meant to express no opinion on the subject. His object, in making this explanation, was to preclude the idea, that this bill was founded on the opinion that the frigate could have been brought out of the harbor. He wished it to be distinctly understood, that it was the opinion of the committee, as well as of this House, that the captors of the Philadelphia were justly entitled to the compensation granted by this bill, whatever may have been the condition of the frigate at the time she fell into the hands of the Turks, and whether she could have been brought out of the harbor, or not.

The bill was then passed, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

POWERS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. RIDGELY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee appointed to revise the rules of the Senate ; when the amendments reported by the committee were severally read and agreed to.

Mr. TAZEVELL then rose to inquire of the chairman of the committee, whether the 6th and 7th rules had been considered, and whether the committee proposed any alteration in them. Mr. T. referred to a decision made in relation to those rules by the Vice President two years ago. Mr. T. thought then, and still thought, that the decision of the Vice President was correct. The Vice President, in his opinion, had not the power to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate—it was a power that ought not to be given him.

Mr. RIDGELY, in reply, stated that these rules (the 6th and 7th) had been considered by the committee, who were of opinion that no alteration in them was necessary or expedient, and that the decision under them of the Vice President, alluded to by the Senator from Virginia, was substantially correct.

Mr. KING, a member of the committee, made an explanation similar to that of Mr. RIDGELY. He had no doubt, in his own mind, that the decision of the President, just alluded to, was a correct one. There was one member of the committee, however, who differed in opinion with the majority in regard to these rules, and who had proposed an alteration of them. He was, however, over-ruled by the decision of the other members of the committee, who thought it best that the rules should remain as they were.

Mr. FOOT said he declared himself to be the member of the committee alluded to, who had proposed the amendment to the 6th rule ; and, after being called upon in this manner, he felt himself bound to propose the same amendment for the consideration of the Senate; and should assign the reasons which induced him to offer that amendment in the committee, and which he now felt it his duty to urge before the Senate, in favor of its adoption. Sir, the Senator from Alabama has stated very correctly the proceedings of the committee on the subject. The rules of the Senate are few in number, embracing only the cases in which the Senate have thought proper to depart from the rules of proceeding in Jefferson's Manual, which appears to have been adopted by consent, as their guide in all their deliberations. The 6th and 7th rules of the Senate, by the construction given by the present presiding officer, have put it entirely out of the power of any person to call a Senator to order for words spoken, until the Senator shall have finished his speech. For, if the presiding officer has not the power, it exists in no one; for in Jefferson's Manual it is laid down explicitly, that "Offensive words are not to be noticed until the member has finished his speech, then they are to be written down." It appears from this, that these rules, instead of facilitating the business, are only calculated to produce embarrassment; and it is very evident that such has been their operation in relation to the case to which the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL] has alluded. And, sir, in my opinion, the rules should either be amended so as to recognize in the President the power to call to order, or that they should be expunged, and leave the Manual for our guide; for, under that rule, it is made the duty of the presiding officer to call to order: for, in speaking of offensive words in debate, he says, "such proceedings Mr. Speaker ought to suppress." It would seem from the 6th rule, as if it was not contemplated, that the President should call to order for words spoken, because the member is required to take his seat until the President decides whether he is in or out of order. And, if called to order by the President, it would seem unnecessary that he should take his seat to allow time for the President to decide; for the call to order would of course be a decision in the first instance.

Sir, I am in favor of amending this rule in another respect. The President of the Senate is not elected by the Senate, and is not, of course, amenable to the Senate. But, sir, by the Constitution, we have the power of making our own rules of proceeding.—[Mr. F. here read from the Constitution, which authorizes each House to determine the rules of its own proceedings.] This is the only security we have against an arbitrary exercise of power over our deliberations. Our rules should prescribe to the President his duties, and define his powers, as the presiding officer of the Senate; and I am disposed so to amend them as to allow an appeal from every decision of the Chair. In this way, and in this only, can we ever be secure from an improper exercise of power. This security is given expressly by the Constitution. By this amendment the Senate will be placed in precisely the same situation, in relation to the powers of the presiding officer, as every other deliberative body; and I cannot see any reasonable objection to it. These, sir, are my views in relation to this subject, and which induced me to offer the amendment; and I shall leave it to the sound discretion of the Senate to adopt or reject the amendment, feeling no solicitude about the result, but firmly believing either that the amendment ought to be adopted, or the 6th and 7th rules expunged, so as to relieve the presiding officer from embarrassment, and make it his duty (as it clearly would be without the rules) to call a Senator to order for "personalities" or any improper language in debate. But, sir, it appears to me proper to have an appeal from his decision to the Senate; otherwise, I cannot see how the Senate can determine or control their own deliberations as contemplated by the Constitution.

Mr. RUGGLES was a member of the committee appointed to revise the rules of the Senate; one of the meetings of which he did not attend. In relation, however, to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, it had, he believed, been rejected by the committee on the ground that there was no necessity that a member should sit down when called to order, until the President decided whether he were in or out of order; because, by such call, the President had already decided that he was out of order. Perhaps the committee were expected to express the opinion that they did not deem it expedient for us to prescribe a rule to govern the President of this body, who is not an agent of, or amenable to this body, but elected by the People, and to them only accountable. But he was of opinion that the Constitution clearly vested the Vice President with the power of preserving order in the proceedings of the Senate, to be exercised in common with the individual members of the Senate. The very words of the Constitution which provide that the Vice President shall preside over the Senate, must mean something, or they must mean nothing. He was clearly of opinion that the Constitution gave to the presiding officer the power of calling a Senator to order when using improper or indecent language. Such language, said Mr. R., may be used of the President himself, and if there is no person to call the offender to order, he may go on to the greatest lengths. The difference between the Senate and House of Representatives was this—there the Speaker was elected by the House, is the agent of that body, and, consequently, amenable to their authority. Here the case is different: the presiding officer is elected by the People; he, therefore, did not believe that any appeal from his decision could be had. In conclusion, Mr. R. said: that the power of preserving order in the Senate, he believed to be vested in the Vice President, and if the rules and practice of the Senate had not already conferred this power, that it ought to be done.

Mr. MACON said that he thought the President ought not to call to order. He should sit in his seat to decide between the members, and he ought to be pure and unbiassed, like a Judge upon the Bench. Or, said Mr. M., suppose that he improperly calls to order, to whom are you to appeal? He is to decide; therefore he ought to keep aloof from the cause of complaint, and not be the originator of the call, so as to judge impartially between the opposite parties. He had rather leave it so, than alter it.

Mr. FOOT perfectly agreed with the Senator from Ohio, with the exception as to the operation of the rules, and he must say, that, if the rules had any effect, the Presiding officer had not the power to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate. Under the Parliamentary rule he had, but under that rule the member was not to be called to order until he had finished his speech. If, then, the presiding officer had not the power, and the Senators had not the power of calling to order for offensive words spoken, the offending member might go on to any extent. His view of the subject was, that the rules should be so altered, that a member using improper language may be called to order, and by the presiding officer while speaking.

Mr. KING here read the 6th and 7th Rules, and commented on the effect of the amendment, as proposed by Mr. FOOT. If you give, said Mr. K., this power to the Vice President, you clothe him with the most tremendous and dangerous power; a power no less than that of putting an end to debate; to gag a member when the course of debate is not consonant to his wishes or his feelings. He would suppose that the Vice President was connected, either by interest, or by inclination, with those in the administration of the Government, he would then have the power to put a member down the moment he discussed a subject that he did not wish to go abroad to the People—a power, which, if he chose to exercise it, would make him the veriest tyrant in existence. It is not necessary, said Mr. K., to enable us to carry on the business of the Senate with regularity and decorum, to give any such power. He had no idea of subjecting the freedom of debate to the control of any one individual. Whatever confidence he might have in the present presiding officer, still the time might arrive when this power, if now given, would be found in dangerous hands. He hoped the amendment would not prevail. He repeated, he had every confidence in the impartiality and correctness of the decisions of the present presiding officer, but he wished to guard against any possible contingency.

Mr. DICKERSON said, it was certain that any member of the Senate had a right to call another to order for words spoken in debate, however inoffensive those words might be; and he considered it equally certain that the President might call to order for words spoken in debate, when those words might be an outrage upon the decorum of the Senate. It is the duty of the presiding officer to preserve order. The power to do this must be an inherent one, without which, the duty could not be performed, and the officer could not preside. He has, and must have, so much power as to preserve decorum in the Senate, that the business may proceed without interruption. Two years ago, when two Senators, by the violence of their remarks upon each other, totally interrupted the business of the Senate, they were called to order by a third Senator, who was directed to reduce the words to writing; this he refused to do, as it was no concern of his.

It was not absolutely necessary to vest the President with power to call to order for words or acts not immediately interfering with the decorum of the Senate. But, to give him the power to call to order for words in all cases where a Senator can call to order, would not make him more formidable than he now is. He can now, upon the call of any one Senator to order, decide the question without appeal. There will always be at least one Senator willing to aid the views of the President, if he wishes to exercise this power.

Mr. D. had no objection to increase the power of the President, but not so far as to permit him to restrain the latitude of debate. No member of this body should willingly submit to such restraint. Every one should adhere to his right of commenting most freely upon the Administration, Heads of Departments, or Officers of the Government. It is better that this privilege should be abused, than arbitrarily restrained. If, in the course of debate, a Senator deems it important to animadvert freely upon the characters or conduct of the living or the dead, he ought not to be restrained by the presiding officer.

Mr. FOOT here called the attention of the gentleman to the words of the Manual. It is said there, decidedly, that a member cannot be called to order for words spoken, until he has finished his speech. But it would be observed, that such provision gave no possibility of remedy. He thought the power ought to be vested either in the Members or the President to call to order during debate.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that he did not conceive that the office conferred the right to call to order. If the powers of the Vice President were derived from the Constitution, as nobody doubted, he knew of no sanction to that power, either in cases of irrelevancy or impropriety of speech. The only express power granted by the Constitution was that of giving the casting vote. This amendment went to give him another power not contemplated by the Constitution. On the contrary, the Constitution has given the right to the two Houses to make rules for the government of their own members, and for the direction of their presiding officers. He thought the power a dangerous one to place in the hands of the Vice President. It was never tolerated, and it was never intended to be, that a member should be put down because of the manner in which he chose to present his views or defend his principles. Yet this might happen, under the discretion which would be given by this amendment. As to the individuals of the Senate, he could not believe that the time would ever come, when they would be so forgetful of their own dignity, and that of the body, as not to call to order any member who should overstep the bounds of decorum. He was satisfied with the rule as it was; and was, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to the accumulation of unnecessary power in irresponsible hands, and of that character he conceived the present motion to be. Every Senator had now the right to call to order, and certainly forty-seven Senators were enough to watch one. It could not be necessary to increase the number to forty-eight, by adding the Vice President, who is in no way responsible to us. We do not elect him, and we cannot displace him, except by an impeachment, which must be instituted in the other House. Nor is it safe to vest the power of restraining debates in an officer like him, not concerned in the debate, and not responsible to us for the exercise of his power. He may abuse this power, and we are without remedy. The power of stopping a member in debate—of making him sit down and proceed in another manner, or not proceed at all, is a power of high import. The feelings of the Senator may be deeply wounded by it, but that is a trifle compared with the injury which may be done to his constituents. A debate, vital to their liberties, might be stopped and terminated, under the pretence of confining the Speaker to a particular question; and the injury would be without remedy. The Vice President holds his office independent of the will of the body over which he presides, and in that respect, differs from the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and all other presiding officers to which he has been likened. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is responsible to the body over which he presides. They make, and they can unmake him, and he is vested with powers by the rules of the House, which the Senate have never conferred upon the President of this body. But the principle involved in this question has already been decided upon, and acted on for two years; I allude to the appointment of Committees taken away from the President of this body because he was not responsible to us, and retained in our own hands, although it was universally acknowledged that the power had been well exercised. The admission is general, if not unanimous, that you, Sir, had exercised this power discreetly and unexceptionably—no objection was taken to your conduct—it was conceded all round that it was a power of a nature to be better exercised by a presiding officer than by the Senate at large; but, because you were not one of us, not created by us, nor responsible to us, this power was taken out of your hands. I see no difference in the principle of the two cases, and there shall be no difference in my conduct upon them. I voted to take the appointing power over Committees out of your hands, because you were not one of us, and I oppose your right to stop me in debate, for a real or supposed latitude of expression, for the same reason.

Allusion has been made, Sir, to past scenes in this Chamber, when a Senator, not now a member of this body—one whom I am proud to say, honors me with the name of friend, [Mr. RANDOLPH,]—has been supposed to transcend the freedom of debate, and you, Sir, were censured for permitting it. According to the opinion which you then expressed, and which I concur in, you had no power to call to order for that cause, and the present motion goes upon that idea, otherwise it would not be necessary now to confer this power. That you were right in your decision, is strongly to be inferred, from the fact, that of forty-seven Senators having the undoubted right to call to order on these occasions, no one did it; and if those, whose rights were unquestionable, did not act, it certainly was excusable in you, whose authority was at least doubtful, to follow their example. One thing is certain; if you erred, you erred on the side of liberty, not of authority; and the rarity of this kind of errors, by those in power, should give them a claim to our respect, when they do occur. But I do not admit there was an error, nor do I rest the vindication of my friend upon presumptions and inferences derivable from our own conduct. I take higher ground, and say that nothing which we ever heard from that gentleman on this floor, in reference to our President and his Secretaries, exceeded in severity and violence what is said with impunity in the British Parliament, by Commoners as well as Peers, of their King and his Ministers.

SENATE.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[FEB. 11, 1828.]

I have some acquaintance with the debates of the British Parliament—not so much as I ought to have—but enough to bear me out in the assertion, that the King and his Ministers have been often animadverted upon, in both Houses of Parliament, with a degree of severity which the gentleman alluded to, never transcended on this floor, in any thing which he said of our President and his Ministers.* I speak of what has occurred in the British Parliament in times of order and subordination, when the Speakers were men of the first weight and dignity of character, and when no one called them to order; and I must be permitted to say, that it argues badly for the spirit of the times in our country, that it is an evil omen for our republican institutions, if American Senators cannot be as free with their President and Secretaries, as British subjects may be with their monarch and his prime ministers. But this reproach, Sir, does not lie at your door. By your decision, you prevented the stain from sticking to your skirts. That you were right, I then believed, and still believe. Even upon a critical construction of our own rules, leaving out the enlarged considerations which governed you, your decision will stand the test of the severest scrutiny. Those rules only give you a power to decide after the question of order is raised and placed before you. When a member is called to order, his words shall be taken down in writing, and the President shall decide. This is the rule. Now why reduce to writing, except to inform the President of the words excepted to? And why inform him if he already knows them? And why make another decision, if he had already decided in the fact of calling to order? The words and the spirit of the rule go upon the idea, that one member is to accuse another of disorder, and that you, as a disinterested and impartial arbiter, are to decide between them. This is unfavorable to the spirit of our institution, which forever separates the functions of the judge and accuser, and so may they remain on this floor as every where else.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, as he did not concur in the views which had been expressed, he deemed it proper to state the reasons for his vote.

With regard to the correctness of any former decision in the Chair, he was not now called upon, nor did he intend to express an opinion. His purpose was to speak to the principles which he thought governed the subject, and not to pass upon the proper application of those principles to any particular person or subject. This was not the time or the occasion to discuss that question.

He denied that the Constitution restrained the power of the Senate to adopt the rule proposed by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. Foor.] The Constitution says, in the 3d Section of the 1st Article, "The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided." The section does not proceed to enumerate the functions which, as President of the Senate, he shall perform. A presiding officer of a deliberative legislative body, has a known duty, and when he is designated as such officer, the duty of performing the appropriate functions is plainly signified. The vote which is refused to him, except on equal division, has reference to his participation on subjects of ordinary legislation, not to the observance of order. There was no such thing as a vote implied in the matter of calling a member to order, and he presumed the honorable gentleman who had referred to his expression with emphasis, did not rely on the effect of this prohibition to vote.

In the 5th Section of the same article, the Constitution says, "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." Here again there is no enumeration of the particular acts which will constitute the guilt of disorderly behaviour, subjecting its author to punishment and expulsion. There is no enumeration of the particular rules or orders relating to the proceedings of the body which it has authority to determine. The language used is to be taken in reference to the context, and where it had received an intelligible import before its adoption into the Constitution, the meaning is to be found by ascertaining what that was. Such rules as usually obtain in legislation may be adopted, and such conduct as the usages of legislative bodies consider disorderly may be punished.

The notions which had been received by the framers of our Constitution in relation to Congressional rule, had been borrowed very much from the British House of Commons. The rules of Parliament, he believed, had been the general standard to which had been referred all questions of this character in the Old Congress, and in all the State Legislatures. In all these bodies, he believed the presiding officer executed the duty of preserving proper order. He did not mean to include the House of Lords, because the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Macon,] had said, the presiding officer there did not use the power. At a very early period the Senate exercised the power thus given to it. They did pass certain rules, and they imposed certain duties on the President, being such as are usually imposed by other legislative bo-

* The following instances, out of thousands, may be quoted:

Mr. Burke, of the King's speech, in 1755. "It was so full of equivocation and double meaning, that every man of every opinion, might find some part or other of it that would meet his sentiments, or bear a construction similar to his sentiments, be they what they might." Of the King's speech in 1782. "The speech spoke a language so strange and contradictory, so full of ridiculous and absurd professions, along with such an incredible number of promises and boasts, that he declared, if he might be permitted to speak of it as it deserved, he should call it a shaggy of nonsense and hyperbores." Of the same speech. "He had heard of a form of prayer in churches, but this was the first form of prayer he had ever met with in a King's speech: it was, he declared, nothing more than a piece of hypocritical cant played off at the expense of Parliament." Of the same speech. "He thought it a compound of hypocrisy, self commendation and folly."

Mr. Fox, in the year 1784, when the King and Ministers were in a minority in the House of Commons. "What, then, was the principle on which we held at this moment a Minister without the confidence of the House of Commons—an Executive Government in which the House placed no degree of confidence whatever? It was their evident intention to render the House of Commons the mere tool and organ of despotism. He hoped the spirit of a brave and free people would defeat the base design. He had long observed the machinations, hatred and harbored by a combination of persons, against the liberty of the country, whose political principles were too well understood to need any further illustration. These people had long endeavored to have the voice of the people on their side, had long struggled to make the people parties in their own ruin, to make them enemies to their best friends."

Debate in 1780. "Mr. Thomas Pitt entered into a most severe animadversion upon the whole conduct of the administration for a series of years past, declaring that the Minister's name was the subject of contempt and ridicule in every Court in Europe."

Debate 1770, Lord Chatham, declared that "Ministers held a corrupt influence in every Court in Europe." Same year, he said, "I will beg leave to paralyze the expression, and will say, those who gave the means of corruption, gave corruption. I will trust no sovereign in the world with means of purchasing the liberties of the people. Does he (the King) mean, by drawing the purse strings of his subjects, to spread corruption through the people, to procure a Parliament, like a packed jury, ready to requite his Ministers at all adventure?"—[Note by Mr. B.] dies on a presiding officer, but certainly such are not particularly enumerated in the Constitution. Mr. C. said, he thought it is quite manifest from the work of Mr. Jefferson, which he held in his hand, that he did not feel any doubt about the Constitutional power of the Senate. Mr. Jefferson had an intimate connexion with the Government, almost from the first essay towards our independence, to the termination of his Presidency; and he was of all men the least likely to extend the powers granted by the Constitution to any branch of the General Government.

In the preface to his Manual, prepared during the time he was Vice President, for the express purpose of aiding and informing the Senate in their proceedings, after noticing the grant of his power, he remarks: "The Senate have accordingly formed some rules for its own government, but those going only to few cases, they have referred to the decision of their President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising under their own rules, or where they have provided none." In the section treating of the "order of debate," a variety of instances are furnished, which are violations of this order, and we are told, Qui digreditur a materia ad personam, Mr. Speaker ought to suppress. Mr. Jefferson, pursuing his system of collocation, then adverts to the rules of the Senate. These rules do not designate the individual by whom a disorderly member is to be called to order, but Mr. Jefferson does not suggest that there is any diversity between the practice of the Senate and the House of Commons. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. [BAXTER] has called to his aid the proceeding of this body in relation to the change in the mode of selecting the standing committees. He says the power of appointing the committees was taken from the President, because the Constitution being the only source of his power, the Senate cannot confer other powers upon him. The honorable gentleman, no doubt, expresses the motives which influenced his vote on that occasion, but he certainly had entirely misconceived those of some others who advocated that change.

Mr. C. begged leave to say for himself (and he believed he might say so for some others) that no apprehension of constitutional difficulty had influenced his vote. From the peculiar organization of this body, it might occur that the President of the Senate should differ from the majority of its members, on great and important questions of national concern. The object of confiding subjects to our committees, is to facilitate the means of digesting principles, collecting information, and presenting views in relation to matters on which we are to act. A committee acts in the character of an agent to the body at large.

He not only held it proper that the majority of the Senate should be represented on the important Committees, but it was perfectly suicidal to adopt a different course. It was the right of the majority to have the Committees of their own political complexion, and in the peculiar formation of this body the only mode by which this right can be secured is to give the appointment immediately to the Senate. In any other event the reports of your committees will be carried abroad to produce impressions on the public mind directly at variance with your own opinions; the great labor of your agents will be to counteract your own deliberate purposes.

He did not wish to be understood as alluding to the period when the change was made as the season when this state of things had been witnessed. The possibility of its occurrence required provision to meet it, and formed sufficient inducement for the vote he then gave.

The constitution, therefore, had nothing to do with the question farther than it had constituted the Vice President the presiding officer of this body, and thereby gave him the power properly belonging to such an officer, subject to the control usually exercised by legislative bodies in the shape of rules of proceeding.

It was, therefore, a question of expediency alone, whether the President of the Senate should have the power to preserve order and decorum in this body. If it were not for the occurrences which have taken place, he should not have thought the Senate now called upon to act on this subject. It had been the opinion of most persons, he believed, that such power existed with the President. But on a late occasion the President has said he did not think he had the power—the rules of the Senate had been committed to a special committee for revision, and the Chairman, who reports the rules without alteration, as to this subject, in answer to a question touching this precise point, has said, the committee are unanimous in the opinion that there is no such power in the President, and several members rise and sanction the same doctrine. If then, the rules of the Senate should remain unchanged, it must be received as the judgment of the Senate, that such powers do not belong to the President, and ought not to be exercised by him.

Mr. C. expressed his surprise that any gentleman on this floor should doubt of the propriety, or indeed the necessity, of there being such a power in the Chair. He should not allude to the unpleasant occurrence on this floor, two years ago, which had been referred to, except for the purpose of using the remark made by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON.] That gentleman had informed us that an honorable member of the Senate who had moved the question of order, had refused to reduce the objectionable words to writing. That was not the only occasion on which the Senate had witnessed a refusal to take down words objected to as out of order. It might be so; but he did not know that there had been an instance in which disorderly words were taken down in compliance with the rule. And who would consent to make a record of words which were offensive? The practice he understood was supposed to require that when taken down, the words were to be put upon the Journal. If, therefore, the most defamatory charge against an honorable member of this House be made by another member, the preliminary step towards redress is to cause a record of that charge to be made, which will for ever perpetuate the recollection of the charge. No individual could submit to this course, nor would he, when he was the victim of aspersion, be instrumental himself, or allow his friend to be instrumental in handing down the evidence of the charge.

And what are the reasons, asked Mr. C. urged against the adoption of the rule, as a measure of expediency? We are told that it places a power in the Chair, which may be used oppressively, and may arrest the latitude of debate. It is called a tremendous, a dangerous power. The whole argument on this point seemed to him full of error and mistake. On questions involving the political character of public men, there never had been, he believed, and God forbid there ever should be, a disposition to restrain debate. The people of this country had a right to know every thing touching the political conduct and character of our rulers, and no man or set of men on this floor, would ever dare to invade that right. The rule proposed did not touch that question. Freedom of debate was secured by a power superior to any rule of the Senate. To indulge it was no violation of order; and therefore not within the rule which restrained disorderly conduct. How then, stands the matter of oppressive power in the Chair? The amendment proposed will make it the duty of the Chair to cause order to be observed; it will submit to his discretion primarily, the question of what is or is not order; but if he should ever exert that discretion unwisely or oppressively, an appeal can be had to the Senate, and his decision may be reversed, and the character and responsibility of a majority of the Senate are the pledges by which every member claims his rights.

How is it, under the construction now given to the existing rule? One individual may suggest a violation of order, invoke the authority of the Chair, and the occupant of that Chair, by this single fiat, may arrest the debate. His sole judgment, absolute and irreversible, is the standard by which every member here must measure his steps. In the one case, the tenure by which we hold our rights, is the intelligence, the discretion, and the responsibility of a majority of ourselves; and, in the other, the intelligence, the discretion, and the responsibility of one individual, not deriving his authority from us, and requiring it to be called into action only by the suggestion of an individual member.

It appeared to him the argument was most strangely misapplied by the honorable gentleman who had used it, and the very apprehension to which they had yielded had driven him to the most decided conviction of the necessity of the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, it was the duty of the Vice President, as presiding officer of the Senate, to decide agreeably to such rules and regulations as shall have been made for his guidance. In the House of Representatives the presiding officer had the power of calling a member to order "for words spoken," because he was one of their own body, elected by themselves to preside over them, and amenable to their authority. If his decisions are unsatisfactory, they can refuse to re-elect him—but we, Sir, have no such power. Our presiding officer is not elected by us—he is sent here by the People of the United States, and totally independent of us. Mr. S. was not willing to vest either the Vice President or President pro tem. with the power to stop debate. It is a tremendous power—I have felt it, Sir, and never shall forget it. On a certain occasion, in the other House, a report was presented from one of the Secretaries, which animadverted very severely on Mr. Gerry. I undertook to animadvert on the report, and was called to order. Unconscious that I had travelled out of the record, I proceeded, and was three times called to order. I then inquired why I was considered to be out of order?—and was told, by the Speaker, that the report upon which I had animadverted must not be considered the report of the Secretary, but of the President of the United States. That I could not proceed: for, before the discussion commenced, I had been called out of my seat, and told, by a person high in office, that the President requested that the report might not be considered as his but as the report of the Secretary of State. Mr. President, I am unwilling to be placed in this body, differently constituted as it is from the other, in such a situation as I then was, to be stopped in the course of my argument. There were high party times then, and high party times may come again, and, whenever they do, similar outrage may (with such a power) be committed. And where will be the remedy? Gentlemen say, in the appeal from the decision of the President. An appeal! My experience has taught me to know that an appeal is not worth a button. The majority will always support the Chair, right or wrong. An appeal was taken in the case I have mentioned, and the majority voted with the Speaker, and always will. An appeal from the Chair is vox et preterea nihil. I would rather be without the appeal.

A gentleman has said that he will vote for the amendment, to justify you for the decision you had made on the rule. Sir, you require no justification—you decided agreeably to the rules prescribed for your government, and would not have been authorized to have given any other decision. I hope, Mr. President, that the rule will not be changed.

Mr. McLANE commenced his remarks with an apology for obtruding his sentiments upon the Senate, in which he had so recently taken his seat, on a subject relating to their rules and orders. The amendment appeared to him directly to involve the power of the Vice President to call a Senator to order, and prevent him from speaking, for words spoken in debate. He had considered that subject, and was of opinion that the Vice President did not possess such power, independent of or according to the existing rules of the Senate, and was unwilling to confer such power by any alteration of the rules. The amendment, by its turns, concedes, and the mover, with a commendable spirit of candor, admits, that, by the existing rules, the power in question cannot be exercised by the Vice President; and so far as this admission may be entitled to weight, it would place the proposed change on grounds of expediency merely; but the argument of gentlemen had taken a wider scope, had asserted bolder claims to power, and had invested the Vice President with authority to stop a Senator in debate, and arrest discussion for the use of words which he might deem irrelevant or disorderly.

A power of such magnitude, so vital to the dearest privileges of the members of this body, has been supposed, by at least one Senator, inherent in the Vice President, as incident to his office as presiding officer of the Senate under the Constitution, or derived from the rules contained in Mr. Jefferson's "Manual of Parliamentary Practice." He denied these assertions altogether, which he considered dangerous in principle, and thought it perfectly plain, that the law of the English Parliament could have no force on the proceedings of the Senate, much less that they could control the privilege of debate.

That the Vice President was not a member of the Senate; that he was placed here, not by the body itself, but by the People of the United States, under the Constitution, which, by specifying certain of his powers and limiting their extent, by a fair implication excluded all others, had already been sufficiently adverted to. He would press them no farther than to remark, that it thence appeared to him perfectly clear that the Constitution could not have designed to subject the Senate to the administration of an officer, without other rule than his arbitrary will, and irresponsible to those who might become the objects of his oppression. It might be fairly presumed, he said, if it had not been expressly provided, that an authority thus conferred would be liable to the regulation of those on whom it was to be exerted.

The doctrine of inherent or incidental power, [Mr. McL. said,] was every where the offspring of urgent necessity, and belonged to no functions in this Government, unless indispensable to its existence. In regard to the right in question, there certainly could be no pretence for such necessity.

If the Vice President possessed the power as incident to his office, it would be the gift of the Constitution, and as such transcend the authority of the Senate. There could be no limit to such power, but the arbitrary will of the presiding officer. The Senate could subject it to no control; they could neither prescribe rules of order, nor the circumstances under which their debates might be interrupted; and would thus be subjected to a dominion which he believed no gentleman had seriously contemplated.

Of the privileges of the Senate, that of freely discussing the various subjects of their deliberations, was the dearest, intimately interwoven with the structure of that body. He considered the freedom of speech here, as sacred as that of the press elsewhere; and if the combined power of Congress and the Executive be incompetent, as he believed it was, to abridge the freedom of either, beyond these walls, he could not admit a power incident to the Vice President to regulate the former on this floor. He could conceive of no right more clearly incident to the Senate, than that of free discussion, without which its deliberations could not be properly conducted. He thought it constituted an important part of the proceedings of the Senate, which they possessed the exclusive power of regulating by their own rules.

The Constitution of the United States, establishing the Legislature for the Union, authorized "each House to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a member."

In this provision [Mr. McL. said] was contained the whole parliamentary power over the subject of order—that of prescribing rules, and of enforcing obedience. It was absolute and unlimited, and could not consist with the existence of a similar power elsewhere. It relieved the Senate from any rule other than that emanating from its own will.

It could not, he apprehended, be denied, that the Senate might, in virtue of this provision, prescribe by positive rule, that even personal remarks should not be deemed disorderly, and that the Vice President should in no instance call to order for words spoken, and therefore it would follow, that the power of that officer was wholly derived from the authority of the Senate. He would hereafter consider what would be deemed disorder in parliamentary discussion, in cases where the rules were silent.

The error of the argument attributing to the Vice President this power as incident to his office, lay in clothing an officer whose duties were ministerial merely, with legislative functions; and in confounding the powers of the Senate and those of the presiding officer. Gentlemen had insisted that the Vice President must possess the power in question to enable him to perform his duties. But what, he asked, were the duties of a presiding officer? Certainly not to make, but to execute the law—to preside over the body according to the rules prescribed by the competent authority for its government. When the Constitution designated the Vice President to preside over this body, it conferred on the Senate the power of determining the rules of its own proceedings, and his duty consists in executing these rules. Where they are silent, the omission can only be supplied by the further action or tacit assent of the Senate, as the occasion may arise. He said the history of every parliamentary body of which he had any knowledge, and more especially that of the English parliament, would fully sustain this position.

In all parliamentary assemblies, rules of order emanated from the body itself, and the particular code of each consisted of their own special regulations, and decisions founded on the sanction of the house, dependant upon their will, and adapted to their own convenience. In all, freedom of discussion is the last matter subjected to special regulation, and uniformly allowed the widest latitude. An analogy in this respect has been supposed to exist between the authority of the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Commons, but such analogy would be fatal to the pretensions of gentlemen on this occasion; since even the Speaker of the House of Commons possesses no power to interfere with debate for disorderly words, independent of the order of the Commons, as is apparent from the Manual referred to by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS.] That Senator quoted from the Manual of the English Parliamentary Practice, the rule which provides that though the consequences of a measure may be reprobated in strong terms, to arraign the motives of those who propose or advocate it, is personality, and against order. "Qui degreditur a materia ad personam, Mr. Speaker ought to suppress." But this duty is enjoined by the express order of the Commons, of the 19th April, 1604. It is therefore plain, that Mr. Speaker can interfere in the single instance of a departure from the subject before the House, to indulge in personality; and that even this power is exercised in virtue of a special order of the Commons made for the express purpose. It might with great propriety be contended that, anterior to the order of 1604, personality was not against order; and it is unquestionable, that the order was made to confer on the Speaker the power of doing that which previously could only have been done by the Commons themselves.

The truth is, that, prior to the date of that order, the latitude of debate had been subjected to little or no regulation; disorderly words even had not been defined, much less had it been supposed competent for the Speaker to arrest discussion. But in the session of 1604, the Commons became engaged in serious inquiries into their own privileges; and the assumption of the Crown to issue writs of election to supply vacancies, and return offensive members, led to discussions which afforded the majority of the Commons, who had throughout manifested a subserviency to the King, even when asserting their own privileges, a pretext for the order of 1604. But he apprehended it would scarcely be insisted that the Vice President did or ought to possess greater power over the debates of the Senate, than could have been exercised by the Speaker of the House of Commons, in the reign of James the First.

It would be further obvious, [Mr. McL. said,] by a recurrence to the Manual, that the right in the English Parliament of preserving order in debate, was not the power of arresting discussion, or of preventing the use of words on account of their intrinsic impropriety. On the contrary, it was the power of the House over refractory members, of inflicting punishment after the debate was terminated, for the use of words in violation of express rule. In cases of this kind, the offending member is allowed to proceed to the end of his speech, when the words are taken down, that the House may then take such order as to them may seem proper—by suppressing the objectionable words, or punishing the member. Mr. Speaker can suppress in the single case to which the order of 1604 applies. The argument on this occasion, however, claims for the Vice President the power of calling to order during the discussion, and of preventing the use of words, which, in his judgment alone, without any rule of the Senate, may be improper!

But [Mr. McLANE said] he denied that the Lex Parliamentaria of England had any binding force in the Senate of the United States, either to confer power on their presiding officer, or to determine the rules of their proceedings. Composed as that code was, of rules and orders expressly enacted by either branch of the British Parliament, and of decisions of points of order, with the assent of the two Houses, and sanctioned by long usage, its highest authority was, in being regarded as a branch of the great body of the common law of England, which had never been admitted to have any force in the Government of the United States. He knew that parts of the common law had been recognized in some of the individual States, but had been expressly repudiated by the decisions of the highest judicial tribunals from the Government of the Union. The rules and orders and principles of practice in the English courts even, do not apply to the courts of the United States, and therefore Congress, by her own laws, have made provision for this subject. He would not say, that in the absence of our legislation, the courts might not frame rules for their own government; but he would say, that any rule which should be adopted either for the Senate or the courts, would derive its validity from their recognition, and not from its force elsewhere.

Now it would be seen, he said, not only that neither House of Congress had adopted the whole body of the Lex Parliamentaria as the rule of their proceedings, but that they had formed a body of rules of their own, rejecting the great mass of the English practice, and materially altering such parts as they pleased to engraft on their own rules. The Senate more especially, in the formation of their rules, have wholly omitted the order of 1604, which has been introduced into this discussion.

In support of his position as to the force of the Lex Parliamentaria in the Senate, the Senator from Maryland had also referred us to Mr. Jefferson's Preface to the Manual. But in the absence of any rule recognising the English law of Parliament, it could scarcely comport with the dignity of argument to suppose that a general opinion hazarded in a Preface, would legalize that which the Senate had discarded. If the Preface had proposed to refer to past decisions upon particular rules, or to illustrate a practice which, by the sanction of the Senate, tacit or otherwise, might have introduced a rule, it might for such purpose be valuable; but it does not propose even this. Referring to the power conferred on each branch of the Legislature, to determine the rules of its proceedings, it remarks, that "the Senate have accordingly formed some rules for its own government, but those going only to a few cases, they have referred to the decision of their President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising either under their own rules, or where they have provided none; and hence the necessity of recurring for its own government to some known system of rules, that he may neither leave himself free to indulge caprice and passion, nor open to the imputation of them."

It is evident that these observations of Mr. Jefferson refer to the rule which he is to adopt for his own decision on questions of order as they may arise; not assuming power to raise them of his own mere motion.

He concedes to the Senate the power of making their own rules, and admits himself to be bound by those already made. Now, it so happens, that by those rules actually framed by the Senate, this subject of order in debate is expressly regulated, and in such manner as that the Vice President cannot himself call to order for words spoken, nor interpose his judgment in any way, until one Senator shall be called to order by another. The question of order thus arising, is referred to the decision of the Vice President, without debate and without appeal.

If the remarks of Mr. Jefferson meant more than this, [Mr. McL. said,] he should be compelled to dissent from them; but he thought they meant no more.

It would be recollected, he said, that the Senate having made no rule pointing out words which should be deemed disorderly, that question, whenever the occasion arose, was exclusively referred to the decision of the Vice President. In such case it would be wholly discretionary with him to rely on his own conception of order, to erect a standard for himself, or resort to another existing in other bodies; to hold the member to strict order, or leave him with the same latitude as was indulged in the English Parliament previous to the rule of 1604. But Mr. Jefferson meaning "not to leave himself free to indulge in caprice or passion, nor open to the imputation of them," announces to the Senate his intention of resorting to some known system of rules for the government of his decisions, and therefore compiled the Manual from the British practice, not as binding upon the Senate or himself, beyond their own pleasure, but as a light to guide his steps where the rules of the Senate had left any thing dark. He referred to the "Lex Parliamentaria," to enlighten his judgment in questions of order, either as it respected decorum in debate, or order in other proceedings, in the same manner as the Judges of the Courts resort to the "Lex Mercatoria," or other parts of the body of the common law, for sound principles relative to mercantile transactions, or the numerous other cases arising for their decision. Mr. Jefferson thus announced to the Senate his determination to adopt a rule for his own decisions until they should please to adopt a better. It was for a rule of decision merely, that the parliamentary practice was resorted to, and that he would not question the propriety of such reference, he utterly denied it for any other purpose. He protested against such resort for the purpose of deriving power from the rule of 1604 to control debate, or of suppressing words spoken, by degrading or otherwise punishing the member using them. He trusted if such power should ever be assumed, it would not be quietly submitted to.

If the law of the English Parliament had no force here, it was incumbent on us, he said, to look to what each House of Congress had themselves done upon this subject. The House had gone much farther than the Senate, and changed materially the English practice. Among other things, their rules provide that "the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum;" and to this there is no similar rule in the Senate. Also, that "if any member, in speaking, or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order;" and they, moreover, expressly declare that "a member, speaking, shall confine himself to the subject under debate, and avoid personality;" and then prescribe the manner of stopping the member violating the rule, and the terms on which he may be permitted to resume the discussion.

The rules of the Senate vary essentially from those of the House, and, though embracing most cases of disorder arising from other causes than words spoken in debate, they are silent as to pertinency of remark, and do not prohibit personality. On this subject, the Senate rules prescribe merely that a Senator, when speaking, "shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down;" and then, by the sixth and seventh rules, now proposed to be amended, provides as follows:

"6th. When a member shall be called to order, he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not; and every question of order shall be decided by the President, without debate; but, if there be a doubt in his mind, he may call for the sense of the Senate.

"7th. If the member be called to order for words spoken, the exceptional words shall immediately be taken down in writing, that the President may be better enabled to judge of the matter."

To him it appeared obvious, that, by these rules, the right to call to order for words spoken was reserved to the members of the Senate, who were themselves deemed to be the best judges of the propriety of interrupting discussion. In this view, it remained only to prescribe the mode of procuring a decision when such question should be made, and this he thought the sole object of the rules already quoted. The sixth rule, requiring the member to sit down, "to afford the President an opportunity of determining whether he was in order or not," would have been unnecessary, if it had contemplated the call to be made by the President, since he must be supposed to have determined that before making the call. And the seventh rule, requiring the words to be taken down, the better to enable the President to judge, equally excludes the idea of the call proceeding from him. In such case, his judgment must have been previously formed; but, as he might be inattentive to the course of remark at the moment of a call by a member, the necessity of reducing the words to writing was obvious.

Mr. McL. said, if the views he had submitted were not erroneous, the Vice President had determined correctly in declining to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate; and he was the more confirmed in this result, since it had not been even attempted to trust him with any power of enforcing his call, should he undertake to make it.

Mr. McL. said he was not disposed to enlarge the powers of the Vice President in this respect, and was content with the existing rules of the Senate. Whether he looked to the past or the future, he was equally indisposed to change. The present rules were the work of as able men as ever adorned the Senate—as regardful of good order and decorum—as jealous of their rights, and appreciated them as highly as he. When he compared these rules with the British Parliamentary practice, or the rules of the House of Representatives, and observed the marked dissimilarity in this respect, and the jealous deference paid to the freedom of debate by the Senate's rules, he could not attribute them to accident, but design—to a design founded on the composition of the Senate, the invaluable privilege of free discussion, and the peculiar relation of the presiding officer, to this body. He had seen no necessity of changing these provisions. Under them, the Senate had been conducted through the most stormy times of our political history. The dignity and privileges of the Senate were to be preserved by a firm adherence to their established rights, and by the wholesome restraint of the body itself over refractory members, rather than by lightly yielding to temporary clamor. The inconvenience arising from disorder in debate operated upon the Senate, and with them there is ample power to obviate the evil, when it may require their influence. With the Senate this power was safely deposited; was efficient for their own purposes, and safe from all attempts to use it for their oppression, or as subservient to extraneous influence. With the Senate he was disposed to retain it. He had felt surprised that, in all the complaints which had been made on this subject, gentlemen had not reflected that there was greater danger of abusing too much power, than from refraining from the exercise of doubtful authority. Power was the last thing he would be disposed unnecessarily to accumulate in the hands of any functionary, and it appeared to him strange, that, holding in our own hands the unquestionable authority, but failing ourselves to use it, we should be seeking to confide it to another to be more actively employed. By this amendment it must be intended that the Vice President shall exert the power where the Senate would not—and for that, if for nothing else, he would be opposed to it; because, the time might come when he would have a motive to use it, where it should be exerted by no one.

His experience in this body had taught him that there was little necessity for any rule here, respecting order and decorum in debate. The dignified forbearance and liberal comity which had uniformly marked the deliberations of the Senate, themselves, created a law, and imposed restraints, more efficient than any written rule. They arose from a consciousness of the possession of the ultimate power to enforce respect for the rules of decorum, by other means, when these failed. In such a body, he said, that was the only efficient law. It was the great moral influence of the power of the body for its own preservation, which, like that of punishing for contempt, or breach of privilege, required no written code; which was within us and around us, accompanied us in all our walks, was our shield and buckler, and, though strong as iron, was yet light as air. He believed this moral force was weakened by too much speciality in regulations of order, as the multiplying rules of order not unfrequently led to disorder. After all, he said, our main reliance was upon our own sense of self-respect, of what was due to the Senate, to the country, and to ourselves, and the knowledge of a higher power to be exerted, when every thing else failed. On slight occasions, the exertion of any power over this subject would be injudicious—in those of great emergency, that of the Senate only would be proper.

A call to order, if confined to admonition merely, would be unavailing where this power ought properly to be exerted; but it is the power of enforcing obedience to the call, by punishment proper for the offence, by degrading the member, or denying him the privilege of debating, that formed the essence of the rule; and such power, he repeated, either as it regarded the application of the remedy, or the indication of its necessity, he was unwilling to strip from the Senate, and confer on the Vice President. In these observations, he had no reference to the present incumbent of the Chair: for he hoped he might be allowed to remark, without going out of his way, that neither the present state of things, nor the Vice President's own just and enlightened appreciation of his authority, indicated danger from that quarter. He did not fear that power would be usurped or abused now. But no one could tell how long the present state of things might continue, or the same liberal disposition preside over the Senate. The Senate had no agency in the choice of their presiding officer; and, in the political revolutions of society, a new order of things might arise, and subject us to the rule of an officer who may desire to seek, rather than shun power—to arrest debate here, in order to check its influence elsewhere. For such and all other events, he thought we should be best prepared, by retaining with the Senate the whole power over the subject; and he was desirous of manifesting, by his vote on this occasion, that he believed it safer there than in other hands.

He deemed it useless to authorize a call to order, without accompanying it with the power to enforce obedience to the call, and looking, therefore, to this amendment, as clothing the Vice President with the power of enforcing his decisions, by controlling discussion on this floor, he found it difficult to imagine an occasion, in which such power would be necessary, or in which it would be proper to use it.

By the principles of our free Government, and according to the habits of our people, a liberal latitude of debate is proper and allowable. What words may be disorderly, is not unfrequently a question full of difficulty, more likely to be satisfactorily decided by the Senators themselves, according to their own sense of propriety, than by another person, in conformity with any system of rules whatsoever.

From the character of Parliamentary discussion, a scope of remark, more or less discursive and desultory, was to be expected, and he thought strictly allowable. Political disquisition, in many instances, defied the restraint of logical precision; and, in the discussion of the great political measures of this Government, connecting themselves with the policy of an administration, and the character and ambition of public men, a free and extensive range of debate was essential to the liberty of speech and the dearest privilege of the citizen. To detect, in all cases, what would be such a departure from the proper license as would be deemed impertinent and disorderly, was scarcely practicable. In such a body as this, we cannot erect a common standard for all. Every man is not a dialectician, or severely disciplined by the rules of logic. We are not to forget the composition of the Legislature of the Union, the wide range from which its members are selected, or the diversity of their minds, habits, and education. We come here inspired with a patriotic ardor, placing a high value upon the virtues of the People, holding the Government in all things strictly accountable for its actions, and our constituents expect from us a free exposure of our opinions of men and measures. It is in this way that much useful information is diffused throughout the Union, and the attention of the People fixed upon the operations of the Government and the conduct of public men. The People who send us have a right to expect the representative to be tolerated and heard, though he may not be skilled in all the niceties of parliamentary order. He meant not to excuse indecorous language, or mere personality, but he thought the liberty of speech flourished best untrammelled by too much rule; but, regulated by those salutary restraints imposed by the influence of a liberal education, good taste, and strong native sense of the speaker and his audience, close argument, in strict conformity with cold logical deduction, might best comport with his habits of thought and action; and a mild, but firm, exposure of political abuses, might fall less harshly upon his ear, and produce equal effect upon his mind; but he would not, for that reason, bring all others to the same standard. Nor would he disguise the pleasure with which he often heard and was instructed by the brilliant efforts of a bolder and more highly gifted genius, which, defying all rule, sported in its own peculiar element.

Powers of the Vice President.

It had been aptly said, by one of the greatest orators of modern days, "that it was the nature of genius to break from the fetters of criticism, though its wanderings were sanctioned by its majesty and wisdom when it advances in its path—and was tamed into dulness when subjected to rule." Mr. McL. said, the liberty of this country could not exist without a rational freedom of speech and action, which should only be prevented from degenerating into licentiousness. In the language of the orator from whom he had already borrowed, "he must be content to take Liberty, the last best gift, just as she is—we may pare her down into bashful irregularity, and shape her into a perfect model of severe scrupulous law, but she would then be Liberty no longer."

He desired not to be understood, by these observations, as extending impugnt to every thing that may be uttered in debate on this floor, but as contending merely that the line of this indulgence cannot well be fixed by rule. The liberty of speech here implies as much observance of order, positive or otherwise, as is consistent with the right boldly and freely to expose to the People the real character of all subjects which it concerns their interest to know. What that latitude is, cannot be well promulgated in the abstract, but should be judged of in the particular instance, and by those whose deliberations were to be affected. He did not doubt that the ultimate power in the Senate, to which he had adverted, was sufficient for this purpose; and, if used with a wise forbearance, few occasions would call for its interference. It was his pride to hope and to feel that the Senate was not immediately exposed to the violence of political storms, which, though they might sometimes sweep over us, unless we followed them, and mingled in the tumult, would leave us on the high ground on which the Constitution had placed us.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that he should not have thought of offering the amendment now under consideration; but, while the rules were under discussion, he thought it best to make them as perfect as possible. At present all things were tranquil; but the peace and harmony of the country might not always remain, and it was desirable that all measures should be taken to preserve it. If the question involved in this amendment had already gone forth among the People, and caused some commotion, it was high time that it should be finally settled. He had always considered it the right ex vi termini of the President to quell all disorders of whatever description.

The question was, whether it should not be the right of the President to call to order, giving the privilege to any member to call for a revision of the decision by the Senate. It was a rule of the Senate for thirty-five years, for the President to call to order, and he, himself, had been the subject of it. He had been called to order by his late venerable friend Mr. Gaillard. He had appealed to the Senate to say whether he was out of order, and the decision was, that there could be no appeal. It seemed to be assumed by some gentlemen, that they were going to place a tyrant in the Chair, and that against his lawless rule it was necessary to provide. This did not produce any effect on his mind. While a Vice President was in the Chair he had no fear. While the presiding officer of the Senate was one in whom the People had confidence, and who reached his elevation legally, he saw no cause of apprehension. In the House of Representatives, the members or the Chair have the right to call to order. If it did not exist in the office of Vice President, the Senate had the right to give it to him; and he was in favor of doing so. As to the supposition that the Vice President was not a member of the Senate, he did not believe the position could be maintained, as he was firmly of the opinion that he was made part of the body by the Constitution. It was true that all the powers formerly exercised by the Chair had not been considered inalienable. For instance, the manner of nominating committees had been changed several times, and at present that duty was transferred to the Senate itself. But there were other powers which were entirely incidental to the Chair, and could be vested no where else. A gentleman gets up, and makes a certain proposition. Does not the Chair tell him he is out of order? This is done every day. When two members rose also at the same time, power was given to the presiding officer to say whose turn it was to speak first. If the principle now attempted to be established were correctly founded, why should this power pertain entirely to the presiding officer? Why should not one of the forty-eight members do this? It would be idle to argue in this way; and it was, Mr. S. considered, strong proof that the Vice President had all the powers incidental to his situation. If they looked even to ordinary societies, they should find that they elected their President, who, by the election, was invested with all necessary powers for directing the business of the meetings. He becomes at once the judge of what is to be done, and the director of the mode in which it shall be done. I, for one, said Mr. S., am for giving power to the Chair, if there is any serious doubt of his possessing it. I think there is no danger in giving him such a power. If two members were to quarrel across the house, would the Chair decline interfering? Or, suppose that a Senator were to go at length into the consideration of a subject entirely foreign to the question in hand, and talk of the Army or the Navy when the question of the proper location of a road was before the Senate? or discuss the expediency of an appropriation, when no appropriation was contemplated? Would the Chair sit silent and permit this irrelevancy? Certainly not. If he did, an individual might talk here a whole day, and arrive at nothing. There were rules, the enforcement of which could not be taken from the Chair without making the Senate a mere nullity. It would be, in fact, throwing a new and inconvenient duty into the hands of the members, by setting them to watch over and administer the rules, which, in reality, belongs to the President.

The House of Representatives was so fully convinced of the necessity of some vigorous depository of this power to preserve order, that they had taken away the right of appeal from the call of the Chair. He believed that every deliberative body must have a presiding officer, and that individual ought to have the requisite authority for conserving the order of the meeting, and advancing the progress of the public business. That this duty might not be embarrassing, and to relieve the feelings of the Chairman, an appeal to the body ought to be allowed. If, therefore, no other person made the motion, Mr. S. should move that the President have power to call to order, and a right of appealing to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. KING said that, in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, he owed it to himself to say, that his remarks had been made in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, who thought the Constitution gave to the Vice President the power of calling to order without appealing to the Senate. It was in regard to this statement that he had said that such a construction would clothe the President of the Senate with a tremendous power. But he did not believe any such thing. He was of opinion that the Senate had a right to give the power to the Vice President to call to order, with or without an appeal.

Mr. McKINLEY merely rose to give the opinions which would influence his vote. He looked upon all objections to the amendment as having a bearing upon the Constitutional question. It had been said that the Vice President was not a member of this body. If this declaration were modified so as to be that he was not a Senator, he would agree to it. But he maintained that he was a member. The argument appears to be grounded on the fact that the Senate does not elect him. We complain that we do not elect him—that he is not a member—but against whom do we complain? Against the People of the United States. They elect him; and they, by the Constitution, declare that he shall preside over the deliberations of the Senate. I say, then, said Mr. McK., it is the Vice President to whom the powers naturally belonging to a presiding officer should be accorded. Who is to do the duty but him? Who else should preserve order, so necessary to the effectual performance of the duties of Senators? It had been said that he possessed no inherent power. I do not, said Mr. McK., understand the term. He was not aware that any officer of Government possessed inherent power; he rather thought all powers under the Constitution were delegated. He would ask in what the difference consisted between the duties of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of this body? He did not see the great distinction that had been imagined. But the great objection was, that the Vice President not being responsible to this body, we cannot expel him in case of misconduct. But again, I ask, whose fault is it that we are so restricted? And again, I answer, that of the People and the Constitution. And are we to fly in the face of the Constitution, and say that, because the presiding officer is elected differently, we will not give him the power necessary for the proper performance of his duties? Order must be preserved by some one; and it is preserved by the Vice President in the Senate, under a clause in the Constitution. It was surely not the particular duty of a member to call another to order. He is the interested person, and ought to be free from all interference in the duty. There should be an authority above him to judge coolly of the propriety of the procedure. He wished to know whether there was not a general rule in every deliberative body for this purpose? Where did the discretion rest, but in the hands of the presiding officer? The Vice President is a member of this body; he has a modified influence in making of all laws, as he has the casting vote, and can approve or negative every measure. Was it not proper that the power should be delegated to the Vice President, from the forty-eight Senators, to preserve order? He thought there could be no question of the expediency of this measure; and under this impression was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. TAZEVELL remarked, that if it was correct to say, as the Senator from Alabama who had just taken his seat had said, that the Senate had no power, nor was it the right of any Senator, to call a member of that body to order, for words spoken in debate, he would ask, from whence is derived the power to adopt this amendment? Its object is, to invest the Chair with a power, which it seems to have been conceded by all, the presiding officer of this body does not now possess, at least under the existing rules. Now, if it be true, that the Senate itself hath not such a power, can it be contended, that they may transfer to another, rights or powers which they do not themselves possess? Surely it cannot be correct to give what the donor hath not to bestow; nor can the grantee derive any thing from such a discussion.

Mr. McKINLEY here explained. He said, that he had not meant to contend, that the Senate had no power, or that any Senator had not the right, but merely that it was not the duty of any particular Senator to exert this right, of calling a member to order for words spoken in debate.

Mr. TAZEVELL resumed. I am happy to hear from the Senator from Alabama, that he admits the right of the Senate, and of each and every member of this body, to exercise the power which the amendment proposes to confer upon the Chair. The difference of opinion between this honorable Senator and myself, in relation to this subject, is then reduced to a very narrow space indeed. He admits the right of the Senate, and of each of its members; and denies that the presiding officer of this body enjoys this right at present. He thinks it expedient, however, that this officer should possess such a power, because it is not the special duty of any particular Senator to exercise the right which confessedly belongs to him. And thinking so, the Senator from Alabama is willing to grant such a power to the Chair, provided it is limited and restricted as the amendment proposes. I concur in the greater part of this opinion, although not for the reason assigned by this honorable Senator. To me it has always appeared, that the rights of public agents of all kinds, were bestowed upon them, not for their own, but for the public good; and therefore, that all such rights conferred, were in truth but duties imposed. Being duties, we have not the right to abandon their discharge, while we retain the station to which such duties attach: but we are bound to meet the responsibility they impose, without seeking to transfer the duty, and with it the responsibility, to any other. As, however, it is unquestionably within the competency of the Senate to do this act, and as some trifling convenience may possibly result from it, (limited as it is proposed to make the power granted) I should have been quite indifferent as to the fate of this amendment, but for arguments of a very different kind from those urged by the Senator from Alabama, which have been offered in its support, by our Senators, who have declared their purpose to vote with him in its favor. To such arguments I can never yield even the assent of silence; and it is rather to contest their correctness and truth, than to oppose the amendment offered, that I have risen to address the Senate.

The Senator from Ohio Mr. [RUSSELL] has supported this amendment, because, as he supposes, it conveys no new power to the presiding officer of this body, but is merely declaratory of a pre-existing right of that officer, a right which that Senator styles "an inherent right," appertaining to him virtute officii, and which is derived not from our rules, but from the constitution itself. Now if it be true, that this power is derived to the presiding officer of this body from the constitution, from whence does the Senate acquire the right to limit and abridge the exercise of the constitutional authority of that officer? Gentlemen must either abandon this argument, which asserts an inherent right in the presiding officer of this body, derived to him under the constitution, virtute officii: or they must abandon this amendment, which proposes to limit and abridge this right. The distinction of a rule merely declaratory, will not serve to reconcile the direct repugnance of the two propositions. A mere declaration of right, asserts that which existed before, and leaves it to remain upon the ground of original right. It neither gives or takes away any thing. This amendment however limits and abridges the power, which it is supposed to declare as pre-existent under the Constitution. But no department of this government can limit or abridge the rights of any, derived under the Constitution. This amendment then must either be abandoned, or this doctrine of inherent right must be abandoned.

When the Senator from Ohio, and others who have argued like him, speak of inherent rights, and mean thereby rights not specially granted by the Constitution, but appertaining to their supposed possessors virtute officii merely, they urge no new doctrine, but repeat only what has often before been asserted, in many different forms, and always denied whenever it has been asserted. In this country, there are not now, and since 1776 never could be, any such inherent powers, in any of our Governments, or in any functionary under these governments. Here, all the powers of government, or of any of its officers, are delegated powers, the utmost extent and limit of which, is necessarily limited and defined by the grants under which they may be claimed; and beyond or beside these limits, no powers exist legitimately. In ancient institutions, whose origin and the extent of whose powers are hidden in the obscurity of remote antiquity, there exists some reason for this pretension of inherent rights. As to such institutions, the first we know of them is, that they then existed, and existed in the admitted exercise of powers, whence derived, or to what extending, we do not know. The right to the power claimed was therefore inferred from its admitted exercise; and the limit of this power is measured, by the nature and objects of the power so possessed. It is from such sources only that Kings derive their prerogatives, parliaments their undefined privileges, and ancient courts their jurisdiction. In this country, however, where all our institutions are newly created, and stand upon the foundation of written charters, where all our offices are created by written laws, defining their uses, and so limiting their authority, a claim to inherent power is contrary to the principles which produced such a state of things, and equally opposed to all sound construction of grants. Whatever rights exist here in public functionaries of any kind, exist not as inherent in the thing existing, but as granted to the thing created. Granted by its creator under the instrument creating it; and necessarily limited thereby, because it is a grant.

It is true, that when the instrument creating an office, instead of defining its powers, by an enumeration of all the qualities with which it is meant to endow the officer, effects this limitation in a description given by the use of some old and well known word, there the extent of the powers so granted must be sought for, in the meaning of the descriptive terms used. In such cases, we must recur to the approved definition of the well known terms employed, in order to measure the extent of the powers and rights thereby transferred. But having once ascertained what that definition is, the extent of the grant is limited thereby, as perfectly, as if all the qualities comprehended by the definition, had been inserted by appropriate names in the concession itself. It is thus we ascertain the limits of the powers of Congress over personal liberty, in the prohibition of the constitution to suspend the well known writ of Habeas Corpus. It is thus we derive many of the powers possessed by those bodies which are described by the well known term Courts. And it is thus we are secured in the enjoyment of the privilege of trial by Jury in criminal cases. It would be vain, however, to refer to these sources of power, to discover the right said to be inherent in the presiding officer of this body, of calling a member to order, for words spoken in debate.

The Vice President of the United States is made by the constitution the presiding officer of this body, and occupies in relation to the Senate, a position analogous to that which the President of the United States occupies in relation to the great body of the people, over whom, he too is called by the Constitution to preside. If then, it is true, that any inherent rights appertain to the one presiding officer, virtute officii as President of the Senate, inherent rights must also appertain to the other presiding officer, virtute officii as President of the United States. If the first of these gentlemen is authorized, in virtue of his undelegated but inherent right, to keep order in this body, the other gentleman is also authorized, in the same way, to keep order in the body over which he too presides, the great body of the people of the United States. You may call the inherent power of the one of these officers by the modest term of privilege, if you please, but I humbly conceive you can affix no appropriate name to the inherent, and undefined powers of the other, but that of prerogative; and no Senator, I persuade myself, can be found an open advocate for any such odious power as this, call it by what name you please, or locate it where you can.

This analogy between the President and Vice President is complete, and runs through. The President has the right, and is bound by his duty, I admit, to keep order in the body of the people of the United States. But how and why is he to do this? By taking care that their laws are faithfully executed, and that the powers especially delegated to him by the Constitution, are duly exerted within the limits of his prescribed authority. All this is specifically required of him by the Constitution itself; and without this special requirement, he could not perform one of his executive functions. If he may go beyond this limit, he enters immediately upon the boundless field of prerogative, whose most odious character is, that it is undefined; and then, who may say where he should stop? So too it is the right of the Vice President; and he is also bound by his duty, I admit, to keep order in the Senate. But how is he to do this? By taking care that their rules, which are their laws, are faithfully executed; and that all their powers, specially delegated to him by these rules, are duly exerted within the limit prescribed to him thereby. Without this special delegation of power by the rules of the Senate, the Vice President, as President of the Senate, could do no act, except to vote when this body is equally divided, which is the only authority given to him by the Constitution. The rules of the Senate are to their presiding officer, precisely what the Constitution and laws of the United States are to the President. The latter may not exercise any power beyond or beside the limits prescribed to him by this Constitution and these laws, nor may the former legitimately claim any power beyond or beside the limits prescribed to him by the rules of the Senate, except in the single case, before mentioned, the very specification of which in the Constitution, is conclusive to shew, that all others were intended to be thereby excluded.

If gentlemen will but settle in their own minds the meaning properly belonging to the terms we employ in this debate, I scarcely think they can differ in opinion. What is disorder, which we all agree ought to be suppressed? It is nothing more than a breach of order. And what is order, which every one conceits ought to be preserved? Nothing more than the observance of prescribed rules. None may prescribe rules to another, however, except he be superior to that other, or is specially authorized so to do by some common superior of both. Now can any gentleman read the Constitution, which specially authorizes the Senate to prescribe its own rules, and then say that such a power belongs to its presiding officer? Or is there any Senator prepared to concede, that in reference to this matter of prescribing rules of orderly proceeding for the Senate, the presiding officer, who has no authority given to him, is the superior of that body upon which the whole power over the subject is expressly conferred?

Mr. President, suppose that, instead of renouncing all pretension to this inherent power which is now claimed for you, you had asserted a claim to enjoy it, and that the Senate had denied the legitimacy of the claim. Does any one doubt, that, under their clear right to prescribe the rules of their own proceeding, the Senate might properly establish a rule converting what you might call disorder into order, or vice versa; and that you would be bound to obey this rule? But, if so, what becomes of this inherent right? You then would stand the mere minister, not of your own but of the Senate's will, bound to conform to their behests in all things, except in the single case provided for by the Constitution, in which the Senate being equally divided could have no will. And even as to this case, your power to bind the Senate is not enjoyed because it is an inherent power, but because it is a power specially delegated.

I ask of Senators who contend for this inherent right in the Chair, (which you, sir, have so properly, I think, disclaimed,) and who announce their purpose to vote for the adoption of this amendment, what will be their situation if this amendment is adopted, and a case arises, in which, upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair, the Senate should differ from their presiding officer, and reverse his decree? Will this inherent power, supposed to reside in the Chair, and to be derived from the Constitution itself, over-ride the power expressly delegated to the Senate, to prescribe their own rules of proceeding, and sustain the decision of the Chair, although reversed by the Senate? Or will the expressly granted powers of the Senate silence the supposed inherent right of the Chair and put down the reversed decree? If the two powers conflict, they cannot co-exist. The appeal must be either nugatory or efficient. It cannot be both. If the right of appeal is efficient, it can only be so because this supposed inherent right of the Chair is subordinate to the appellate power reserved by the Senate, and therefore not derived to the Chair from the Constitution. And if the right of appeal, which the amendment reserves, is nugatory, how can gentlemen justify to themselves the assertion of a high power, which they are prepared to abandon whenever the case arises wherein the power is to be exerted?

It has been said, that those who like me, deny the existence of this inherent power in the Chair, and who will not consent to give it as a granted power, because it may be abused, and by one not responsible to the Senate for such abuse, that we are complaining of the Constitution, which bestowed this character upon our presiding officer. I deny this. Our complaint, if any such has been uttered, is not against the Constitution, but against those who, according to our judgment, misinterpret that Constitution, when they assert such powers to be deduced from it. What is the power which it is said the Chair possesses under the Constitution? The right of stopping debate at the will of the presiding officer. Now, I had supposed, that at this day it was conceded by all, that the freedom of the press and the freedom of religion, were rights guaranteed by the Constitution, to all its subjects; and that all the legitimate powers of every department of this Government combined, could not deprive any citizen of either of these rights. All, however, must admit, I think, that the freedom of debate in the Legislative Halls, is a right as valuable, and as perfectly secured by the Constitution as the freedom of the press. If, then, the powers of all the departments of this Government combined, is not equal to restrain the one, which is the smaller, how can it be correct to argue, that the power of a single functionary of that Government is equal to restrain the other, which is the higher and more important privilege? The old distinction between liberty and licentiousness must not again be invoked to aid this purpose. The decree of the People has gone abroad, they have ruled, that this Government can not abridge the freedom, under the pretext of preventing the licentiousness of the press. That this licentiousness, when it exists, must be treated of by them when acting in a different capacity than as members of a Federal Union. That the appeal must be made to the States. So too here, if the freedom of debate in this body shall ever degenerate into licentiousness, the prevention and punishment of such an act, is not now, and never ought to be, confided to the discretion of its executive officer, who by the tenure of his office, is irresponsible to the body itself; but as in the other case, should always be restrained by the body itself, representing, as it does, the Sovereign States. If for the sake of their own convenience, the Senate shall choose to impose this as a duty on their presiding officer, and for the sake of security, shall guard its exercise as this amendment proposes to do, by retaining the right of appealing from his decision, I feel quite indifferent as to such a grant. But while a single Senator shall claim such a power for the Chair, as a right inherent in it, and derived to it, not from the Senate, but from the Constitution itself, I will oppose even such an amendment as this, lest the reasons of my vote may be misconceived, either by the Chair, or by any body else.

Mr. HAYNE said, there was but one question connected with this subject, which involved principle, or was in any degree material, and that was, whether the Vice President of the United States, as President of the Senate, virtute officii, had any power in relation to questions of order, except such as was conferred by the rules of this House? The Constitution declares, that the Vice President shall be President of the Senate. It makes him the presiding officer over this branch of the National Legislature, but how he is to preside, and by what rules he is to be governed, the Constitution is silent. The Constitution, however, expressly declares that this House shall prescribe "the rules of its own proceeding." And here is found the power, the only power, under which rules of order can be made applicable to this House. If the Vice President has any power in relation to this matter, except to expound and enforce such rules as the Senate may provide, deriving that power from the Constitution, he must possess it entirely free from our control. An inherent power must make him the sole and exclusive judge, without appeal, in all questions of order. There can be no limitation to such a power, but the discretion of the officer who is to exercise it. This construction would place the Senate at the feet of an officer, neither elected by, nor responsible to them. My construction of the Constitution is very different from this. I look upon the Vice President, when taking his seat, as President of this body, as standing precisely in the same situation as the Speaker of the House of Representatives. They are both presiding officers, but they must preside in conformity with the rules of the respective Houses. In these views, I understand every gentleman who has spoken on this subject (except two) to concur. The rights of the Senate, therefore, are sufficiently vindicated. But a distinction has been taken by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKENSON,] between the power of the President in relation to matters of decorum and in relation to the latitude and freedom of debate, which appears to me not to be well founded; the former, he contends, belongs to the President by virtue of his office, while the latter can only be derived from the rules of the Senate. The correctness of this distinction, I think, may be well doubted. For my own part, I cannot conceive how the President can possess any power in relation to the proceedings of this House, which is not conferred by the rules of this House. With respect to the class of cases which have been stated, such as a disturbance in the lobby, or a fray on the floor, and others of a similar character, the power of the President to enforce order is derived from the rules of the House. In matters of such minor importance, and so little liable to abuse, the practice of the House, for a long series of years, may well be regarded as constituting its rules. It is a species of common law of all deliberative bodies, that no violent interruption of their deliberations should be suffered. But there is a wide distinction between the exercise of this authority, by virtue of a rule of the Senate, express or implied, and the exercise of the same authority by virtue of certain inherent powers derived from the Constitution. In the former case the Senate may change the rule at pleasure; in the latter, the powers of the President would be beyond their control. Believing, from this view of the subject, that the Constitution has merely designated the Vice President, as the officer who is to preside over this House, and carry into effect its "rule or proceeding," just as the Speaker is to enforce the rules of the House over which he is to preside, it seems clear, that if the President possesses the power now in dispute, it must be under some rule either express or implied. Now if this was a subject on which we had no written rule, gentlemen might resort to the usage of the House, (if such had been the usage, which I do not believe to be the fact,) in order to show that the President possessed the power in question. But, on this subject, the existence of an express written rule, must prevent us from resorting to any other source for the powers of the President. The mode of proceeding in case of a violation of order, by words spoken in debate, is prescribed in terms that seem to admit of no doubt or question. The sixth and seventh rules declare in substance, that calls to order in such cases can only be made by a member. That the Senator, so called to order, shall take his seat, that the words objected to shall be reduced to writing, in order to enable the President to decide whether the speaker is in order or not. Now, let gentlemen compare this rule with the corresponding one in the House of Representatives. There, the rule provides that "the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order," &c. There, the Speaker is the officer whose duty it is to call to order, in the first instance. Here, the President is merely the judge, or umpire, between the Senators. The difference in our rules probably arising from the difference in the construction and character of the two Houses.

Powers of the Vice President.

[FEB. 12, 1828.]

With regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, I do not consider it very material whether it be adopted or not. That part of it which provides for an appeal from the decision of the Chair, I give my hearty assent to; and even if the amendment should fail, I shall propose to incorporate such provision with the existing rules. With respect to conferring on the Chair the power of regulating the freedom or latitude of debate, subject to an appeal of the Senate, it is a question merely of convenience—I do not believe, that in such a body as this, that it is at all material where the power is placed by the rules—whether in the hands of the Senate, or of the Chair, or of both: in any event, the occasion for its exercise can very seldom occur. I feel inclined, on the whole, to vote for the amendment, because I do not think that this power vested in the Chair, subject as is proposed in the amendment, to an appeal, would be liable to abuse, but more especially, because by adopting this new rule, we will put an end forever to the dangerous pretension that has been set up, not by the Chair, but for the Chair, of an inherent power, vested in the Vice President by the Constitution, of controlling, in a most alarming manner, the deliberations of this branch of the National Legislature.

Mr. EATON then rose and said, that he was convinced, from the course the debate had taken, the subject would not be decided this day, and having a proposition to make, which could not be made after this day, he hoped the Senate would concur in a motion to lay the report on the table.

This motion was then put and carried.

Mr. EATON then moved the reconsideration of the vote of the Senate given on Friday, on the bill for the relief of Abraham Ogden and others.

Mr. HAYNE wished to know the ground on which the gentleman made this motion.

Mr. EATON declined explaining at this time; and moved an adjournment.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1828.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments to the rules of the Senate, reported from the select committee appointed to revise the rules, together with the amendment offered by Mr. FOOT, to the 6th and 7th rules.

Mr. BARTON said that he was in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, upon its own merits, without any regard to the decision of the Chair in the memorable session of 1825-6, which had been so unnecessarily drawn into this debate. The present rule (the 6th) vests in the President of the Senate the arbitrary and tyrannical power to decide all questions of order without appeal, giving him the right, if he doubts, to take the sense of the Senate. The amendment barely proposes to settle the disputed power of the Chair to call members to order in debate, and to restore to the members of the Senate the right of appeal. This amendment, he said, would assimilate the proceedings of the Senate upon matters of order to those of the House of Representatives of the United States, and of all the legislative bodies of the several States of this Union, by restoring to the Senate their Constitutional power of determining in the last resort upon all their rules of proceeding, and was the more proper, because the presiding officer of the Senate is not appointed by, nor amenable to the Senate, as the presiding officers of most legislative bodies are.

Mr. B. said the argument that had been urged on this floor by one of the opponents of this amendment, (Mr. BENTON) that such a power in the President to call to order in debate, and then to decide the member to be out of order, would be making the President both accuser and judge, had no weight in it—nor, if it had, was it at all applicable to the amendment before the Senate. Every justice, and every conservator of the peace, would be liable to the same objection of being both accuser and judge, if the discharge of an official duty were to place him in the invidious character of an accuser. There was, he said, no similarity or just comparison between a court and the presiding officer of a deliberative assembly; and, if the objection were a valid one, it proved the presiding officers of almost all the legislative bodies in the Union guilty of the impropriety of acting this double character. He had been somewhat surprised, he said, to find the opposition to this amendment come from gentlemen who had heretofore expressed so much horror and fears for the public liberty, at the idea of clothing a presiding officer with too much power. Yet they are content to take the rules as presented by the select committee, leaving in the Vice President the extraordinary, if not the unconstitutional power of deciding all questions of order, even involving the great right of freedom of debate on this floor, without appeal. This amendment, he said, would restore the Senate to its constitutional exercise of power upon the proceedings of the body, which was much more necessary now the presiding officer is not of our own creation, than it could be in those bodies that create and may remove their presiding officer, should he abuse his powers. Mr. B. repeated, that the scenes of 1825-6 had been drawn into this debate most unnecessarily and uncalled for, as if by design to obtain from this Senate an indirect sanction or condemnation of the decision of the Chair, made at that session upon the subject of its powers to preserve order in debate. Those scenes should not have been interrupted in their passage to oblivion, nor unnecessarily recalled to revive the feelings of that memorable epoch in the history of the United States Senate. If, indeed, that subject had been revived by a friend of the Vice President with a view of obtaining the sense of this Senate upon that decision, he presumed the Vice President did not feel grateful to him for such friendship. That was a decision upon which members of this body differ widely in opinion. He hoped, he said, that our Vice President had more magnanimity and candor than to make pretence to infallibility; and he declared himself to be one of the members who believed that decision of the Chair to be erroneous. He believed the Chair possessed, and ought to have exercised, the power of confining members to or towards the subject before the body, independently of any of the rules printed in that blue book, (the printed rules of the Senate.) Let me suppose, said Mr. B., that this Senate, being a permanent and continuous body of but a small number of men, had gone on, as it might have done, without any written rules at all for its government, to perform the duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, what then would have been the power and the duty of the presiding officer? The Constitution says, in one brief sentence applicable to both Houses, "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." It does not say how the determination shall be made; whether the decisions of the Senate on each case as it might arise, growing up at length like the common law itself, into a code for the government of the body, shall be the rules of its proceedings; or, whether a set of arbitrary rules written a priori, and liable to be found either good or bad, upon experience, shall govern its proceedings. Either mode would be equally the determinations of the Senate, and equally obligatory on the members and the President. Nay, sir, the long-settled practice of this body, that has gone on with the sanction of many years, might be considered a more deliberate determination of the Senate than any literal rule, even were there a literal rule to the contrary. Upon what principle is it that we daily hear the Chair declare that the unanimous consent of the Senate will dispense with a written rule, even in cases where there is no written rule to authorize such dispensation? Is it not upon the plain principle that the power that can create, can dispense with the rule? This Senate has the same right to form for itself a parliamentary law or code for its own government, that the British Parliament or any other legislative body has. Precedents made in good times were the materials of which the great system of the common law itself, so highly and so justly eulogized the other day by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. ROWAN] was composed. Mr. B. said, it is an axiom derived from the experience of mankind, that we are not to look for those precedents that are worthy of being followed, or of entering into a code for our guide, to times of the highest and the worst of party excitements, such as the session of 1825-6 was. He should therefore look beyond that epoch to the halcyon days of the predecessor of the present presiding officer, and see what he [Mr. GAYLARD] did. He was placed in a situation that gave him decided advantages over the present presiding officer—a situation that gave peculiar weight and dignity to his decisions, and to the practice of the Senate under his long and benign administration. He presided in a time when the present rancor of party strife was unknown. He stood aloof, in that Chair, from the parties of the day. He was not looked to as the head of any great party in this nation, contending for rule; nor were his decisions subjected to the illiberal imputation of having any ulterior object in view. Drawing precedents, then, from those times, (for his experience, he said, did not enable him to go back beyond that administration,) he considered the law of the Senate clearly settled, that the Vice President possessed, and ought to have exercised, the power of restraining the wholly irrelevant latitude of debate of that period, which has been so unnecessarily drawn into review upon the discussion of this amendment.

The officer to whom he had alluded [Mr. GAYLARD] was in the constant practice of preserving order in the body, by calling back a rambling member to the subject before the Senate, when he had gone entirely from it, even in language of the most decent and orderly style.

True, he did those things in so mild and affable a manner that the member himself did not feel that he had been reproved; and the audience who witnessed the exercise of the power, left the Senate Chamber without the impression that any member had been out of order. His authority was the long practice of the Senate, sanctioning Mr. Jefferson's Manual as their parliamentary law, in conjunction with their few positive rules and practical determinations. Those long practices of the body, in its best days, with the uninterrupted sanction of the Senate, he contended, were as fair and as Constitutional a determination of our rules of proceedings as if they had been written down and printed upon paper or parchment, subject to constant change, as experience should afterwards either approve or condemn them. He thought, indeed, such long practice was the best mode of forming a code for the government of the Senate. He went on to instance some cases in which the present presiding officer had, as he thought, exercised the general power of preserving order in cases where the written rules of the Senate were silent, as if an innumerable train of amendments should be offered consecutively to each other; and in cases of considering votes carried or rules dispensed with, where no objection was heard: all which owed its authority to the unwritten practice or determination of the body.

Mr. B. concluded by observing that he had no intention to revive the old slang of the old parties of this country; but he thought the amendment much more republican in its character than the present rule giving the Chair the arbitrary and final decision upon questions of order; a power which, in bad times of high party rancor, might be abused in a manner the most oppressive and tyrannical. He did not think the political friends of the Vice President ought to reject the offer of the other side of this House to settle the disputed power and duty of the Chair, to restrain the irrelevant or disorderly latitude of debate, restoring, at the same time, the right of appeal to the Senate, as a check upon the decisions of the presiding officer. He should, therefore, give to this amendment the support of his vote.

Mr. BELL, of New Hampshire, said, it is made a question in this discussion, whether the presiding officer of the Senate possesses, by virtue of his office, the power of preserving order in the Senate in any case where the Senate have not expressly enjoined it upon him as a duty, by their rules. I have always considered this as incident to duty of presiding over a deliberative body. I believe it to be a sound principle of construction, that, where the Constitution creates an office, and imposes upon the person holding that office a specific duty, that it invests him, by a necessary implication, with such power as will enable him to perform that duty in a useful and efficient manner. This rule will be found to be invariably correct in every case where it is not necessary to derive the power through a legislative act.

The Constitution creates the office of Vice President, and expressly imposes upon him the specific duty of presiding over the deliberations of the Senate. That duty cannot be performed, either usefully or efficiently, without the power of preserving order. The power to preserve order must therefore be necessarily incident to the office. The Senate itself cannot divest the Vice President of this power, because he holds it from the Constitution; but they may enlarge, or limit, or modify it, because this power is expressly vested in that body by the Constitution. When the Constitution gives to the Vice President the power of presiding over the Senate, it refers him to the well known usages of all legislative bodies for the extent and nature of his powers and duties. It was necessary that he should be invested with this power, because it was to be exercised from the first moment the Senate assembled, and before it was possible that they could establish rules for this purpose. There could be no as-signable motive why the power so universally held and exercised by the presiding officers of all other deliberative bodies, should be withholden from the Vice President, since the Constitution gives to the Senate the power of modifying the rules he should adopt, or establishing others, as this body should think fit. The Vice President is required by the Constitution to conform to, and regulate his conduct, as a presiding officer, by the rules so amended or modified. Should he, from culpable motives, refuse or neglect to conform to rules so established, he would be liable to impeachment and removal from office. Every exercise of the power of preserving order, however different in character, rests on the same principle for support. When the presiding officer calls the attention of the members to business, or commands silence, he is performing an act of preserving order, equally as when he requires a member to adhere to the rules of decorum in debate. The same power which authorizes the one, authorizes the other; any attempt to distinguish between them is destitute of even a colorable foundation.

But should we believe that the language of the Constitution, which invests the Vice President with the power of preserving order in the Senate, to be ambiguous, has not that ambiguity been removed, and its meaning long since settled by the uniform practice of all the presiding officers of the Senate, and that, too, by the assent and approbation of the Senate? That construction of the Constitution which gives to the Vice President the power of preserving order in cases where the Senate have not established any rules, is not of modern date, nor established with a view to any temporary object, but is as old as the Constitution itself. It commenced with the existence of this Government, and was continued without interruption for thirty-five years. Within that time, some of the ablest men this country has ever produced have presided in the Senate. When I name Jefferson and Gaillard as of the number of those presiding officers of the Senate, who believed that the Constitution invested the Vice President with this power, no man will have occasion to blush when he admits that he holds the same opinion. These were not of that class of men who are prone to claim or exercise powers which do not legitimately belong to them.

Mr. Jefferson, in his Manual, compiled expressly for the use of the Senate, declares expressly, that the Vice President possesses this contested power and gives us to understand distinctly that such had been the uniform practice in the Senate. Mr. Gaillard was a member of the Senate more than twenty years, and for a great length of time discharged the duties of a presiding officer in it. His character is well known to every member of this body. It will not be denied, that, to an unassuming and discriminating mind, he united a knowledge of the rules of proceeding in legislative bodies seldom equalled. That he not only adopted, but carried into practice, constant and uniform practice, the power of preserving order in the Senate, which Mr. Jefferson affirmed, but which is now denied to be Constitutionally vested in the Vice President, is known to many of the members of this body. It is true that all these distinguished men may have entertained erroneous opinions on this question, but I cannot admit it, unless upon stronger evidence than any I have yet heard. If the question were to be settled by the authority of names—and questions seem to be sometimes so settled—it would require no ordinary weight of such authority to outweigh that of such men as I have named, and several others that I might have named. I do not contend that this is the only way in which it should be settled, but I must be permitted to say that a construction of the Constitution so long and satisfactorily settled, and by such men, should not be overturned without great deliberation and reflection upon the consequence likely to result from it. By the unexpected course which the discussion of this question has taken, I have felt myself called upon to express my opinion on this question, and the grounds of that opinion. I have done it with reluctance, and with great respect for those who entertain a different opinion. It is a question on which an honest difference of opinion may exist, and as such it should be considered and treated. I do not feel any deep interest in the adoption of the amendment under consideration; yet, as I believe it will conduce to the better preservation of order under the present construction of the powers of the presiding officer of the Senate, I will give it my support.

Mr. ROWAN said, he thought there ought to be but little difficulty upon this subject. Happily for the people of this country, they are the legitimate depositary, or rather proprietors of all the power which they had not specifically delegated. As a man, the gentleman who presided in the Senate, had no more power than any other of the millions who composed the U. States. Whatever power he possessed then must belong, either to his office of Vice President of the United States, or as President of the Senate. As Vice President, he certainly possessed no power, which he could exercise in, or over the Senate. The powers which he possessed in that character, were defined, but inert powers, held in reserve, which could not be exerted, until the contingency should happen, which alone could awaken and draw them out into exercise. The little power which he could exercise in the Senate, he could exert, not in his character of Vice President of the United States, but in his character of President of the Senate. His Vice Presidency of the United States made him President of the Senate; and being thus made President of that body, whatever power he could exert then, was in virtue of the latter, not the former character; as President, not as Vice President. He thought it a circumstance of great felicitation to the American People, that their Government was not so old, as to furnish a pretext for the inference of power from office. Much less, to justify the exercise of implied powers, by any of the officers. That was the evil under which the old governments of the world groaned. And although he wished this Government to be interminable, yet he did not wish it to live longer than it could exhibit the character of its powers. And whenever the government should have to look through the mists of antiquity at its Charter; or, in other words, whenever its Charter shall be dimmed with age, he hoped it would be renewed. And that the springs and principles of our liberty would derive increased vigor from each renewal. He considered it matter of some regret that our habits of thought led us imperceptibly to infer power from office, rather than to refer to our Constitution for the specific and definite powers conferred by that instrument upon the office. The habit was, he said, though unfortunate, not unnatural. In the country with which we were originally connected, and from the dominion of which we had so gloriously escaped, all power was derived from the King. He was the source of the inherent power of the government. And the power claimed to be exercised by the officers of the government, was, like his, supposed to be inherent. If the King did not complain, then was no one else to do so. The people had neither act, nor part, in the matter; with them, it was matter of indifference, whether the officer or the King possessed it, they did not. Let whoever might possess it, they were the subjects of, not the agents in, its exercise. In fact they were interested in maintaining, rather than denying the doctrine of inherent power, in the functionaries. Because they had more to fear from consolidated than divided power. Division weakens power, as it does every thing else. And when power was claimed by implication as belonging to an officer, they knew that it was not inherent in the officer, it was inherent in the King. And that the inherent stock of the King would be weakened by so much, as was inherent in the officer. They were led of course to acquiesce in the doctrine of inherent power. But the very reverse is happily the case with us. Here the people are the fountain and source of power—what the King was there, the people are here—whatever power was inherent in him there, is here inherent in the people—whatever power belongs with us to any office, is equally conferred, by the Constitution, or by legislative act. Power with us, thank God, and our Revolutionary Fathers, is not abused or magnified, by either religious or political superstition. It is enveloped in no mystery, we are not, we ought not to be bewildered, with vague and indefinite notions of inherent official power. Our plan of government addresses itself to our understanding, not to our credulity—it invokes our reason not our faith. Sir, said he, government with us, is a simple, rational, common sense matter. While it continues to be so, we will be free; when it ceases to be so, our liberty ceases. While we are jealous, and watchful, and, he would add, distrustful of our public functionaries, we should be safe. But, the moment we yielded to the exercise of inherent, undefined power, by our officers, we were in danger. Sir, said Mr. R., this case presents to intelligent observers a rare spectacle, and as honorable to the officer to whom it relates, as it is rare. When did it happen, in any Government before, that a high public functionary, disclaimed the exercise of power, which was supposed to belong to his office, supposed by even his enemies, to be inherent in his office? When before did it happen, that the personal and political enemies of an officer insisted upon the enlargement, by implication, of his official power? Sir, the case is singular in both its features. And, if the example of the present incumbent shall always be followed, by all the officers of this Government, the freedom of the people will be eternal. And why should it not be followed? Is it not, when closely examined, as degrading to the officer, as it is injurious to the public, that he should be discontented with the power, which he legitimately possesses, and attempt to exert dubious and undefined powers? Sir, if there be one act of a high public functionary, which more than another ought to exalt him in the estimation of freemen, and entitle him to their confidence, it is his declining the exercise of doubtful or implied powers.

The division of sentiment in the Senate, in relation to the power of the Vice President, to call a member to order, for words spoken in debate, is conclusive of the dubious character, (to speak the best of it,) of the power. Had he assumed and exercised it, his assumption of it would probably have been acquiesced in by the Senate, and a precedent would thus have been formed, which might have been but the beginning of a course, which would, eventually, by the four precedents, have thrown that body into a state of subserviency to the Chair. That, Sir, is the course of all illicit power. It gradually enlarges itself, and, by stealing imperceptibly upon the people, destroys their liberty. He is a rare instance of patriotic devotion to the liberty of the country, who will decline to enlarge official power, by implication, and still more rare, who will refuse to exercise it, when it is attempted to be obtruded upon him—away then, with those innuendoes of censure upon the Vice President, for declining the exercise of this imputed power. Sir, the people will interpret these innuendoes, and display their regard for them, by volumes of increased confidence in the officer.

But, said Mr. R. let us for a moment examine more minutely into this power of the Vice President to call a member from the Senate to order, for words spoken in debate. The Constitution provides for the election of the Vice President—defines his power and prescribes his duties. They are all held in reserve for a possible vacancy in the Presidential chair. In short, Sir, there are two Presidents elected. The first, for use—the second, to be used, when the first becomes useless, by death, or otherwise. The second is to fill the place of the first, when it becomes vacant; and is, in that case, to exercise plenary Presidential powers. So that the two Presidents, when they respectively act in the sphere for which they were designed, have precisely the same powers. The election of the Vice President is a cautionary measure, to guard against an interregnum. His destiny is, though contingent, elevated. He is dignified by the choice of the people, and placed in the chair of the Senate, to await the current of events, in state of dignified quasi repose, until by the death, impeachment, or resignation of the President, he shall be called upon to exert the powers of President. Sir, he is placed in the Chair of the Senate, in a state of preservation, (if the expression may be allowed,) for use, when the occasion shall occur. He is politically embalmed in the chair of the Senate, awaiting the resurrection, which the death, political or natural, of President, had been ordained by the Constitution to produce. The power conferred upon him by the Constitution, as President of the Senate, is touched in the following words:—"The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided." It would be strange that he should be restrained from voting in, or speaking to any question; and yet permitted to silence any, and of course, successively. Every member of that body, denied the power of speaking, and yet, empowered to check the freedom of debate in that body! Not permitted to open his own lips in the Senate, and yet allowed to throw a pad-lock upon the lips of every member of the Senate!

Sir, said Mr. R. reasoning fairly upon the clause of the Constitution which I have just read, it is impossible to arrive at the conclusion, that you, as President of the Senate, possess the power asserted for you from the other side of the House. The words of the clause do not confer it; and if implication were admissible, it cannot be rationally enforced. This clause, said Mr. R. is the only one in the Constitution which relates to the occupation of the chair of the Senate, by the Vice President of the United States. The only one which confers upon him the power of action in that body; and limits it to the single power of giving the casting vote in the case of division, and with great reason, too. The Senators are the Representatives of the States: they are the constitutional advisers of the President. The Vice President belongs to the Executive Department. He is a dormant President. Ought he to have the power to check the Senators in any effort, which it might become their duty to make, to check encroachments by the Executive on the rights and liberty of the people? Would it have been wise in the Constitution to have conferred on the Vice President the power of controlling the deliberations of the Senate. Would it be well in the Senate to subject, by implication, the exercise of their legitimate power, to his control. The Senate were evidently intended to check the Executive Department, to protect the sovereignties of the States from Executive encroachments. They are elected for six years with an eye to this checking power. The Vice President and President are elected but for four years. The Senate are to be the triers of them both in case of impeachment. So that whether we are governed by the words of the Constitution, or by any reasonable inference drawn from the organic structure of the government, the regulating or controlling power, asserted for the Vice President, is wholly inadmissible. The exercise of such a power would be an inversion of the order assigned by the Constitution to the great powers of the government. A violation of the obvious and express intention of its framers. I do not, said Mr. R., believe that you possess the power, and I will not consent to invest you with it. It ought to be presumed of the Senate, composed as it must be, of men advanced in years, elected by sovereign States, that they would not be disorderly; that they could prescribe, and enforce for themselves, rules of order. If, Sir, said he, there be inherent power any where in this House, it is the inherent power of the Senate to regulate and maintain the order necessary to its own deliberations.

Powers of the Vice President.

[Feb. 12, 1828.]

It is a deliberative body—order is necessary to its deliberations. The power of maintaining the order is necessarily implied in the object of its institution. But upon this subject we are not left to implication. It should never be resorted to, but in cases of the most imperious necessity. That necessity does not exist, for the Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its own proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

Here then, Sir, the power which has been asserted for the Vice President, is expressly given to the Senate; the power of making its own rules of order, and punishing, even to expulsion, for the violation of them.

The President is not a member of the Senate, is not responsible to them—cannot be punished or expelled for disorder. He cannot participate in determining the rules, or in punishing, for their violation; can it then be supposed that he possesses inherently, virtute officii, the power of silencing, and seating a member for disorder?

Sir, said Mr. R., the Senate can confer upon the Vice President the power in contest—they can confer it by rule. The rule now under discussion proposes to do so, and in the very proposition to confer the power, proclaims, by resistless implication, that you do not possess it.

He said, that he not only denied that you possess the power, but denied that you ought to possess it. He should therefore vote against so much of the rule as proposed to confer on you this power, and for so much of it, as proposed to take from you the power which you possessed under a former rule. That of deciding (when one Senator was called to order by another,) the point of order, without appeal, and these votes he should give, not from any apprehension that the powers would be abused, by the present incumbent—not from any want of confidence in him, but because he thought the delegation of the power unnecessary, unwise, and unsafe. It was, he said, a principle with him, that power should never be delegated, which could be exercised, as well by the principal, as the agent. The people should never delegate power, which they could exercise as beneficially themselves, as it could be exercised by their agents, and so in relation to every other body—power delegated may be abused, and in a matter so important as liberty, the hazard of having their power abused, should never be incurred, but in cases of absolute necessity.

He would barely add in conclusion, that if the power, asserted for the Vice President, was inherent, it was not possessed by the Senate, and of course could not be conferred by them. If possessed by the Senate, the Vice President cannot be in the possession of it, and he thought it unwise, he repeated, to confer it.

Mr. WHITE was of opinion that the presiding officer had not the power of calling to order, for words spoken in debate. That, he said, was entirely distinct from the power of deciding on common questions of order. The existing rules of the Senate, said Mr. W., do not confer this power, and if they do not, the presiding officer does not possess it. Mr. W. was not aware, that any member had expressed the opinion, that the rules of the Senate conferred on its President the power of calling to order, for words spoken in debate—but if any member entertains such an opinion, a simple recurrence to the 6th and 7th rules, will satisfy him to the contrary. What is the effect of those rules? "When a member is called to order, he shall take his seat; and the member calling him to order shall reduce the exceptionable words to writing, and then the presiding officer decides whether he is in or out of order. Now will any gentleman say, that the presiding officer can call a Senator to order, reduce his words to writing, and then pass judgment on the very words taken down by himself? Is not this contrary to reason and common sense? We cannot, said Mr. W., act in direct contradiction to the express rules of the Senate. By these it is left to his brother members to call an offending member to order, the words believed to be exceptionable are to be reduced, to writing, and then the President decides. This is the power delegated, and the presiding officer possesses no other. If then this is the effect of the rules of the Senate, it is not competent to the presiding officer, to tell any member in the course of debate that he is out of order. All officers of the Government, said Mr. W., possess powers conferred by some express grant, or fairly to be inferred from it. They possess none other whatever, and the assumption of any power not expressly granted, will always be viewed by the people with a jealous eye.

Was it intended, asked Mr. W., that the presiding officer should dictate to members of independent States? If he has the power which gentlemen contend for, why is that very power conferred in express terms on the Senate itself by the Constitution? He asked of gentlemen to say, which of the two rules should be paramount—the one expressly made by the Senate, or the one brought in by the Vice President himself. Two distinct and conflicting set of rules cannot exist at one and the same time in the same body. Sir, said Mr. W. the powers which belong to this body are one thing, and those which belong to the presiding officer are another. The President of the Senate is not to devise, expound, and enforce its rules in virtue of his office, according to his own mere will and pleasure—he is merely the organ of the body, and that body confers just such powers as are necessary to carry on its operations in the manner most conducive to the public good, and no more. It belongs exclusively to the Senate according to the Constitution, to make, or devise the rules, and to the presiding officer to expound and give them effect. All must admit the Senate is vested with the power to establish the rules by express grant; now if it be true, that the President, virtute officii or inherently possesses the same power, how shall we get along, if the Senate establishes one set of rules, and the President another, inconsistent with them? Which shall be enforced? The doctrine that powers had been conferred by usage and length of time, he protested against. Would gentlemen point out where those who had exercised such powers obtained them? To tell him that distinguished men had presided over the deliberations of this body was to tell him what every person knew—but because a doubtful power had been exercised by distinguished men, did that sanction the usurpation? The gentleman from S. Carolina, [Mr. SMITH,] tells us of his having been called to order, compelled to sit down, and refused an appeal—but, Sir, said Mr. W. the gentleman who called him to order was not the Vice President of the United States—he was a member of this body, put into that office by ourselves, and amenable to our authority. The gentleman being able to specify only one case, and in that one, the question of power not raised or considered, Mr. W. could not deem it a precedent of any importance. But, Sir, said he, if precedent were filed upon precedent, I never can believe the exercise of such power to be correct—I should be just as ready to vote against his being possessed of this power of silencing a Senator in the midst of debate, then as now. Mr. W. denied then that the presiding officer has any powers except such as are expressly conferred on him by the Constitution or by the Senate, and concluded by observing that the time might arrive when the individual presiding over the Senate might think he can devise better rules, by virtue of some implied or inherent power, than those framed by the Senate and thus the most pernicious results might ensue.

Should a majority of the Senate think proper to vote for the first part of the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, and thus confer the power upon the President by an express rule, he would then think it of much importance, that the second part of the amendment, which gives an appeal to the House from his decisions, a matter of much importance. He would never agree that the decision of any one man, be him whom he may, shall finally conclude such a question and silence a member delivering his sentiments in his own language.

[Mr. VAN BUREN here rose and spoke at considerable length; and his speech not being inserted in its proper place, it is necessary to explain the cause. In preparing his remarks for the newspaper, Mr. V. B. incorporated those of this day, and those of the succeeding day, in one speech. As in the subsequent part of this day's report it will be perceived that several gentlemen allude to Mr. VAN BUREN's remarks, we refer the reader to his incorporated speech in the debate of the 13th inst. The reporter did not feel at liberty (and indeed it would have been very difficult) to dismember the speech, so as to place the relative portions in the order in which they actually occurred.]

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. said, if, in discussing this rule before the Senate, references to past occurrences had been made, it could not be imputed to him. He was not among those who had invoked its discussion. The committee had reported their amendments of the rules, which were acted upon by the Senate, and the sixth and seventh rules had passed sub silentio, and would have been permitted to rest as they were, had not the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] called the attention of the Senate back to them, by alluding to the decision which had been made in 1825, upon the construction of these rules.

He was aware that very opposite opinions had been entertained in the Senate when the question arose in 1825; but what that diversity of opinion was, or how it was settled, he knew not. He had not permitted himself even to inquire either for the one or the other. He knew much had been said in the public prints, and the public mind had been agitated, in no small degree, by it. And to avoid a recurrence of so unpleasant a nature in future, since the subject had been introduced, he certainly thought it by all means advisable that it should now be acted upon; and let the rules for the maintenance of good order and decorum in the Senate be rendered as perfect as possible, independent of that courtesy which had heretofore so highly distinguished the Senate.

He knew that considerable agitation had existed on former occasions, and these were not the halcyon days that seemed to invite to repose. And whatever gentlemen might think upon the rule as it now stood, he could see no possible objection to making it explicit. It could not prevent the exercise of courtesy, and might promote it. At present, they were calculated to produce that effect, as great difference of opinion existed upon their true construction. That there was a power to preserve order, was admitted on all hands; but in whom that power was vested created the doubt and produced the argument. Some were of opinion that it was vested in the Chair, while others strenuously contended that it belonged only to the Senators, individually and collectively. It was surely time to put the matter to rest, and let the Senate know, distinctly, where the power was located.

For his own part, he never had a doubt but that the President of the Senate had the right to call to order. The very nature of his office implies that power. He was not one of those who relied upon constructive powers where they were not expressly given, but in this case he had the invariable practice of the Senate, from its commencement in 1769, up to the session of 1825, a term of 36 years, to sanction this opinion. He recollected very well that he had himself been called to order by the President of the Senate, more than once. On one occasion, a gentleman in the chair, [Mr. GAILLARD,] for whose memory he entertained the most profound respect, had called him to order for words spoken in debate, when he, Mr. S. himself, conceived he was correct, which induced him to appeal to the Senate, and was again told by the Chair, there was no appeal from his decision; and the Senate supported the Chair.

Gentlemen had contended that this power did not, nor ought, to belong to the President of the Senate. They looked upon the principle as monstrous, and as threatening future consequences of a most serious nature. Others deprecated the idea of placing the power of governing forty-eight Senators, and checking the freedom of speech, in the hands of an individual, who was not a member of the Senate; and who might become a tyrant and control the freedom of debate in that body to the destruction of the liberties of the people.

Mr. S. said we must take things as they were, and not as they possibly might be. It was fair to suppose the people of the United States never would place a tyrant in that Chair. If they should, the Senate had the constitutional means of controlling him. This they could do in an instant, by giving an appeal from his decision to the Senate; and his tyranny would be at an end. That the President was not a Senator, was no argument against his having this power. Gentlemen seem to have forgotten that the abuse of this power may be as great when trusted to a Senator as it would be in the hands of the President. And, as we have entered upon the wide field of supposition, let us, for a moment, suppose the President of the Senate, this tyrant or monster, who would exercise the power, if he had it, of calling a member to order, that he might silence him in debate. Could he not do it with a much better grace, as the rule now stands, of which gentlemen seem not to complain, by a collusion with a member, to call to order such other member as he might wish to silence, and then interpose the power, which all agree he possesses, of declaring him out of order, from which there is no appeal, and silence him at once? Any man disposed to play the tyrant in that Chair, would much rather divide the responsibility in that way, with a member, as he can now do as the rule stands, than take it upon himself alone.

Another argument had been urged to prove that the President had no power, but as it was conferred; that the Senate elect their own Committees. If this argument proves any thing, it proves too much; because the President, from the commencement of the Government, until 1816, a term of 27 years, exercised the power exclusively, of appointing the Committees. It was then given to the Senate to appoint by ballot, by a rule of the Senate, and so continued until 1823, when it was again given to the President; and in 1826, was taken from him and given to the Senate again by a rule. He has thus been exercising these powers alternately with the Senate, but in a much greater proportion of time. Although not a Senator, he is a component part of this body: has a vote; has the power of appointing Committees, ex officio, and has exercised that power, without a rule of the Senate, for the first 27 years of the existence of this body, and was, by a rule only, dispossessed of it.

Who was the proper person to preserve order but the Chairman? What was the custom? The analogy was too strong to be resisted. Look at every other public body in the civilized world, whether civil, religious, or political, and it is ex officio the duty of the Chairman or President to call to order. Look at the numerous public meetings of the People, which we see published every day in the newspapers. We see it announced that A. B. was called to the chair; and we likewise invariably see it, that A. B. called the meeting to order, in the first instance. It is the invariable practice of the British House of Commons, for the Speaker to call to order. It is the invariable practice of the presiding officer in every Legislative Body in the United States, to keep order in their respective Bodies, and if a member wanders from the question in debate, to call him to order.

If the uninterrupted practice of the Senate for the 36 first years of its existence, for the President, in all cases, and more especially if a member wander from the question before the Senate, in debate, to call him to order, and bring him back to that question, can weigh any thing, or if the analogy of the universal usage in all other Legislative bodies, and all public assemblies whatever, that look to their presiding officers to perform the office of calling to order, as an official duty, can have any weight in bringing us to a fair conclusion, we cannot doubt but that it belongs to the Chair, ex vi termini, to call to order. What higher duty can be required of the Chair? Merely putting the question upon bills and resolutions, is certainly a minor duty. Such a duty as could well be discharged by an additional Clerk, as the reading is now by the Secretary.

One gentleman had said, there was 48 Senators in this House, either of whom could call to order. It is admitted. But suppose any one Senator should so far forget himself as to make, in the course of his argument, indecorous and unkind remarks upon any other member to whom he might be opposed, that were foreign to the subject before the Senate; could it be expected that the member assailed would rise to call the other to order in his own defence? There is no man of delicate sensibility who would do so. It would be a task too invidious for a member who was not assailed, to take up the subject. And to what extravagance would it not lead, were the President to fold his arms and sit silent? Or suppose the question before the Senate to be upon an appropriation for a turnpike road, and a Senator should rise in his place, and address the Chair upon the subject of an Indian treaty, or upon a naval expedition, for an hour, without once touching the subject submitted by the Chair, for the consideration of the Senate; could the President of the Senate sit in dignified silence? It is impossible to imagine he would.

The Constitution of the United States has said, the Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate. Then is it fit that we should say, it would be dangerous to confide to him what you would confide to a single Senator; one elected by the United States at large, and the other by a single State? He could not see the compatibility of such arguments himself.

Mr. S. said, his object was not to arm the President of the Senate with new and dangerous powers, but to strip him of what he considered the most despotic power, which he now held, and which, in conjunction with a single Senator, he could wield to a more dangerous extent, than even that which gentlemen had portrayed a change of the rule would give him. He wished to invest him with a responsible power, but not a dangerous one—a power of calling a member to order, without the despotic power of silencing him. Therefore, if there are any doubts upon this question, let the amendment be adopted, which gave an appeal from his decision to the Senate. To this he could see no possible objection, because in it he could see no hazard, either to the public interest or to the rights of the Senators. As it now stood, there were both. The right of appeal from the decision of the Chair would be a source of gratification, whilst it would secure to all parties, security from oppression, if any could arise.

His sole object was to give the right of appeal, and to divest the rule of its doubtful character. He would acquiesce in any thing that would no longer leave the subject in dubio, and would, at the same time, secure the right of appeal. He should, therefore, vote for the proposed amendment, which would leave no ground for future controversy.

Mr. KANE said he would in a few words express his opinion upon this subject. He agreed that the true question was—Has the President of this body the right to call a Senator to order for words spoken in debate? He did not agree with those gentlemen who thought the President had no power to call a Senator to order, in any case, by virtue of his office. He would cease to be the President of a deliberative body could he not preserve that order which was essential to preserve deliberation. He can suppress noise and disturbances, because the functions of his office cannot be exercised without it. Words spoken in debate, per se, cannot be considered disorderly.

The President cannot declare them out of order without the right of interfering with, and in some degree controlling our deliberations. The distinction was this: The President may preside over but not interfere with the deliberations of the Senate. Such a power as the latter would be incompatible with the organic principles of the body. If the President may designate what particular words are in or out of order, the discussions here will not be free. The States are no longer represented in their sovereign character. I am free to admit that no apprehensions are to be entertained on this account of any abuse of such power, should it be conferred, but upon the principle of the question he had made his decision.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he rose with great reluctance to trespass a second time, but when he was told that the affirmative vote on the amendment now before the Senate, carried with it certain necessary inferences, he felt bound to put away from him all such supposed inferences, and to state distinctly the reasons which governed him. He could say with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH,] he had no agency in provoking this discussion. It had grown out of circumstances not immediately connected with the report of the Committee, and to which the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] had made direct reference by a question proposed to the Chairman.

It was not his wish to indulge remark on the occurrences to which allusion had been made, but gentlemen on the other side would persist in having opinions on that subject expressed, and they had felt themselves authorized to say, the opinion of nearly all who had spoken; and they seemed to infer, therefore, that at least a very large proportion of the Senate believed the course pursued on that occasion by the presiding officer, was correct. He had said yesterday, and still thought, this was not the time or the occasion to discuss a question in which other persons were intimately concerned, who are not now present, and which is not regularly brought before us.

The honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN,]* has said, if he were disposed to adopt the most effectual means of sustaining the late opinions of the Chair, he could devise none more appropriate than this amendment, and that the necessary inference arising from an affirmative vote on this question, is, that the President had not before the power which this new rule will give to him.

Mr. VAN BUREN explained.

Mr. C. said, there was no choice left to them on the subject. We think the President, under the existing rules, has the power, primarily, to call to order; we think he ought to exercise it—that it is a salutary power, and its exercise greatly conducive to the despatch of business and our own peace. How are we to be gratified? The presiding officer, on a former occasion, said he had no authority to call a member to order for words spoken in debate, until a member had invited his interposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT remarked, that the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS,] mistook the decision of the Chair on the occasion alluded to, in supposing that it had decided against the power of calling to order. The decision was, that the Chair had not the power of calling to order, for words spoken in debate. The Chair does not doubt its power of calling to order in many cases, for it is in fact in the daily exercise of such power. As much misapprehension seemed to prevail, as to the opinion of the Chair, of the extent of its power, with the indulgence of the Senate, it would concisely state its opinion.

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

The Constitution provides that the Vice President be President of the Senate, and that each House shall prescribe its rules, and punish for disorderly conduct.

It is a fair presumption, that it was not the intention of the authors of that instrument, to delegate the same powers to the Senate and its presiding officer; and in order to ascertain what powers were really delegated to the Vice President, as the President of this body, it is only necessary to know what were the powers conferred on the Senate by the Constitution in reference to the subject in discussion. Those powers, fortunately for the decision of this question, admitted of no doubt. The power of making rules, and of punishing for disorderly conduct, are expressly delegated to the Senate. The power of punishing involved that of judging. In the Senate, then, was clearly vested, by the Constitution, the legislative and judicial powers over its own proceedings, which leaves to the presiding officer the ministerial power of the body only, which is neither more nor less than the power of applying the rules of the Senate to its proceedings.

The exercise of this power involved the right of calling to order, or what was the same thing, of directing the attention of the Senate to instances of infraction of its own rules—which would explain the various instances of its exercise by the Chair, referred to by some of the Senators in the debate. In the very unpleasant instance referred to by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKINSON,] the Chair did not hesitate in making the call; not for words spoken—either by the Senator from Virginia, or from Massachusetts, both of whom, [Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. LLOYD,] have since ceased to be members of this body. The Senator from Virginia, on that occasion, was in possession of the floor, and, by the rules of the body, no other Senator had a right to rise until he had finished, except to call to order. As soon as the Chair perceived that the object of the Senator from Massachusetts was not to make a call to order, it interfered, as was its duty, under the rules. Supposing that the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] who had risen on the occasion to make a call to order, intended his call for words spoken by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. R.] the Chair directed that the words should be reduced to writing, in conformity with the seventh rule; but it is inclined to think that it misconceived the object of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. K.] in making the call to order.

The tapping on the table, which was alluded to by the Senator from New Hampshire, as instances, in fact, of calls to order, the Senate would find justified under the second rule, which provides that no member shall speak to another, or otherwise interrupt the business of the Senate, or read any newspaper, while the Journal or other public papers are reading, or when any member is speaking in debate. In the case alluded to by the Senator from Missouri of pronouncing questions out of order, the Senate would see the source of the power in the rule which prescribes the order in which questions should have priority.

There being no rule that would authorise the Chair to call to order for words spoken in debate, it became a serious question, which deliberately engaged the attention of the Chair, whether it possessed the power from any other source, which resulted in the conviction that it did not. This opinion was made known, on the first suitable occasion.

The Chair perceived that such a power could not be claimed under the Constitution, without subverting powers clearly invested in the Senate by the Constitution. If that instrument granted such power at all, the Chair would possess it, beyond the control of the body, even in the shape of an appeal, and to the extent to which its own judgment might dictate. Hence, if it were doubtful as to the existence of such uncontrollable powers, and of such dangerous character, wisdom enjoined that the doubt should prevent its exercise.

Could it be supposed, that it was intended by the framers of the Constitution, that the freedom of debate in this body should be put under such despotic control? Who is a Senator, that the right of uttering his sentiments within these walls should be placed under the will of an officer connected, in a certain measure, with the executive branch of the Government? He is the representative of a State in its sovereign capacity, and, in the larger States, is the organ of the will of more than a million of constituents. It would then be absurd to suppose that the right of determining what he should say, and in what manner, should be placed by the Constitution in the power of an officer wholly irresponsible to the body.

The Chair begs pardon of the Senate for this intrusion, which nothing but a desire to correct misapprehension as to its opinion, on so important a subject, would justify.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he felt gratified at the explanation, because it enabled him, with still more accuracy, to comprehend the view of the Chair, to which end, also, he had provided himself, and then had on his desk a copy of the remarks which he had made, when he had announced to the Senate the opinion alluded to. From that opinion, it appeared that the Chair had taken the position, that his power "on these great points, is an appellate power only." He should hereafter have occasion to notice the alleged distinction between ministerial and other power, and between order affecting the latitude or freedom of debate, and some other sorts of order.

The true question he thought was narrowed down to the enquiry, whether the power of preserving order is lodged in the Chair, and to be exerted originally and primarily by the President, or whether this power is appellate only, and dormant until called into action by a member. It cannot, he thought, be denied that the President and the members derived their powers from the same sources. Has any Senator on this floor, other or more powers than are conferred upon him by the Constitution, the laws of Congress, and the rules of the Senate? Has the Senate itself any other powers than those derived from these sources? The powers of the presiding officer is to be traced to the same sources. But gentlemen ask, whence are derived the powers of the President to call to order? The question is retorted—whence do members derive the power? They admit the power to be lodged in the House, and the argument is that the President has it as an appellate power. Where then do they find in the Constitution one word directing that one member may call another member to order?

Where in the laws of Congress or the rules of the Senate do they find any express provision to this effect? There is none. Our rule does not designate by whom particularly a member may be called to order; and if the President waits for a positive designation, so must a member. Then we are in this dilemma: we have rules, but no one has authority to call them into action. Our predecessors must have differed widely from ourselves on these matters, or they have applied their time and their talents to small account. The illustrious author of this book (Jefferson's Manual) had intimated a very different opinion on this subject. He had prepared and presented to the Senate for their use a parliamentary rule, sanctioned by its usage for more than two hundred years, which pointed to the presiding officer as the individual to move in questions of order. He then alluded to what had been called by the honorable gentleman from Delaware [Mr. M'LANE,] and he must be permitted to think very incorrectly called, inherent power. If the honorable gentleman had reference to power of the presiding officer, not derived from the constitution or laws of the United States, or rules of the Senate, he knew of none such, and utterly denied that they existed. If, on the contrary, he had reference to powers derived from these sources, he could not well perceive with what propriety the term inherent could be applied to them.

Mr. M'LANE denied that he had introduced the term inherent power into the debate. He took it up as the phrase connected with some remarks which fell from the gentleman himself, or from some gentleman on that side of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERS disclaimed the introduction of the term into the debate. He was unwilling, but found it necessary to repeat some of the views he had the honor to submit yesterday. The Constitution had made the Vice President of the United States the President of the Senate. It designed, by placing him here, to invest him with some authority, or it did not. If no authority was thereby given, he has no power to prevent a riot on your floor; to protect your persons from violence, or to interpose his authority primarily on any other subject of order, however gross a violation of it may be exhibited in his presence. No law of Congress gives him such power; no rule of the Senate confers it; and he certainly cannot derive it elsewhere. But gentlemen say he has the power to suppress a riot on your floor; to secure your persons from assault, and to do such like acts, which they term a ministerial power. Now whence is this ministerial power derived, and what is it? Does the Constitution confer it? It says not one word about it. Does a law of Congress confer it? It is no where alluded to in your statute book. Does a rule of the Senate delegate such a power? Your rules are totally silent on the subject of any such distinction of powers, nor does the term ministerial power find place amongst them. What is the ministerial power? Gentlemen have made frequent allusion to the particular question of order touching "latitude of debate." He had heretofore said the day had gone by when any man would be willing in the face of this nation, to arrest the widest latitude of inquiry in this body, and on proper occasions, into the political character and conduct of public men. He should select for an example, another instance of disorder—the case of a defamatory and gross personality—not an assault on the body of a member, but an assault upon his honor, his integrity, vitally affecting every principle by which he maintains his claims upon the respect and esteem of society. Suppose such an attack made by one member in the course of debate, on another and an unoffending member, on the floor; and how are we to class this species of disorder? Is this case to justify the action of the ministerial powers, which gentlemen tell us of? Can the presiding officer interpose? Or will any member of this House say it is a case in which our official dignity and our personal security does not require that the Chair should have authority to interpose? Let us not be told that the authority of any one member on the floor to call the offending member to order is sufficient. It is always an odious business to volunteer in a matter like this. There are forty-six members, exclusive of the offending and offended members, and it is no more the duty of one, than it is of all the others, to move in the affair. When one member shall rise to interpose, he must do so in the apprehension of drawing down upon himself the angry passions of the individual, who can say, "by what peculiar motive, Sir, are you called upon to arrest remarks which forty-five other members, equally appreciating the rules of propriety and decorum, have manifested no reluctance to hear?"

Are we then to leave the offended individual to move the question of order? Was it not enough that he should be the victim of the most unfounded imputation—that his feelings have been lacerated, and his whole mental energies perhaps prostrated and confounded, by an unprovoked and unmerited assault? Is it in a moment like this, that an injured and oppressed individual is to be left to his own resources of defence and protection? No, said Mr. C. he was the last who should or could move in the affair. Perhaps the very fact of his calling in the aid of the presiding officer to arrest such a course of remark, would with many be relied on as evincive of the verity of the very aspersion, which it might be said he was not willing to hear, because not able to disprove. Every generous feeling demanded the aid of other means. If there was any propriety in protecting our persons from injury, much more was there in guarding our private feelings and our honor from injury of a much more serious character. It should be the special province of the chair to curb such passions, and prevent such scenes. But he did not know whether gentlemen would include such a case in the class of ministerial duties admitted to be in the province of the chair. It seemed clearly to be within the exclusion of the language of the presiding officer, because, being in the course of debate, it would affect the latitude of debate, and therefore, came only within his appellate jurisdiction. Mr. C. said, he really did not know what these ministerial duties are, to which gentlemen have reference, no more than he knew from what source they derived them. The true state of the case appeared to him to be, that the Constitution had clearly indicated the powers of our presiding officer by making him such. Ex vi termini, he possessed the powers usual and proper to be exercised by a presiding officer, according to the usage and notions indulged by those who had given him this character. The very men who had appointed him President of the Senate, ex-officio, had themselves a distinct and definite idea of the powers and duties of a presiding officer of a Legislative body. The rules and usages of Congress, borrowed from the laws and rules of Parliament, gave them as it did to every man who had an acquaintance with the legislative bodies of the States of this Union, as correct and intelligible an idea of the powers and offices of the presiding officer, of a legislative body, as of the powers and duties of a judge, or any other officer named in the Constitution; and it was as much to be expected that they should go on to say, when speaking of a judge, that he shall hear and decide questions of law, as to say, of the President of the Senate he shall cause order and decorum to be observed, as well from one member, when in debate, to another member, as from persons not members who commit acts of violence in the Chamber.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] has well said, when a word is found in that instrument with a known received signification, it is to be received by us as importing such signification. The honorable gentleman illustrates this remark by reference to the word "court." I, said Mr. C. illustrate the same remark by the words "President of the Senate."

The Constitution gave to the President of the Senate such powers, as, according to the practice of those who made it, and all the States which received it, were usually exercised by such an officer; and as their powers were invariably exercised in common with the right of the body itself, to alter and amend its rules, so the same right was reserved to this body, by that instrument, and the Senate have no more right to adopt, in the name of "rules of proceedings," wild and extravagant decrees, enlarging their own powers or limiting those of their President, in violation of all Parliamentary and Congressional practice, than their President has to usurp powers never supposed to belong to the station of a presiding officer, or to refuse the exercise of such as are universally admitted to belong to the station.

With the conviction of the constitutional existence of these powers in the presiding officer, and an entire willingness to rely on their exercise, the Senate, at an early period, "formed, to use Mr. Jefferson's language, some rules for its own government, but these going only to few cases, they have referred to the decision of their President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising under their own rules, or where they have provided none: thus placing "under his discretion," as he continues, "a very extensive field of decision."

On some of the plainest as well as the most important items of legislative order, the Senate had no written rule whatever. He believed in every legislative body it was held necessary to restrain the speaker from subjects wholly and obviously foreign and irrelevant to the matter in hand. But yet, unless it had eluded his research, there was no written rule of the Senate to secure this necessary result. Not one word on the subject. If he were now to leave the subject of the rules and practice of this body, and indulge himself in a history of the beauty, the splendor, and the utility, of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, he would deny the authority of any individual in this Chamber, whether president or member, to charge upon him a violation of order, on the hypothesis, that the lex scripta is the only rule of this House. If the lex non scripta, if any thing beside the constitution, laws of Congress, or written rules of the Senate, could restrain me, I ask, (said Mr. C.) where is it found, and when found I ask, does it confine the primary call to the member, and refuse it to the President except on appeal? This is the question, and we must not lose sight of it, and gentlemen will find the same argument which proves the authority of the member, proves the authority of the president: and if they deny the authority of either or both, they leave us in a miserable condition, totally unable to secure the preservation of order or decorum at all. This is a state of things from which we wish to escape, and the interesting inquiry is, by what mode can we do so.

On a former occasion, our presiding officer declared his opinion, after much reflection, that he had no right to call to order on questions touching latitude of debate. No discussion was had at the time, and no member was called to express his assent or dissent to the opinion. A commitment of the rules of the Senate for revision, had been made, and their report was in progress of adoption without the slightest reference to that opinion, when the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEWELL,] thought it proper to propose an inquiry to the Chairman, whether the 6th and 7th rules had been the subject of their particular notice, and if so, whether the committee had sustained the Chair in the opinion heretofore expressed. To these inquiries, the Chairman answered affirmatively. If our action on this matter had ceased here, or if no other step were taken by the Senate but to adopt the amendments of the Committee, with this accompanying explanation and construction of the Chairman, it would settle this question as far forth as the deliberate sense of this Senate can settle it. Being of the number of those who differed from the Chair and from the committee in their construction of the powers of the presiding officer, he had immediately engaged himself in preparing a motion to recommend the rules, with instructions to amend them, by expressly delegating to the Chair the right of primarily calling to order, which he believed it ought to possess. He felt himself driven to the alternative of giving the power by express rule, or to acquiesce in the practice which the President has told us he feels himself bound to pursue, and which the committee say is the only practice justified by our existing rules.

The honorable gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FOOT] anticipated this purpose, by submitting his amendment.

If gentlemen admit the propriety of this interposition from the chair, to protect our persons from violence, to prevent our chamber from being the scene of riot, and to prohibit ourselves, when not engaged at the moment in debate, from loud talking and noise, how can it be less necessary to bring it into action when harsh and inflammatory and personal language is indulged by a member in debate? He would not again propose the question which so forcibly presented itself; he had before put it to gentlemen to distinguish, if they could, between the cases in reference to the derivation of power; but he would ask, why confer the one, and withhold the other? And when we ask you to express by this rule the existence of such a power in the chair, do we wish to stop debate, or abridge its latitude, and restrict it within narrower limits than it now claims? No, Sir, we wish no such thing; we wish to make it the duty of a particular individual, and he the presiding officer, to do that which it is said is now the duty, or rather privilege of all, and therefore, though necessary to the peace and harmony of this body, and to the interests of the nation, is not likely to be done by any one. We wish to vest this power, and make it the duty too of one who is placed here by other means than by our votes, who, not deriving authority from us, and not participating in our debates, has composure and opportunity to observe, and disposition to resist, even the first approach toward a deportment unbecoming the representative of a sovereign State, and calculated to disturb rather than to promote the legitimate objects of our mission. We wish this power to repose where it has been placed and is now exercised in every legislative body of which we have any knowledge.

There was another point, to which he said the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH,] had so efficiently given his notice, that it should not cause him to fatigue the Senate much longer; that was, the very singular suggestion, that the amendment gave a dangerous increase of power to the Chair.

He had yesterday answered this objection, and he did not, after reflection, perceive the fallacy of his reasons; but he would now meet it in another mode, and give to those who urge either horn of the dilemma. Suppose, then, first, that the President is a man of intelligence, integrity, and patriotism; can any member of this body be unwilling to confide to such hands the power of preserving order and decorum? He would not allow himself so to think. Then let us next suppose the presiding officer to be such a monster as the gentlemen have conjured up—to borrow the language of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH,] to be utterly destitute of intelligence, integrity, patriotism, or any principle which can protect you against his machinations; one who will eagerly seize upon, and despotically use every power which he can bring within his grasp. Will gentlemen say it is to such a man they are willing to surrender the decision of their rights, a decision final, conclusive, and irreversible? It is in vain to say, we shall find safety in the fact, that this power can only be called into life by a member on the floor. Such a man will never want the means to persuade or deceive some one of the forty-eight men into a participation of his plans. He will always be able to make some one, however unwillingly, yet the sure instrument of his treacherous purposes. Thus stands the matter, according to the powers of the President, alleged to be derived from existing rules. What would be the result of the different cases supposed, after the proposed change of the rule? If your presiding officer shall be intelligent and patriotic, disposed and capable to do his duty, he will be no less likely to give you sound decisions, because there may be an appeal from his judgment. In the other case supposed, in which your presiding officer is presumed to be destitute of sound principle and honest intention, surely it cannot be cause of complaint that you reserve to yourselves the right of revising the decisions of no officer who is corrupt, the right to correct the mischiefs of an arbitrary despot; the right, in fine, of protecting ourselves and our States, in the enjoyment of those prerogatives which the Constitution and laws of the land have guaranteed to them, and to us as their representatives. Where can we hope for safety and protection, if not among ourselves, in the majority of this body? Are we to be told, that as one individual may be deceived, or seduced, so may the majority? The answer is, that when that fearful day shall arrive, which shall witness a corruption of a majority of this House, when this whole body is to unite with an unprincipled aspirant, who tramples under foot the sacred obligations of the Constitution, and his solemn oath to God, it little matters what are your rules. If such a day shall be permitted to arrive, the destinies of this nation are sealed, its fairest, fondest hopes are blasted forever; and in the general wreck of law and order, no rule you can make will escape the general ruin.

Mr. WOODBURY, of N. H. observed, that the course of remarks on this subject, by the gentleman from Maryland, had imposed a duty on all, who might vote for the amendment for reasons different from his, to explain their views or consent to be misunderstood or misrepresented. The amendment, said Mr. W. in its operation, has not been distinctly apprehended; else probably less diversity of opinion would exist as to its adoption. It, in truth, will work two separate and independent effects. One will be, to confer on the Chair a new power, the other to place a new limit or restriction on all its power. One is produced by giving the authority to call to order for words spoken in debate; the other, by giving an appeal, from that call to order, and from all decisions of every kind, to the members of the Senate. As a friend to restricted power in all public officers, and to jealousy of its exercise, he should certainly vote for the appeal; and as the right to call to order in the first instance by the Chair, was of so little consequence, when subjected to an appeal, he should also vote for that, if he could not vote for the appeal separately. Every gentleman will see that this grant of a new power, to one person more, who, in addition to the present forty-seven, may call to order in the first instance for words spoken, is not likely to produce either much good or hurt, if controlled by that forty seven on an appeal from the Chair. So that the whole contest, worth a moment's consideration, was that part of the amendment, subjecting all calls to order by the Chair to the revision of the Senate. This was entirely a new provision. It had not been formerly introduced, for the very plain reason, that no power to call to order in this case had ever been conferred on the Chair by the rules of this body. If it had been, as was done in the other House, expressly—then, undoubtedly, as there, it would here, have been subjected to an appeal. To suppose that the Senate would confer such an essential and controlling power over the deliberations without any restriction, when the other House had imposed implicit restriction, would be to suppose the Senate less vigilant and more servile and slavish to their presiding officer, than any other legislative body in any free government. The other house acting under the same clause in the Constitution would limit the power, though the Speaker is appointed by themselves—is one of their own number, and daily amenable to their authority: and yet the Senate would not limit the power, when their presiding officer was not appointed by themselves; was not elected in the same manner, and was not amenable to their pleasure for any supposed neglect of duty. To argue, therefore, that the Vice President has heretofore, by our rules, had this power to call to order for words spoken in debate, without any appeal to the Senate, is to aver, that those who made these rules were most regardless of their safety, as compared with the other House, or were "ineffably stupid." The words of the rules exempt from this reproach, most clearly, our fathers who cautiously formed them. The sixth and seventh contain no language in any way consistent with the idea, that by them the Vice President is any thing but an umpire in all calls to order for words spoken. In both of them he is expressly authorized to render judgment after the call; whereas, if he himself made the call he would render judgment before he made the call. He appealed to the gentleman from Maryland, as a lawyer, as well as a politician, to say, if the words of the rules admitted of any other construction, and that their spirit would admit of no other, since no appeal was provided for from the decision of the Vice President, no man of independent feeling, and of due respect to those who made the rules, could for a moment believe.

I shall vote then for the last part of the amendment, if the first part be adopted; because the first part confers a new power, never before conferred by our rules. I should vote for it also if the first part be not adopted, as it is a salutary restraint on the old powers conferred by our rules.

But I am utterly astonished, that gentlemen can support this branch of the amendment, and still argue that the Vice President has a power to call to order for words spoken in debate, independent of any rules made by this body. This has truly been pronounced a doctrine most dangerous and alarming. Where does he obtain it? From the Constitution? But that confers upon the Senate, and not their presiding officer, the right to make rules. He can only preside, or administer rules already made. The express grant to them of this right to make rules, excludes his right to make them; and if he cannot make one by the Constitution, it is, on this same principle, an usurpation, if he undertake to make one by the lex parliamentaria, or virtute officii, or in other way not authorized and ratified by the Senate, to whom alone constitutionally is delegated this important trust. But a single and decisive answer to all claim of an implied or inherent power in the Vice President to make and enforce this rule, without an express grant of the Senate, to call a member to order for words spoken in debate is, that if he possess this power we cannot rightly subject it to an appeal. If he possess it in any way, I care not what, independent of an express rule made by us—we can neither divest him of it nor in any manner restrict it. It becomes an encroachment and usurpation by us to attempt to subject it to an appeal. He can, and ought to put our appeal to defiance. He is not responsible to us for the exercise of powers not conferred by us; but responsible to the people alone.

All, then, who believed that the Vice President did not derive his power from express grant by the Senate, must of course vote against the appeal, or be guilty of attempting to impose shackles on that officer, which, under the Constitution and his constitutional rights, cannot lawfully be imposed. But all who believe that he derived it from express grant by us, would certainly not make that grant without the caution and jealousy of subjecting the power to our revision. Nobody has greater confidence than myself in the present presiding officer, in his integrity, intelligence, or liberal principles.

But we are about to establish a new precedent, perhaps to last many years: we are about, in my opinion, to confer, by the first part of the amendment, a new, and, standing alone, important power; times and men may change; and, for one, I will never consent to bestow it on any officer whatever, unless subject to an appeal and revision by this body. By such an appeal, the grant becomes of little consequence, and will leave, unimpaired, in this body, the highly essential attribute of controlling its own deliberations.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that he had framed an amendment

Powers of the Vice President.

[SENATE.]

in the form of a resolution, which he would now offer to the consideration of the Senate. He considered the power of calling to order in other cases than in debate, a well settled ministerial power, which could exist in no other hands than those of the Vice President—because the attention of the members is not supposed to be upon the proceedings in such cases. But in the debate, the attention of every member would be wide awake; they would be the most interested in checking disorderly language; and, therefore, a delegation of power to call to order in such cases would imply a want of confidence in the Senators themselves. The general disposition of the Senate to preserve decorum seemed to make such a delegation of power unnecessary. He was, thus, disposed to confirm to the presiding officer the right of calling to order in all ordinary cases; and to retain to the members of this body the right of calling to order during debate; imposing upon the President the duty of determining whether the call should be sustained or not, with a right of appeal to the Senate in difficult cases.

Mr. B. then proposed to amend the said proposed amendment, by striking therefrom the words “by the President or a Senator,” and inserting the words, “for any other cause than for words spoken in debate, by the President or a Senator, or for words so spoken by a Senator.”

Mr. FOOT said: I rise to defend my amendment against the unfounded charges which have been made against the amendment itself, and, by implication, against me, for offering it to the consideration of the Senate. But before I proceed to consider these charges, I will first reply to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN.]

What, sir, does his amendment propose? To strike out from my amendment that part which recognises in the President the power to call a Senator to order. If adopted, it will defeat the original amendment entirely, and leave the 6th rule with all its imperfections and embarrassments.

This amendment, proposed as an amendment to the amendment under discussion, applies to the 7th rule, which relates to calls to order for words spoken. [Here Mr. F. read 6th and 7th rules.] The original amendment applies only to the 6th rule, directly, but involves all questions of order, so far as to embrace the right of appeal. The Senator may obtain his object by amending the 7th rule—but if his amendment should now prevail, it will entirely defeat one of the principal objects of the first amendment, which is, not so much to settle a disputed point, as to explain an ambiguity in an existing rule—not to confer any new power, but to strip an existing rule of ambiguity and doubts—which this discussion, from both sides of the Senate, proves incontestably to exist in the present rule; and which it appears has exposed the presiding officer to very serious and unpleasant imputations, because he has given to the rule a construction different from any of his predecessors. One object in proposing this amendment, both in committee and now in the Senate, was, to remove any doubts and embarrassments which have been, or may be, caused by the present rule, and to settle the question definitively, by a vote of the Senate. If the amendment prepared by the Senator from Georgia should prevail, this object will be defeated. I am, therefore, opposed to this amendment.

As to the amendment proposed by me in committee, and now before the Senate, by a call from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL]—for, sir, I must be permitted to say, that, on this subject, I feel myself absolutely and imperatively called upon to defend the amendment, and to state my reasons for opposing it in committee—I have only to say, that, standing in my place as a representative of one of the sovereign States which compose this Union, I claim the right to propose to the consideration of the Senate any measure, either in relation to the general interests of the Nation, or to our own proceedings, which appears to my judgment to be expedient and proper, on my own responsibility, and shall always be ready and willing to assign the reasons which induce me to make such proposition; and I know the courtesy of the Senate will accord to every Senator this privilege.

What is my amendment? A plain proposition so to amend an existing rule, as to recognise in the President of the Senate the right and the obligation to call a Senator to order for a breach of the written rules, or any violation of that decorum which is indispensable to preserve the dignity of the Senate, and facilitate the transaction of the public business; to restore the rights and powers of the President, which have been limited and destroyed by the written rule, or by the construction which has been given to it—with this additional guard against its abuse, to allow an appeal, in all cases, from the decisions of the Chair: in short, to secure to the Senate the control of their own deliberations, and the same privileges which are enjoyed by every other deliberative body, in this, and every other country which has a representative assembly.

Now, I appeal to every Senator on this floor: Is this proposition obnoxious to the harsh epithets which have been heaped upon it? Is this the monstrous power—as stated by the Senator from Delaware? [Mr. McLANE.] Is this a gag law—as stated by the Senator from Kentucky? [Mr. ROWAN.] Am I, sir, to be charged with proposing to give to any man a “monstrous power,” or with having proposed a “gag law”? Sir, my political course has never exposed me to such a charge among my acquaintance; it does not apply to one of my political tenets, however familiar it may be with some gentlemen.

But, sir, in proposing and advocating this amendment, I have nothing to do with any disputes or altercations in this body, previous to the present session, when I first became a member; and I will not be dragged into any such discussion—although, as a member of the committee and of the Senate, I shall never hesitate to do my duty.

My only object in offering this amendment, was, to correct an evil which may arise from the construction of the present rule, and which this debate fully proves to have existed, and which certainly requires a remedy. Under the present rule, with the construction which it has received, taken in connexion with Jefferson's Manual (which is considered as the guide for the proceedings of the Senate in all cases not specially provided for by the rules of the Senate,) I contend that no Senator can be called to order for offensive words until he has finished his speech. Now, Sir, unless we provide, by a special rule, that a member may be called to order while speaking, we shall be compelled to sit as patiently as we can and bear the whole abuse; and after he has finished we may then call him to order and punish him; this certainly is not a remedy for the evil. Every other deliberative body has, by a special rule, provided a remedy for this evil; and my amendment proposes a similar rule for the Senate.

But, Sir, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] will prevent the President from exercising this power, which is considered indispensable for the preservation of order and the prerogative of every other presiding officer. My own experience proves, and every Senator present will agree with me, that this power involves too much delicacy to be often used by members. It is extremely unpleasant for a Senator to call a brother Senator to order; but if the President in his official character calls to order, this delicacy is not felt, nor is offence given; nor can there be any danger of the abuse of the power, if an appeal be allowed to the Senate, from the decisions of the Chair.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BERRIEN, (the yeas and nays having been call-

The question then recurring on the amendment to the 6th and 7th rules, proposed by Mr. FOOT, the yeas and nays were called by Mr. CHASE.

Mr. ROWAN moved a division of the amendment, and that the question on striking out be first taken.

Mr. COBB suggested that the gentleman's object would be attained by moving to amend the amendment, by striking out a certain portion of it.

Before the division proposed by Mr. ROWAN took place, Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. moved an adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1828.

PROCESS IN COURTS OF THE U. STATES.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the Senate went into consideration of the bill to regulate Processes in the Courts of the United States admitted into the Union since the 29th September, 1789.

[This bill establishes the modes of proceeding in suits in the Courts of the United States in those States admitted into the Union since the year 1789—in those of Common Law the same as in the Supreme Courts of the same State—in proceedings of Equity according to the principles, rules, and usages, of the Courts of Equity of the said States—and, in those of Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction, according to the rules and usages of Courts of Admiralty, as contra distinguished from Courts of Common Law, except so far as may have been otherwise provided for by acts of Congress, and subject to such alterations and additions as the Courts of the United States may think expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall from time to time prescribe.]

The amendment of Mr. ROWAN, to strike out all the bill after the enacting clause, and insert a first section, similar to the first portion of the original bill, and a second section, in the following words : " That so much of " any act of Congress as authorizes the Courts of the " United States, or the Supreme Court thereof, at their " discretion, to add or modify any of the rules, forms, " modes, and usages, aforesaid, of the forms of writs of " execution, and other process, except their style, shall " be, and the same is hereby, repealed ; " was the question before the Senate.

On this amendment a Debate arose, which continued until a late hour, in which Messrs. MCKINLEY, SANFORD, TAZEWELL, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BERRIEN, VAN BUREN, KANE, McLANE, and ROWAN, participated.

The yeas and nays were then called, by Mr. SANFORD, on the question of striking out the original bill, and was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote :

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, King, McKinley, McLane, Parris, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury.—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Hendricks, Kane, Knight, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Willey.—21.

The question then recurring on the first section moved by Mr. ROWAN. Mr. JOHNSTON having called for the yeas and nays—

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved an adjournment, which was not agreed to ; and the question being taken, the first section was adopted, by the following vote :

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, McKinley, McLane, Macon, Noble, Parris, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury.—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Knight, Marks, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Willey.—16.

Mr. ROWAN called for the yeas and nays on the second section offered by him ; his call being sustained, the amendment was rejected, by the following vote :

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Cobb, Eaton, Ellis, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, King, McKinley, Macon, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Tyler, White, Woodbury.—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Foot, Kane, Knight, McLane, Marks, Noble, Parris, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Van Buren, Willey, Williams.—26.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend the bill, by striking out the words " Supreme Court," and inserting, in their stead, " the highest Court of original general jurisdiction."

Mr. CHANDLER inquired the object of this alteration.

Mr. WHITE said, that, in some of the States, there were no Supreme Courts : therefore, if this change was not made, there would be no Courts, to the rules of which those of the Circuit Courts could be assimilated. The amendment would make the bill applicable to the condition of all.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

POWERS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the rules of the Senate ; the motion of Mr. FOOT still pending—

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said he was in favor of the amendment which conferred the power of preserving order on the presiding officer of the House, because he believed order essential to a deliberative assembly ; and, as the exercise of the power had been declined, it became necessary to invest the Chair with a power without which his duties under the Constitution could not be performed, nor the order of the Senate preserved. The power must be vested somewhere. It pertained he thought of right, to the presiding officer. It was a power usually exercised by those who presided over the deliberations of public bodies, and it could not be exercised with effect by any other. It was clear, from experience, that the power of calling to order would not, in extraordinary cases, be exercised by members. The person entitled to the protection of the House, who was the object of personal animadversion, would not claim the interference of the House, because he is on the floor to defend himself. His friends will not, because, seeing the injury already inflicted, they will prefer the right of repelling the attack. The friends of the assailant will not, seeing the party is present either to stop it by appealing to the Chair, or by exercising the right of self defence. The party excited by the sense of the injury, assails his adversary in return, retorts, criminations, and insults. The party rejoins, and a scene disgraceful to the actors, to the Senate, and to the country, ensues. Where can it end, but in blows on the floor, or in an appeal to the field of honor ? It being considered the duty of all to call to order, it is the particular duty of no one—and no one will take upon himself to do what equally belongs to every other member to do : the interposition would be deemed at least officious, and perhaps by both parties ; and what becomes of the business, the order, peace, and dignity, of the Senate? But, if the power is conferred on the Chair, it becomes his peculiar duty, under his responsibility, to exercise it promptly and firmly. In the Senate the duty is divided, and the responsibility lost by diffusion: it becomes a mere right, without imposing any obligation or duty, and there will be no remedy for the confusion and disorder which personal quarrels may introduce into this place.

This much I have said in regard to the expediency of conferring the power. But the power to preside over the body is derived from the Constitution. The power of presiding presupposes certain duties inherent to the officer, and requires no law or rule to confer the right. He has a right, by virtue of his office, to sit in the Senate; to superintend its proceedings; to preside over its deliberations; to put all questions; to administer oaths; to judge of the violations of the rules, and to enforce them, and to do every other thing which belongs to the office. The Senate have the right to prescribe rules; but he is the executive officer here. He has a general duty of presiding over the body according to the custom of such bodies. The Senate may prescribe rules to extend, or limit, or explain his general duties.

The right to perform the duties which belong to the office, is a right inherent in the officer, not expressed in words, nor are the duties susceptible of enumeration. That without which the office cannot be, is an essential part of its nature, and is inherent in the thing, as the quality is inherent in matter. The right to preside is expressly conferred by the office; but the right to enter the Senate, and to be present at its deliberations, which cannot be questioned, is inherent, not expressed: it is implied, because it is essential to the performance of the duties of the office, and without which the office could not be. The right to do, when there, what pertains to his office is also inherent, and there can be no doubt of his right to do the duties that belong to the office. What those duties are, must be derived from the nature of the office, and the general understanding and usage.

The Constitution creates the Vice President, ex-officio, "President of the Senate." The right and duty of presiding in that body is inferred from the words which create that office. The act of presiding over a body whose duty it is to deliberate, to debate, and to decide on questions of greatest interest, legislative, executive, and judicial, requires that the body should be kept free from interruption, confusion, and disorder. It requires that order, in its strict parliamentary sense, should be maintained. It is the right of protecting and preserving the body itself. It is a right without which the regular action of the body could not be carried on. To whom does this duty belong? to the presiding officer, or the collective body, or the members? What was in contemplation of those who created the office? What is the general acceptance? What is the duty of all those who, under whatever name, are called to preside over public bodies? Order is the first law of every body, and he who presides must preserve it: such is the universal understanding and usage with regard to it.

The Constitution has provided that, when the President of the United States is tried on impeachment before the Senate, the Chief Justice shall preside. What rights and duties does this impose? Certainly it constitutes him the head of the Court, though not a member. He presides over the Senate, conducts the trial, preserves order, and does all other acts necessary to fulfil the duty. On the trial of a Judge, that office would devolve on the President of the Senate, who, in like manner, would conduct the trial, preserve order, interrogate witnesses, take the opinion of the Senate, and do all other acts pertaining to the presiding officer of the House, of which the trial of Judge Chase furnishes an example. In like manner, the President of the Senate must preside in all legislative proceedings. There is equal authority and necessity for both; and no sensible distinction can be taken. In both cases it implies the same duties. The Chief Justice would, under the right to "preside," exercise the power of preserving order, by a right universally conceded as indispensable to his duty, not by any express delegation, or by virtue of any rule, but as a necessary incident. The President of the Senate, in similar circumstances, would have the right to exercise the same privileges; and the right to preside in all other cases implies the use of the same means; and such has been the uniform practice in the Senate from the beginning—a power never doubted by the presiding officer—never questioned by the Senate. The Senate cannot be organized, or hold its sessions, until the President of the Senate is present, or some one in his place. He administers the oath to the other members; he puts all questions; but there is no law or rule of the Senate for this. It is purely by virtue of his office, call that power what you will.

Mr. Jefferson, when he came to be President of the Senate, had a just and comprehensive view of the duties of the place. He saw that they did not consist in the execution of the few and simple rules of the Senate, but that it required a knowledge of the whole subject of parliamentary law, practice, and usage. He therefore prepared a work from the best authority, for his own government; and, in the preface, he explains his views, from which I read the following:

"The Constitution of the United States, establishing a legislature for the Union, under certain forms, authorizes each branch of it to determine the rules of its own proceedings. The Senate have accordingly formed some rules for its own government, but those going only to a few cases, they have referred to their President, without debate, and without appeal, all questions of order arising either under their own rules, or when they have provided none. This places under the discretion of the President a very extensive field of decision, and one which, irregularly exercised, would have a powerful effect on the proceedings of the House." "The President must feel weightily and seriously this confidence in his discretion, and the necessity of recurring, for its government, to some known rules," &c. "I have begun a sketch, which those who come after me will successively fill up and correct, till a code of laws shall be formed for the use of the Senate, the effects of which may be accuracy in business, economy of time, order, uniformity, and impartiality." He quotes from Hartsel—"That it is very material that order, decency, and regularity, be preserved in a dignified body."

I read this to show the sense in which Mr. Jefferson understood the duties of the place. This manual of Mr. Jefferson was never adopted by the Senate. It is a book convenient for reference to the presiding officer, in deciding the daily questions of order that are submitted to his discretion, in which he finds the rules which have been uniformly acted on in this body. The Lex Parliamentaria is evidence of the usage of parliaments, and is consulted as a safe guide, perhaps the best on all questions of order, and on all subjects on which it treats; and, although not binding on the President of the Senate, is of high authority, and, like the writings of enlightened men on every subject, entitled to great respect.

The Senate, with this knowledge of the powers of the presiding officer, and with the practice of Congress before them, declare "that every question of order shall be decided by the President," and "when a member shall be called to order, he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not." Of the jurisdiction of all questions of order there is no doubt, and if there was, here it is expressly delegated. But who has the right to call the members to order? Certainly the President, or the rule would have said, "when called to order" by a member: the omission of these words renders it clear that the member was not intended. Besides, the power to make rules is a collective power in the Senate, and if a single member has any right to call to order, it is in virtue of no express authority, but a right incidental to his place, and no better right than that of the President, and at most only concurrent. It was not necessary to express in the rule who should exercise the right of calling to order; that belonged of right, according to the general understanding, to the officer charged to preside over the body, and it is doubtful if negative words could have taken it away.

Powers of the Vice President.

[FEB. 13, 1828.]

But it is said, can the President assume the high power of calling a Representative of a sovereign State to order, for words spoken in debate? Why not? The Vice President is elected by all the States—the second officer of the Government: he is the head of this body, and presides over it. But if he cannot call to order, how shall a Senator, who is only equal to the other members?

But it has been urged that this is a most dangerous power to confer on the President of the Senate. That it involves the freedom of debate, and the most sacred privilege of the members, &c. The right to call to order is a mere nominal privilege. It is the power you have already, by your rules, conferred on the President, of deciding on the question of order, when made, that is dangerous, under which he may restrain the freedom of debate. But there is no danger any where. The liberty of speech and the freedom of debate are perfectly understood. They are almost without limit. The utmost latitude of remark and animadversion, with regard to the principle, measures, and motives, of those in power, is allowed. There is no limit but the sense of decency and propriety. What violates the order of the body, and infringes the rights of the members, is equally well known.

I am no advocate for abridging the freedom of debate. I know it is essential to our free institutions. There can be no free Government long without it. We may say what we please of public men and public measures; they are not under the protection of the Senate. It is our duty to speak of abuses, and it is their chief security that we do bring every thing to the light of day. Suspicions and surmises of abuse in the Administration, are infinitely more dangerous and more dreaded by men in power, than open charges manfully preferred, which gives them the opportunity of defending themselves, and vindicating their conduct. Besides, it has a most salutary effect; it keeps both parties on the watch, and the public are safe. It is when members impugn each others' motives, and direct personal abuse against each other; it is when decency and decorum and order are violated, that he must interpose his authority. In this he must exercise a wise and sound discretion, enlightened by the best usages on the subject; for what is order, cannot be defined by apt and precise words.

The power of calling to order confers no power that can be abused. It is merely conservative and ministerial. The power to punish belongs, under the Constitution, to the body itself; and if the presiding officer should grossly violate the law and the rights of the members, if he should infringe the freedom of debate, there is a remedy here.

But I have no such fears. The President would act under a high sense of duty, in the presence of the Senate and before the country. He presides over the body, and looks down with calm and settled dignity on the scene below. He does not mingle in the debate, nor catch the passions engendered in the conflict. He feels that he is the umpire here; although he may be at the head of a party contending on the floor; he throws off the partisan to preside, under the obligations of his duty, and the sanctions of his oath, with every motive of ambition to do it impartially. To avail himself of that place to serve the purposes of a party, either by overdoing his duty, or refusing to do it, would be fatal to him and his party. We every day trust our property and lives to the Courts of Justice; and, although they are composed of men connected with the political parties of the country, they do not carry their politics to the bench. Almost every eminent man has had his feelings enlisted, and perhaps his political fortunes identified, with one of the great parties that have divided and agitated the country; many of them owe their elevation to the influence of the party to which they belonged. But I have never heard that in any case, between individuals, in the most violent times, that the ermine had been sullied by political passions. And if, in a few cases, in public prosecutions, the political feelings of the Judges have led them into error, they stand as memorable examples of the judgment that awaits the abuse of power.

I have no fear of any man who reaches that place, who must be in general a leading man of a party. The public favor which carries him there, the hopes it cherishes, the ambition it animates, are the security for his faithful conduct.

We are told that such is the courtesy of the members, and such the impressive dignity of the body, that no rules are necessary to preserve order. It is true now; but this calm may be deceitful. We have ardent hopes, and strong passions, contending, like other men in the great struggle, in which we may unexpectedly find ourselves, in spite of all our moderation and self respect, carried away by those very feelings we deprecate. It is to guard against this, that I desire to arm the Chair with a power which, by timely interposition, will prevent the occurrence of scenes disgraceful to the Senate; and now is the proper time.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN BUREN] has taken a distinction where there is no difference, and a distinction which is fatal to his whole argument.

He says the President has a right to call to order in every case, except "for words spoken." By what authority can he call to order in any case? There is no rule that gives him the power. It must, therefore, be by some right inherent in the office; which does not require the action of the Senate to bring it into existence. That is the inherent power of the office for which I have contended. Having obtained a power to call to order, how does he limit to special cases? How does he establish a criterion between words spoken and conversation, or any other noise which interrupts the House? There is no such distinction in the rules; there is no such in nature; there is none in Parliamentary usage. If the President has a right to call to order in any case, it must be by virtue of some rule of the Senate; or it is incidental to his office. The rules do not confer any right to call to order in any case. They were framed, evidently, under the idea, that that power belonged, of necessity, to the presiding officer. If he can call to order in any case, it devolves on them to show the authority; and having shown that, they must show the distinction to be fairly taken, which deprives him of jurisdiction over any disorder created by words spoken.

Let us examine the rules. "No member shall speak to another, or otherwise interrupt the business," &c. But if he does, what is to be done? The gentleman says he may be called to order by the President, although the rule is silent, and confers no authority on him. It will be said he has the right, by virtue of his office, to execute the rules; and is not that right inherent? But the 7th rule, which he is equally bound to execute, says—"if a member be called to order for words spoken;" and yet in this case, precisely similar, he has not, agreeable to the distinction of the gentleman from New York, a right to call to order. It is a discrimination where there is no possible difference. If he has any power it is inherent in the office ; it is not in the rules ; and if he can call to order, it embraces all cases of order ; and if he has the right to execute one rule, it must be to execute both rules.

It has been broadly stated in the debate, that there are no powers inherent, or incidental or derivative ; that there is no power in any department or office of this Government not expressly delegated. Let us examine the correctness of this doctrine.

Whence comes the power of the President to dismiss from office ? That is not delegated in the Constitution. Yet at the first Congress, fresh from the discussion of that instrument, and composed of members who had taken a leading part in its adoption, jealous of power then, as now, it was determined, upon full argument, that the power of dismissal belonged to the President alone ; and there has been a general acquiescence in the exercise of the power ever since. This was not a grant of power by Congress. The words implying a grant were stricken out of the bill, to insert words to recognise the power in the President, in contradistinction to the President and Senate, by whom the officers were made. It is a high and important power ; it is a transcendent power. In effect, it throws the whole patronage into the hands of the Executive ; it gives him a direct control over the tenure of office, which, in every instance, is held at his will, as well as a certain influence over the political opinions of those who fill them. This power is liable to great abuse, and may become a tremendous machine in the political conflicts of the country. It was, for political reasons, a necessary power to be trusted somewhere, to be promptly exercised when the public service required it. It had been forgotten or omitted in the Constitution. The power is derived as a necessary incident to the appointing power. Yet, in every view, the power of dismissal, in the hands of the President coming into office, is greater than the power of appointment to the vacancies that may arise by natural causes.

Again : The President is commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, by virtue of which he must perform many duties incident to that station, or inherent in that office, not delegated to him by law ; such as communicating with the enemy by a flag, establishing a cartel, making truce, signing a capitulation, surrendering the army and public property, taking private property for public use, dictating the terms on which the enemy may abandon a position, or surrender ; and every other thing that pertains to a commander by the custom of war ; and these incidental powers run through every grade.

While speaking of the powers incidental to the commander-in-chief, I will take occasion to remind the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] that on the debate on Executive powers, he said "that he repeated, that, war existing, the President is authorized by the Constitution to send a Minister to negotiate for peace, not under his general power of appointment, but under his special authority to direct the operation of the war."

The doctrine of implication runs throughout the Constitution, the Supreme Court having decided many questions upon this principle. They have, for example, said "the authority to carry into complete effect the judgments of the court necessarily results, by implication, from the power to ordain and establish such Courts." Again—"there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States similar to the articles of confederation, which exclude incidental or implied powers." And under the power "to make all necessary rules for the orderly conducting of business in said Courts," they administer oaths, define contempts according to their legal discretion, extending constructive disrespect to their authority to cases out of their presence, and even to publications ; and they try and punish the offender. The authority has never been denied. It is essential to the Court :

without the power to punish contempt, they would soon be contemptible. They cannot go back beyond the Constitution to find power in precedent, any more than the presiding officer of this House to the British Parliament.

The gentlemen have expressed great sensibility at the use of the word inherent, in relation to power. They appear to startle at its introduction in the debate, and pronounce it monstrous and odious. The gentleman from Virginia says, "that when it is argued that inherent rights mean rights not specifically granted by the Constitution, but appertaining to their supposed possessors, virtute officii, merely, they urge no new doctrine, but repeat what has been often asserted in many different forms, and always denied when it has been asserted." Yet, I perfectly remember that in this House, on a debate upon Executive powers, in 1826, it was distinctly stated, as the opinion of that gentleman, [Mr. TAZEWELL,] who I now understand denies the doctrine of inherent power, "That as the Constitution has expressly declared the Executive powers shall be vested in a President, this power of appointment to office would have necessarily belonged to him, as an incident of the general Executive authority, with which he was thus clothed ; but for the other provision, by which the advice and consent is made necessary, to give effect to this power," and that this latter clause merely operates as a limitation : and "but for this clause, the whole power would have been his." Here the whole power of appointment, with all its patronage, would have been incident to the Executive, without any delegation of this power by the Constitution, and consequently would be inherent in the office of President. Was not that an express admission, that there are necessarily incidental and inherent powers ? But the same Constitution has created a Vice President, "who shall be President of the Senate," that is, to preside in the Senate. Are there not likewise appropriate powers incidental to his office, without which he could not carry it into effect, and which the Constitution has not expressly delegated ? If the power of appointment and dismissal from office, are both inherent in the Executive office, why was not the power of preserving order in the Senate, over which the Vice President must preside, inherent in his office ?

The gentleman also said, "that the place of Secretary to a Mission had always existed, and been annexed to every Mission, as an incident as necessary to the legation as its cipher or paper." The President, without any authority of law, appointed a Secretary of Legation, because it was necessary to a mission. The power to appoint was as inherent in his office, as the office was incident to the mission.

I refer to this opinion, because I believe it is the true construction of the Constitution—because it shows that the doctrine of inherent power is not now broached for the first time to apply to a particular case, and because I think it at variance with the principles which have been urged in this debate.

What is that sovereign, undefined, but unlimited power, which the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, exercises under the power to make treaties, which are the supreme laws of the land ? Under which he regulates commerce, a power expressly delegated to Congress ; under which he makes peace, an incident to the war power ; under which he extinguishes the claims of indemnity of our citizens upon foreign Governments ; under which he can establish the boundaries of the country, surrender titles to territory, acquire immense domains of land, and stipulate for the payment of the money ? These powers are no where delegated to the President by the Constitution. The power is contained in a general delegation to make treaties. The power to make treaties would be incomplete and inadequate to the purposes for which it was intended, if we did not, by construction or implication, ascertain the meaning and extent of the grant.

"Congress have power to establish post offices and post roads." There is no express power to carry the mail; but it is clearly implied, as the end for which the power was granted.

The power to declare war includes the power to make and carry on war; it confers the use of the usual means, and carries with it all the incidents, circumstances, and customs of war, and embraces the military academy, fortifications, and the whole system of defence.

During the present discussion, principles have been advanced and doctrines asserted, whose influence go beyond the importance of the present question. They go to the foundation of the Government, to impair, if not to destroy, the beneficial powers of Congress, and to annul, as unconstitutional, many important acts of legislation.

It has been asserted that there are no powers not expressly delegated; and the great question which has so long divided the politicians of the country, and which has been so often decided here, has been renewed in its full extent.

There is a principle which has its foundation in the nature of things, and is of the essence of all power—and above all law—and that is, the use of necessary means to an end: the right to employ the means, without which the power could not be. This power is necessarily implied in every grant. But it is not necessary to invoke this in regard to our Constitution.

Congress have a few general powers specifically set forth—and, therefore, expressly delegated. They are the great objects for which the General Government was instituted. The power is limited to a few subjects of national concern, to which the means of the several States were inadequate—upon which the common defence and general prosperity of all depend. In confiding these great interests to this Government, the Convention designed to give them plenary power to carry into effect the end of its institution. These necessary means are implied in every general delegation of power, as amply as if they had been, or could be, specifically enumerated. Any other principle involves us in two absurdities, the power to do a thing without the means, and the prohibition of the use of means, not expressly delegated, which are so various and infinite, as to defy the possibility of being specifically delegated. The effect of such a principle would be to stop the operation of the Government.

In consequence of the imperative necessity of this principle, the Constitution delegated to Congress "the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect the general powers of Congress," and "all other powers vested in the Government, or any department thereof." This power would have been implied, if it had not been expressly granted, because they could do no act without it. This latter clause is a general and express delegation of all necessary and proper power, and as unlimited as the means to be employed are various and infinite. In this sense, I understand the power is expressly delegated, but all that Congress may do to carry on this Government, is not, and cannot be, specifically and expressly enumerated and set forth. These principles are too familiar to require illustration.

Congress have power to levy and collect taxes—duties and impost—under which they determine the quantum of taxes, on what articles, &c. &c. which has given them a direct control over the whole labor of the country, and under which is established, not only the whole Custom House system, with all its incidents, but an immense corporation for banking. There is no power to create corporations, or establish banks. It is, itself, a high act of sovereignty. I shall be told that this is a violation of the Constitution. It has been considered by Congress, at two distant periods, upon full argument, as a necessary and proper means for collecting the revenue. It has received the Executive sanction under two Administrations, and the confirmation of the Supreme Court.

What an extensive jurisdiction have we acquired under the power to regulate commerce?

I might go over every power—but I will not.

In fulfilling the duty imposed on Congress, they are bound to select the best means, in the exercise of a wise discretion, to adopt those that are necessary and proper. What are necessary and proper means, can be referred to no human standard—they rest on the judgment and wisdom of those whose duty it is to prescribe them. Suppose it is the duty of Congress to defend the country—one recommends a navy, another says it is too expensive. One proposes a standing army, but that is thought to be dangerous to the public liberty. One relies on the militia as the cheap and safe defence of the country—it is objected that they are only for the first moments of war—One thinks fortifications essential—another believes they are very expensive and useless.—Many believe that all these are proper means; and Congress, in their discretion, adopt a system out of all these. Who can determine that they are not necessary and proper means, under the Constitution, to the end? I can see no limit to this discretion, but the wisdom of both Houses of Congress—the integrity that binds the Representative to his country—the supervising power of the President, and the judgment of the Supreme Court; and in the great supervising and controlling power of public opinion. The gentleman behind me says this is a dangerous doctrine. Dangerous to whom? To this country, where this principle has been acted on from the foundation of the Government?

Dangerous! If they are erroneous the people will find it out. The danger, if any, is not in throwing out the opinions, but in concealing them, while you act on them, without avowing them. If there is danger in the doctrines, the danger is in the principles of the Constitution, and the practice of the Government.

But, sir, who are we? The citizens of those States whose rights are said to be in danger, and upon which this Government would make dangerous encroachments: we, whose property and interests, whose families and friends, are in those States; we, the Representatives of those States, where all that is estimable in life, all that is associated with our happiness, or dear in our remembrance; where all our affections are centred, and to which we must all soon return, to render our account; that we, sent to protect them, should have the folly to utter dangerous doctrines, and the madness to combine to destroy the rights of those States!

In those States every thing is secure—life, liberty, and property; within their sphere they exercise uncontrolled power of legislation. This Government was instituted for other purposes, less important, perhaps, but essential to the security and happiness of all. Our business is a defence of the whole, by a union of our strength—the regulation of commerce and intercourse with foreign States, with the several States, and between citizens of the several States—and within this jurisdiction, this Government has full power. In the exercise of this power we must guard against the encroachment on the proper rights of the States: many of these powers are concurrent, and may come in conflict, and in such case must be exercised with great delicacy. But may not we be trusted to take care of the rights of our States, and of all the States, against the claims and usurpations of the central Government, which seems to have excited an unnatural degree of jealousy and prejudice?

I believe the right of calling to order, preserving order, and deciding on all questions of order, belongs to the presiding officer. The Chair declines to exercise the power. [The Vice President rose and explained, that he stated specifically that he did call to order in all cases, except for words spoken.] I take the distinction of the Chair. As far as the decision goes it is correct. But it supports the very argument I have endeavored to maintain—that power by which you call to order in any case, which you distinguish as ministerial, is by virtue of a right inherent in the office. There is no rule that vests that power, in any case, in the Chair. But assuming that power, how is the distinction taken between those cases, where you can act from cases of disorder arising from words spoken? There is none in the rules. The distinction seems to be artificial. My mind cannot perceive the criterion on which the discrimination is made. The delicacy which declines the exercise of power, because it is doubtful, is meritorious. But I am sure the Chair will never avail itself of the pretence which has been urged in this debate, that the surrender of power is favorable to liberty. Power is delegated to be exercised for the security of liberty. Liberty depends not on its being without limits and without control, but on its being regulated. The power of the presiding officer is necessary to the despatch of business, and the order and dignity of the body. To release every member from the restraints of the rules, and restore him his liberty to say and do what he pleases, instead of being favorable, will be fatal to liberty. It is not liberty in that sense for which Government was instituted: it was regulated liberty secured by law.

Mr. President, I have no time to recapitulate. The President, in exercising the power of dismissal, exercises a high and incidental power, derived by implication. As commander-in-chief, there are powers and duties inherent in the office. The Courts exercise incidental power. Every grant of power contains inferior grants implied. Every legal grant contains the rights and incidents which appertain to the object. I hope I have shown by analogy, by parliamentary usage, and by the general understanding, that the right to preside over this body implies the right to call to order, and the duty of preserving it.

Mr. TYLER rose in reply. He would fain believe that no difference of opinion could exist on the question, when fairly stated. Had the Vice President a right to originate rules, by which we are to be implicitly bound? The answer to the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, on the powers inherent in the office of the Chair, is, that the power of the Chair is confined to the construction of rules, while their origin is with this body alone. Who questions the power of a Court to construe the laws? Who believes that a Court can make laws? How many swords would be unsheathed, if the President of the United States were to undertake to make laws! The powers of the Chair are limited to the construction of the rules; and that power no body denies.

Mr. T. thought the power claimed was despotic, and, if exerted, would be destructive of the object for which the Senate is constituted. Who doubts that the Senate has plenary power to accomplish the objects of its institution? If the Chair has a right to frame rules of proceeding, the Senate has not. The right must be complete, either in him or in us. If in both, we should be brought into continual collision. Here Mr. T. defined the powers of the Chair to be ministerial, and properly exercised under the rules originating from the Senate—and he contended, at great length, that no other power was or could be given to the Chair, by implication, or by the Lex Parliamentaria.

Mr. T. also vindicated the decision of the Vice President, who, he said, was debarred, by his station, from self-defence. The high crime of which he had been accused was his declining to exercise a power, which, in his opinion, did not belong to him. If actual improprieties were indulged in, why was it not the duty of the Senator from Louisiana, as well as the Chair, to interfere? Why did the Senator remain silent, and throw the responsibility on the Chair? He announced his construction of the rules, and the Senate acquiesced. Mr. T. believed that the decision of the Chair was correct. It belonged to this body to originate rules—to the Chair to enforce them.

Mr. VAN BUREN would be disloyal, he said, to his Senatorial duties, if he did not enter his protest against the doctrines advanced in this debate. He then spoke, at considerable length, in opposition to the opinion expressed, that the powers delegated, in the Constitution, could be enlarged to so great an extent as was claimed by implication. There had been, he said, a continual struggle in this country between the aristocratic and democratic principles. There was an active principle, which sought to draw power from the sources to the head; and there was an antagonist principle, which sought to draw power from the head to the sources. That man consulted the interests of his country who endeavors to restrain all encroachments of power. Mr. V. B. had at first viewed this question as one of expediency merely; and he was disinclined to vote for the amendment. But he had determined to vote for it: for he knew of no better mode of declaring the opinion of the Senate that there is no inherent power in the Chair, than by adopting that amendment.

Mr. DICKERSON spoke in favor of the amendment—declaring it to be his opinion that the Chair ought to have and to exercise the power to prevent such acts and words as might disturb the business of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, he would not delay the Senate by a reply, but with a short explanation. He concurred with the gentleman from New Jersey, that we claimed very little power for the Chair; it was the mere power of calling to order—to prevent disorder. He had no power to punish—it is a mere conservative right. The power to decide what is order is already conferred by the rules. One gentleman founds his argument on the danger of the power, while the other argues there is no such power, because he cannot enforce his authority.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] has misconceived the argument with regard to the Manual of Mr. Jefferson. It has not been considered as adopted by the Senate. But it is a work compiled by an eminent man, who presided over the Senate, and is high authority on subjects of parliamentary usage. It is read as evidence of that usage. Our rules "are few," but we know what intricate and difficult questions arise for the decision of the Chair, which are submitted, says Mr. Jefferson, to his discretion. He informs himself by a reference to the best writers on the subject. These are read as the results of experience—they have the authority of reason—and no more. As in military courts you refer to works on courts-martial, and as in civil courts you would read what enlightened men in every language and in every age and country have written on the subject—that which makes Pothier authority in our courts, and the opinions of our Supreme Court respected every where.

One word only to the gentleman from New York. It would have become him more to have replied to the argument, than to have denounced the principles on which it was founded. I have offered to him and the Senate my opinions, supported by those illustrations and reasons that occurred to me. The gentleman finds it more convenient, by a short cut, to leave the argument unanswered, and to denounce the principle as "anti-republican,"—"aristocratic,"—"dangerous,"—"and monstrous." I have stated only the practice of this Government, under the Constitution. The principles have been acted on by the ablest men in this country, at different periods, or have received the sanction of every branch of the Government, and have been approved by the People; and it is not now for him to stigmatise these principles with such epithets.

SENATE.]

Powers of the Vice President.

[Feb. 13, 1828.]

The object of his remarks seems to me intended rather to review old party distinctions, than to discuss political principles. They can only be invoked to excite prejudices, which it has been the object of all parties, for the last twelve years, to forget. The principles which I have maintained are not to be shaken by that mode of argument. I rose merely to explain, not to reply.

Mr. MACON expressed himself at length in opposition to the amendment, which he considered unlikely to be of any benefit. He had rather expunge the 6th and 7th rules, than pass this amendment. He did not believe in the doctrine of inherent powers, and was of opinion that the discretion of any man, if he were as wise as Solomon, would not be a proper guide for his direction.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, he did not rise to go into the general argument; he wished, however, to confine the attention of the Senate to the true question. It had nothing to do with latitude of debate. He did not wish to restrain it, and he did not believe any man on the floor had such a wish. His wish was to secure Senators in their feelings, as well as their persons. He wished to vest in the Chair the duty, as well as the right, to call to order a member, who, in debate, might use offensive or insulting personal remark toward a member. He was not solicitous about the manner. The Chair does not believe it now has this power. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKINSON] had argued the propriety of this necessity sufficiently. He was surprised that any could doubt the propriety of it. The whole effect of an offensive remark is to be traced to the time, place, and circumstances which accompany it—and, above all, to the person to whom it is made. We have every day occasion to witness and deplore the total want of truth which exists in relation to charges made by irresponsible individuals against public men. We are ourselves often the victims of gross slander. Our expressions are perverted, our opinions misrepresented, and sentiments ascribed to us which we never entertained, and even when we disclaim them. But will any intelligent portion of the community pass judgment against an honorable member of this House, because, forsooth, some irresponsible, unknown scribbler in a newspaper thinks proper to impeach his character? Will any man on this floor, who has the certificate of a Sovereign State as the evidence of his integrity, be injured in public estimation by the foul attacks of an equally irresponsible and upstart editor, who, begotten amid the mad passions of excited political elements, pursuing the business of calumny and detraction, as his avocation, with an assiduity and a zeal which proves him equally regardless of truth, and insensible to shame; whose insatiate thirst for the life-blood of honor is never allayed by the victims daily immolated on his polluted altar—will such aspersion, I ask, injure the fair fame of any man whose life and conduct has claimed the confidence of his constituents? No sir, they will not; and therefore we want no rule on the subject. With such individuals, no gentleman on this floor can enter the lists, or wish to engage in altercation: for one, sir, I would not be made to do so. The vile work of such a being is destined to the fate which its author merits and will certainly experience. A few revolving moons will bring on the period when such an ephemerical creature, having blustered through the impure atmosphere in which alone he can live, will be annihilated by the calm and sober sense of even those who once tolerated his vices; when oblivion will shroud both the agent and his infamous labours, and conceal their odious character from the memory of all. But, sir, widely different is the case of an offensive remark made here, and recorded amongst your Journals. The station of the speaker, the theatre of his operations the supposed responsibility under which he acts, are all calculated to attract the notice of all who hear him; and when in after times the knowledge of the charge is furnished by your records, the grave circumstances which surround it will leave much room to infer that it would not have been made without some ground on which to erect it. I would therefore use every means to prevent the introduction of such language into a debate here. Let it be known and proclaimed by your rules, that it is not a matter of speculation whether the member who so far forgets himself as to indulge in personal and insulting remark, shall be called to order. Let it be certain that any effort to do so will be repressed, and that the vigilant observation of the chair will prevent the intention of such a person, and make it result in a recoil upon himself.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the yeas and nays were ordered on the question.

Mr. ROWAN moved that the question be divided. He might vote in favor of the latter clause of the amendment, but was opposed to the former.

Mr. FOOT asked whether the amendment could be divided.

The CHAIR considered that two propositions were embraced in it, and that votes might be taken separately upon them.

Mr. BERRIEN expressed the same opinion, and, after a few remarks, he made a motion to adjourn: which was rejected.

Mr. ROWAN withdrew his motion to divide, and moved to strike out of the amendment, the words "President or"—leaving the right to call to order in debate, to the Senators only.

Mr. FOOT inquired whether this proposition had not already been decided by the rejection of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN] yesterday.

The CHAIR expressed an opinion that the propositions were not the same, as that amendment embraced the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, and several other objects.

Mr. VAN BUREN asked for the yeas and nays: the vote was then taken on striking out the words "President or;" and decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Eaton, Ellis, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, McLane, Macon, Ridgley, Rowan, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, White, Williams, Woodbury.—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Parris, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, Willey.—30.

Mr. WHITE moved to divide the amendment, so as first to decide the question of conferring the right on the President, and then on the appeal of the Senate.

The division having been agreed to, the question upon the first portion of the amendment was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Boulogny, Chambers, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Dickerson, Foot, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnston, of Louisiana, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Parris, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Thomas, Tyler, Van Buren, Willey.—31.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Eaton, Ellis, Johnson, of Kentucky, Kane, King, McLane, Macon, Ridgley, Rowan, Smith, of Maryland, Tazewell, White, Williams, Woodbury.—15.

The question on the second portion of the amendment then occurring, and Mr. FOOT having called the yeas and nays, it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chandler, Chase,

So the amendment of Mr FOOT, to the 6th rule, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT then rose, and said, that he took this opportunity to express his entire satisfaction with that portion of the amendment giving to Senators the right of appeal from the decision of the Chair, as it was not only according to strict principle, but would relieve the Chair from a most delicate duty. As to the power conferred upon the Chair, it was not for him to speak; but he assured the Senate that he should always endeavor to exercise it with strict impartiality.

Mr FOOT then moved to amend the 7th rule by inserting, after the words "called to order," the words "by a Senator," making it requisite to write down the offending words uttered by a member, only when a Senator should have called him to order; which was agreed to.

Mr. MACON asked whether a vote should not be taken on the two amendments.

The CHAIR answered, that the division of the amendment precluded the necessity of doing so.

Mr. NOBLE remarked that the Chair ought to be assisted by every member in keeping order. He had voted for the amendment, because it made the power of the President doubly sure. It gave him a power which he, Mr. N., had no doubt he possessed from the Constitution; and he hoped that, under the present regulation, the flood-gates of the waters of Roanoke would never be opened to inundate the Senate Chamber again.

THE MILITIA.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the bill for the organization of the Militia of the United States, and for the discipline thereof, was taken up.

Mr. HAYNE moved to amend the bill by striking out "21," and inserting "18," making the bill include all persons between the ages of 18 and 28.

The motion was opposed by Mr. CHANDLER, and supported by Mr. HARRISON; when the question being taken, the Senate divided, and the vote stood 22 to 22. The Vice President gave the casting vote for the amendment.

A further debate took place on the bill, in which it was supported by Messrs. MACON, SMITH, of Md. and CHANDLER, and opposed by Mr. HAYNE.

Mr. HARRISON did not agree in all the provisions of the bill; but was clear that something must be done. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill upon the table, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report on the subject of the militia, made in the year 1790, by Henry Knox, Secretary of War, and submitted to Congress by the President of the United States, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that the only objection that occurred to him to the motion was, that it would create great delay. He should not be opposed to it, if the bill could be called up early.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was then agreed to—and the resolution submitted by Mr. HARRISON was, by unanimous consent, agreed to.

BREAKWATER IN THE DELAWARE.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the construction of a Breakwater at the mouth of Delaware Bay; and an amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce to authorize the expenditure under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of the Secretary of the Navy, was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBURY explained the objects of the bill, the different plans that had been formed for the construction, and the various estimates of the cost of the Breakwater, and moved to fill the blank in the bill with the sum of 250,000 dollars.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some remarks in favor of the bill, when the motion to fill the blank with 250,000 dollars was agreed to.

Mr. MARKS made some remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. KING moved to strike out the "Secretary of the Treasury," and insert the "President of the United States." He thought the expenditure could be made more advantageously under the direction of the President.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked that there could be no objection to the proposition; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MACON called for the yeas and nays on engrossing the bill; which was sustained.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. moved that the consideration of the bill be postponed to Wednesday.

After a few remarks from Messrs. WOODBURY and SMITH, of Maryland, the motion of Mr. SMITH, of S. C. was agreed to.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the bill to establish process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789, was taken up.

Mr. PARRIS moved the reconsideration of the vote taken on Friday, on the amendment offered by Mr. ROWAN; which motion was rejected.

Mr. PARRIS then prefaced a motion to recommit the bill, with some remarks explanatory of his motives.

On this motion considerable discussion took place, in which Messrs. SANFORD, KANE, ROWAN, WEBSTER, TAZEWELL, and JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, expressed themselves.

Mr. PARRIS then withdrew his motion to recommit; and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. having questioned the Chair as to the propriety of moving to reconsider the vote of Friday, on Mr. ROWAN'S amendment, the President observed that it would be in order to move to reconsider the vote on reconsideration.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. moved to reconsider the vote on the motion to reconsider.

This motion was warmly opposed by Messrs. ROWAN and TAZEWELL.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that some extraordinary propositions had been laid down in the argument that had just been pronounced; but the lateness of the hour induced him to move an adjournment.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1828.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to establish process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789, was then taken up, and the question being on reconsidering the vote on the motion of Mr. PARRIS to reconsider the vote on the amendment offered by Mr. ROWAN on Friday last—

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate at great length in favor of the motion. He entered into a view of the ostensible objects and ultimate effects of the bill under consideration, and argued that the former were not adhered to, while the latter would be disastrous and inconvenient in the extreme. He replied in detail to the arguments urged yesterday by Messrs. TAZEWELL and ROWAN, discussing the signification given by the process acts of '89 and '92, to the term civil law, by which equity process was to be regulated, and opposing the idea that the common law was alluded to by the terms of those acts. He considered that, if the bill passed in its present shape, it would destroy all equity process in many of the old States. He was perfectly willing that the advantages asked for by the new States should be acceded to them, but felt it his duty to oppose a bill which threatened so much evil to the older members of the Union.

Mr. VAN BUREN supported the motion, remarking that the bill, in its present form, was allowed to progress merely through an oversight of the Senate.

Mr. ROWAN said, that, in order to correct some matters of fact on this subject, it would be necessary for him to consult certain documents. He therefore moved to lay the bill on the table; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. KANE, who replied briefly to some portion of the remarks of Mr. WEBSTER; to which the latter answered in a few words.

Mr. ROWAN then renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table; which was agreed to.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the orders of the day were postponed, and the bill for the relief of the Columbian College was taken up.

Some amendments were agreed to, and some conversation took place between Messrs. EATON and CHANDLER, which, from the tumult in the gallery, the Reporter could not hear.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that, as there were many persons connected with this transaction, he wished to know from the committee whether those persons who formerly owed the sum about to be given up, would now assume the debt. Would Mr. Rice become again liable for the 15,000 dollars due by him; and was Col. McKenney willing to suffer an embargo upon his salary for the sum for which he was indebted.

Mr. EATON made some remarks which were imperfectly heard. He was understood to refer the gentleman from South Carolina to the report of the committee on the subject.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that he had not read the report. It was a very long one; and it was impossible for gentlemen to read all the reports that were laid upon their tables. If they could, they had better capacities and better constitutions than he had. He hoped, therefore, in order that he might read this document, that he should be indulged in a motion to postpone the consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

The motion was then agreed to.

CLAIM OF ABRAHAM OGDEN.

Mr. EATON moved that the question on reconsidering the vote on the bill for the relief of Abraham Ogden might then be taken. Mr. E. stated that the motive with which he asked the reconsideration of that vote, arose from a statement made to him by a gentleman acquainted with the subject, who informed him that further evidence was in preparation in the Navy Department, and would shortly be laid before the Senate.

Mr. FOOT said, if there was a point at which discussion should end, it had been arrived at on this subject, which had been decided by the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that if, when the new evidence appeared, it should not alter the aspect of the case, the Senate could persist in its former decision. He did not pretend to declare whether such a result would or would not be produced.

Mr. KING opposed the motion to reconsider, and moved to lay the motion on the table; which was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1828.

COLUMBIAN COLLEGE.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the preceding orders of the day were postponed, and the bill for the relief of the Columbian College was taken up.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that it might be supposed, from his having asked the postponement of the bill to this day, that he intended to address the Senate upon the subject. He did not intend to do so, farther than to state that he had read the report of the committee, to which the gentleman from Tennessee had yesterday referred him, and had not received from it the satisfaction which he had desired.

Mr. CHANDLER said that the opinion might have been formed, from what he said yesterday, that he was opposed to the object of the bill. He was not. He only wished that the property and sureties in the hands of the College might be given up to the United States. If that was faithfully provided for, he did not oppose relieving the College from its obligation.

Mr. RIDGELY said that the object of the bill was to give up the obligation of the College, only on condition that the houses and lots conveyed to the College should be reconveyed to the United States, and the notes of McKenney were also given up. The notes had not been assigned to the College; they had been simply delivered to the College. It would be at the discretion of the officer of the Government to defer the relinquishment of the obligation of the College until the property and papers were delivered up. He moved to amend the bill, as was understood by our Reporter, to guard the bill more fully in this respect; which was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY, the orders were postponed, and the bill making appropriation for the construction of a Breakwater near the mouth of the Delaware, was taken up. [This bill makes an annual appropriation of $250,000 for ten years.]

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, spoke briefly against the appropriation, on the ground that the reports of the engineers upon the subject were not satisfactory, and that the revenue did not authorize so large an expenditure as the bill contemplated.

Mr. McLANE spoke at great length in support of the bill, sustaining its importance, not only to the States in the vicinity of the Delaware, but to the interests of commerce throughout the country. He also supported his arguments by citing many documents and computations, showing that immense losses of property and lives had hitherto been sustained by the dangerous navigation of the Delaware, and the advantages to commerce and the revenue which would result from the completion of the Breakwater.

Mr. CHANDLER thought, that, as this was to be an experiment, the smallest sum reported ought to have been chosen, instead of the largest.

Mr. McLANE replied briefly to Mr. CHANDLER.

Mr. SILSBEE supported the bill, as a measure of great concernment to the interests of commerce throughout the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, replied at considerable length to the observations of Mr. McLANE.

The bill was further supported by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, RIDGELY, and BARNARD.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the Senate resumed the motion of the 18th instant, to reconsider the vote on the Judicial Process.

[SENATE.]

reconsideration of that of the 14th instant, on engrossing the bill for regulating process in the Courts of the United States, in States admitted into the Union since 1789.

Mr. ROWAN said, that he should have been contented to take the vote when this question was under discussion on the day before yesterday, but that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) had referred to the process laws of Kentucky, in connexion with the rules of the Federal Court, in such a manner as rendered it necessary, in his opinion, to have special reference to those rules. The gentleman had, moreover, misstated the execution laws of that State. To have it in his power to correct the misstatement of the gentleman, and to produce the rules of Court, he had requested the postponement.

The gentleman had stated, that the laws of Kentucky would not permit an execution to be taken out by a creditor upon his judgment, unless he would endorse, that no current or unavailable bank notes would be taken in discharge of it. That, to remedy this evil, the Federal Judges had made the rules complained of by the Senators from Kentucky. He added, moreover, that the execution laws of Kentucky were declared, both by the State and Federal Judges, to be unconstitutional and void.

Sir, said Mr. ROWAN, as to the first statement of the gentleman, it is utterly erroneous—there never was a law of Kentucky which forbade the plaintiff to sue out execution upon his judgment, unless he would endorse that he would take unavailable paper in discharge of it. I do not know, said Mr. R. whence the gentleman obtained his information, but I do know that it is incorrect. It was always competent for a plaintiff to sue out his execution immediately after the term had expired, at which he had obtained his judgment. But there was a period in that State, in which the defendant in the execution, could when it came to be levied upon his property, replevy the debt for two years, unless the plaintiff had endorsed that he was willing to receive the current bank notes of the State, in which case he could replevy for three months only.

Why the gentleman should have referred to the execution laws of Kentucky, he could not well perceive, for whether those laws were, or were not, constitutional, or expedient, must be foreign from the point under discussion, which was, whether the Judges possessed the power to make execution laws under any circumstances. If, under color of making rules of Court, they possessed the power to make execution laws, then they could have exercised that power, whether the execution laws of the State had been wise or foolish, void or valid. And if they did not possess the power to legislate, then they could not, under any state of things, have made those execution laws, or rules. But, as the laws of that State had been mentioned by the gentleman, in a manner that might seem to imply censure, he would, while he reprobated, in the most emphatic manner, the right, or propriety, of any Senator's censuring the conduct of a State, claim the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, while he vindicated the State, by which he had been honored with a seat in that body, from the imputation which that gentleman had been pleased to utter in innuendoes. He would, however, premise, as a fact well known, not only to physiologists, but to all close observers of human nature, that the Creator of man has wisely and benignantly endowed him with energies beyond what are required for the ordinary avocations of life—energies for special and extraordinary exigencies, which lie dormant until the emergencies, which awaken and call them into action, occur; that the degree of energy beyond the stock habitually employed in the ordinary pursuits of life, which shall be called into exercise upon any occasion, depends upon the excitement which the occasion produces. Now, sir, it is known that there is no general condition of society which excites its members so powerfully as a state of war. Hence it has been said by wise men, that it is but little less dangerous to close, than to commence a war. To allay the stock of excitement which that condition produces—to ease men down to their ordinary pacific pursuits, from a high and fervid state of excitement; or, if the simile may be allowed, to let off the steam when the voyage is closed, without bursting the boiler, deranging the machinery, or injuring the passengers, is a task of great delicacy, and very great difficulty. This excitement may be extraordinary even for a state of war. It may be rendered so by an infinite variety of occurrences. A spirit of disaffection among those who are carrying it on; unexpected disasters: a savage and brutal species of warfare, on the part of the enemy, are among the causes calculated to produce almost preternatural excitement during its progress; and, upon its sudden termination, to expose society, in its pacific state, to the effects of the very highest wrought war-feeling. Sir, such was the character of our last war. We had beheld in other quarters, for more than twenty years before its commencement, the fiercest, the most desolating ravages of war. We had not looked on as cold and heedless spectators; we could not do so. The scenes, though tragic, were grand and magnificent. All Christendom, with the exception of the United States, were involved in the war; and the United States and all the rest of the world looked on with wonder and amazement. Never did nations contend more strenuously; never did war crowd upon the gaze of mankind events more splendid, or in more rapid succession.

The United States were subject, not only to the excitement which a spectacle so grand, so august, could not fail to produce on them as mere spectators; but they were unceasingly exposed to collision with some one of the beligerents. They were, in fact, for much of the time, in a state of quasi war with more than one of them. Then, sir, when the war really came, it found the people of this nation in a state of great excitement. Let me ask if the occurrences during that war were calculated to diminish that state of feeling? The disaffection of some of the States; their refusal to co-operate in bringing it to an honorable close, surely was not calculated to damp the ardor, abate the zeal, or diminish the patriotism of the people of Kentucky. The Kentuckians, said Mr. R. are, and I speak it with pride, a brave and chivalric people. They felt all the zeal for the glory of their country, with which its accumulated injuries could inspire an ardent, a brave, and a patriotic people. They never hesitated, never faltered for a moment. They poured out their blood like water on the northwestern frontier. They were prodigal of life at Tippecanoe, the plains of Raisin, at Dudley's rencontre, on the Thames, and Orleans. Sir, Kentucky was widowed by the war—she was bereaved, by its ravages, of some of her most distinguished sons. I need not, said Mr. R. name them; the occasion does not require it. Among them were Colonels Allen and Davies—men surpassed in none of the States, in no part of the world, whether you have reference to their virtues or their talents. Sir, the glory of the closing scene of the war was calculated, by its effulgence to excite to rapture such a people as the Kentuckians, and they did enjoy the raptures of that unparalleled victory—a victory which they had assisted to achieve—a victory, which obscured, by its splendors, the mortifying occurrences at this place—yes sir, which obliterated the deformation, by the enemy, of the proud edifice in which we now sit, and healed the wound inflicted upon the just pride of the patriotic portion of the American people, by that humiliating event. But, said Mr. ROWAN, I have dwelt longer upon this part of the subject than, perhaps, I ought. The object was to show that the people of Kentucky were not cold-blooded, indifferent spectators; that they were greatly excited, and entered into the cause of their country, with animation and zeal; that the disasters and victories, in which they participated largely, were calculated to excite, and did excite them greatly; that at the close of the war they were left in a state of very high feeling. And, in conjunction with these, he begged leave to state another fact, not without its influence in producing the state of things which ensued, and at which the gentleman has alluded, not, indeed, with express, but with evident implied reprobation. Sir, it must be recollected that the United States' Bank did not exist at that period; that the State Banks furnished much of the money, with which the war was conducted; Kentucky furnished her full portion. The needs of the government, and the excitement to which he had alluded, had produced, perhaps, an inordinate issue by the Banks, in that State. The men and supplies furnished by that State, caused, naturally, during, and at the close of the war, a plenary, if not profuse, circulation of local notes. This furnished, to the excited state of the public mind, facilities for the indulgence of feverish and extravagant projects; impracticable plans were honestly, but erroneously formed; chimerical notions of wealth and aggrandizement were cherished. In fine, the state of feeling was suited to the occasion which had produced, and not to the condition which had ensued it. They enjoyed peace, while they were under the influence of war feelings. The Bank of the United States was created immediately upon the close of the war, and the Government, very unwisely, as he always thought, determined, suddenly, through its instrumentality, to restore, not gradually, as it ought, but suddenly, a metallic currency.

The effects of this unwise measure are known to all; they were felt by almost all in Kentucky. The change, Mr. President, was too sudden—the shock inflicted by it was too severe—the sacrifices produced by it were too numerous and too agonizing—the basis upon which the enterprise, the hopes, and the happiness of the people of that State rested, was suddenly and unexpectedly taken from under them, and they were turned over, as lawful prey to the Bank of the U. States, and the mercenary vultures that hovered round that institution. The Legislature of the State, in the laudable view to mitigate the calamities, which had so suddenly and so unexpectedly overtaken the people, and to save from ruin as many as possible of her citizens, by affording them time to disembarass themselves, passed an act authorizing the defendant, when the plaintiff had not endorsed, that he would take the current notes of the State, to replevy the debt for two years, but denying to him, when the plaintiff had made such endorsement, the right to replevy, for more than three months. And what was the mighty evil of this delay? The defendant executed a bond, with two approved securities, for the payment of the amount of the execution within two years. The debt was made perfectly secure; it bore interest during the time, and had the force of a judgment, upon which execution issued, as matter of course, and upon which there could be no delay. The injury was, if an injury that may be called, which is a public good, that the plaintiff was not permitted to take the entire estate of the defendant for less than a one hundredth part of its value. There was no money which would be taken, save what little could be obtained from the United States Bank; and that was not obtained by debtors, and when obtained, was employed by those who could obtain it, in merciless speculation, at forced sales by the sheriff. The contracts had all been predicated upon the local currency—none other had been known or thought of, that had been put down by the United States Bank—a new state of things had ensued. The creditor refused the medium for which he had contracted, and demanded payment in one which had been suddenly created, and could not be suddenly obtained. The Legislature not only passed this law, but passed a law also abolishing imprisonment for debt; thus affording to the brave fellows who had fought the battles of their country, an opportunity of paying their debts, without the entire sacrifice of their property, and the loss of their liberty, by imprisonment. And mark, Mr. President: The great majority of the creditors in that, as under like circumstances they will always be, in every State, were not the ardent, generous, brave men who had entered, with their whole soul, into the war which their country had been constrained to wage. They were mostly, your cold-blooded, cunning, calculating, avaricious men, whose only love of country was love of money—whose patriotism was cupidity, and whose zeal was to enrich themselves, and to ruin the men who had saved their country. These, sir, were few—but they were clamorous—and their clamors were echoed by capitalists from every quarter—and we all know that the capitalists were not the patriots in our last war.

But, he begged leave to ask, if Kentucky was the only State that had, by her enactments, attempted during the war to suit her code to her condition? Sir, a great majority of the States altered their execution laws. Public sentiment approved it, because the deranged condition of affairs required it. Virginia, the ancient dominion, a State as distinguished for the correctness and stability of her political creed, as for the heroes and statesmen which she has produced—even she suspended executions, for (he believed) twelve months. But why quote examples—what are the States for—what the annual session of their Legislatures—but, by changing the laws, to suit them to the varying condition of society?

It is true, sir, that the Circuit Judge pronounced the replevin law of Kentucky to be unconstitutional and void. He declared the law to be void, because it delayed justice, and immediately enacted a law which authorized the defendant to replevy for three months. He declared the replevin law of the State to be unconstitutional, and immediately made a replevin law. He declared the law of the State, abolishing imprisonment for debt, to be void for the same reason, and immediately enacted an imprisonment law. [Here Mr. Rowan presented to the House the rules made by the Federal Judges of the Kentucky District. They consisted of 17 Sections. They were read by the Secretary of the Senate in his place.] Sir, said Mr. Rowan, if the judge had really believed these laws of the State to be unconstitutional, and, if he had really believed, also, that he possessed legislative power—a respect for himself—the pride of consistency, and a decent respect for the sentiment of the State should all have restrained him from the course which he pursued. There was an unparalleled audacity in ordaining, by rule of Court, a replevin law, when he had determined that law on the part of the State to be unconstitutional. There was an insolent defiance of public sentiment, in ordaining imprisonment for debt, after the Legislature of the State, had abolished it. Sir, we hear a great deal about the purity and sanctity of the judicial character, and eulogies without number are pronounced upon the present incumbents. He had nothing to say about the men; it was the corporate powers of the judicial department, and not with the Judges, that this Senate had to do in the present question. He must, however, be permitted to say, that he did not rate very highly that sanctity which was unceasingly employed in profaning the State laws, and State authorities—which, in the exercise of a little usurped and brief authority, outraged the sacred principles of freedom, and drew into contempt the most solemn civil institutions. Sir, you have in the rules of court, which have just been read, a full and complex code of execution laws including replevin—imprisonment for debt, and a system of conveyancing. The very highest attributes of sovereignty are exerted in conclave by these judges. They make their rules, which subject your property to seizure and sale, and your body to imprisonment. They are not printed nor promulgated; and yet, like the laws of the Tyrant, they must govern, though they cannot be read, or known. Sir, said Mr. Rowan, we are this day debating whether the Judges shall exercise a legislative power to an extent, and in a manner, which drew upon that tyrant, the just execration of all mankind. Our freedom consists, essentially, in the fact, that we are governed by laws, made by ourselves—that the will of the majority, definitely expressed, and duly promulgated, is the only power to which freemen are constrained to bend. But, what is the judicial doctrine which, he was sorry to see, had so many advocates in this body? Why, not that the voice of the majority, but that the will of one or two Federal Judges—under (he supposed) the sacred guidance of that faithful monitor, their conscience—should regulate the property and the liberty of the people of these States—and that, too, not published, but retained in the office of their own clerk. The Judges and the lawyers of the Court well know what the rules are, and the people may know, by making a pilgrimage to the office of the clerk and paying him for a sight of them. But that the Judges and the lawyers should know the law, seemed to the Senator from Massachusetts sufficient. It was not, in his opinion, necessary that the people should know them. This doctrine was urged by the gentlemen with a zeal, which he had but little expected. He would notice it more at large hereafter: for the present, he was concerned with the Legislative power asserted for, and exercised by the Judges. Sir, said Mr. Rowan, the legislative power, according to the theory of our Government, is never to be exercised but under strict responsibility to the people, whose will gives obligatory force to the law. But under what responsibility do the Judges legislate? They are in office for life, and can only be removed by impeachment, for malfeasance in office. Their office is judicial, not legislative. Could they be impeached for corrupt legislation? Would it be official malfeasance? They were commissioned to judge, not to legislate—to expound, not to make laws. Their legislative exertions would not be official, and so, not subject, to even the remote and nominal responsibility of impeachment.

Mr. President, all the distinguished writers upon political science agree that the concentration of the legislative, the judicial, and the executive power in the same person, or body, constitutes despotism. These three powers were exercised by the Federal Judges in Kentucky; and that, too, in relation to topics the most critically interesting of any that fall within the scope of those powers, in their divided and best adjusted shape in immediate relation to the enjoyment of his liberty, and the possession of his property by the citizen. That, surely, is the highest act of sovereignty, which takes from a man his liberty, or which takes from one man his property, and gives to another; yet these Judges make the rules by which this is done—they expound them, and they execute them. Sir, said Mr. Rowan, if this thing is sanctioned, we have gained nothing by the Revolution; we have lost by it. For such a power was never asserted for, or exercised by, the Judges of England. It would not be tolerated by the people of that country. The people of that Government have, at various periods of its history, been very much harassed and grieved by the pliancy and corruption of their Judges, but they never were, as the people of Kentucky have been, oppressed by the usurpation, on the part of even their most corrupt Judges, of the legislative power. Sir, this assumption of the legislative power, by the Federal Judges of Kentucky, has caused much anxiety to the people of that State. They have remonstrated to Congress, repeatedly, and most solemnly against it. Their remonstrances have hitherto been unavailing. They have been patient, not from any proneness on their part to submit to judicial, or any other kind of tyranny, but from a love of order, and in the hope that their wrongs would be redressed by Congress; when that hope ceases, let the petty oppressors beware how, and upon whom, they exercise their ill-derived power. But, Mr. President, why should their reasonable expectations of redress from Congress be disappointed? What is there in judicial legislation which can enamour Congress with it? The excellence of all legislation is in the adaptation of the laws, by those who make them, to the condition of those for whom they are made. The Judges are not from among the people; they are, by their office and their salaries, placed above the fluctuations, and freed from the cares, to which the people are unceasingly exposed. They cannot, therefore, if they were qualified, in other respects, be sufficiently acquainted with the will of the people, their wants and their sufferings, to legislate beneficially for them. But, Sir, when did this idea of judicial legislation first present itself to the American People? The law of Congress, authorizing the Judges to alter the forms of process, and to make rules, for the regulation of its own judicial proceeding in court, was, we all know, passed in 1789, and re-enacted in May, 1792. But nobody ever thought that either of these laws conferred legislative power upon the Judges. They themselves were unconscious of possessing any such power. The alteration of State process, in the article of form only, so as to adapt its use to the organic structure of the Federal Courts, was known to be all that was intended by Congress, in those acts. Nor, sir, did the Courts ever dream of exercising any other or further power under color of those acts, until since the war, and the establishment of the United States Bank. The experiment was first made in Kentucky, in the case, and under the auspices, of that Bank—backed by all the talents, influence, and weight of character, which that institution possesses so amply the means of enlisting. The experiment was, unhappily, but too successful. The gentleman from Massachusetts tells us that the invalidity of the Kentucky execution laws was a great evil, and that the Judges were called upon to apply the remedy. It is admitted to be the duty of the Judges to apply the remedy. But it is asserted to be the right of the Legislature to make it. Every remedy pre-supposes an evil. To explore the condition of society, to ascertain the existing evil, and to frame and suit the remedy to the evil, is the province of the statesman. To apply the remedy, when provided, is the duty of the Judge. Neither should trench upon the province of the other. These different duties require very different capacities and attainments, so that the apology offered by the gentleman, for the Judges, is, at best, but the stale apology for oppression. The plea of necessity is the habitual excuse for tyranny. But if the Judges had felt the urgency of that necessity, which the gentlemen assert in their behalf, why did they not refer the case to Congress, whose exclusive province it is to legislate for the tribunals of the United States? Sir, the legitimate source of the governing power in this country, as we all know, is in the People. None can be exerted by any public functionary which has not been delegated.

How much more becoming and decent would it have been in those Judges, if they had even believed the State laws to have been unconstitutional, to have surrendered their judgment to that of the people of the State, until Congress could have passed upon the subject; to have supposed that, according to any, and every rational criterion of correctness, that half a million of intelligent people, who compose the State of Kentucky, were right, and they wrong; than to have bewildered themselves in the mazes of abstraction, to find that the legal obligation of a contract consisted in the remedy alone. Sir, the logic of the Judges upon this subject is new, and somewhat curious, but more dangerous than either. It is thus they reason: "The Constitution of the United States provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts; the obligation of a contract consists alone in the remedy for its enforcement; any State law which varies the remedy, impairs the obligation of all existing contracts, and is, therefore, as to them, unconstitutional and void." The evident tendency of this doctrine, if its absurdity could be tolerated, is consolidation. It is to paralyze the States, by denying them the exercise of the legislative power, upon which alone their freedom and their happiness depends. The laws of right and wrong are divine and unalterable. The laws for the suppression of wrong and the enforcement of right, are human, and may be modified and varied to suit the varying or varied state of society, as the wisdom of the people, legitimately exercised, shall dictate. The language of reason which has had the practical sanction of all free governments and without which free governments could not exist, is that the remedy is in the discretion of the sovereign legislative power. The gentleman may say—as he said in relation to the execution law of Kentucky—the sovereign legislative power may be misexercised or abused; and, in that case, the Federal Judges must apply the remedy to the evil. He would answer, that the power of enacting remedial laws must be lodged somewhere, and that the people were, at least, as safe a depository of that power as the Judges; besides, if it were lodged in the hands of the Judges, they too, might misexercise or abuse it; and who, in that case, should apply the remedy to the evil? For the doctrine of the gentleman is, that wherever there is an evil, there must be a remedy. Mr. R. said he agreed that there ought to be a remedy for every evil; he was sorry, however, to say, that the fact was not always so. There existed many evils, for which remedies had not been provided; and among the most enormous and grievous evil of that character, was the usurpation of legislative power by the Judges. He should be glad to see the gentleman support his doctrine by his vote, and assist in furnishing the appropriate remedy for this most afflicting evil. This evil, which, by violating the great principles of our free institutions, leads to, and threatens the destruction of our liberty; which, by usurping the power of the States, threatens their absorption; which, by conceding to the Judges the exercise of legislative power, denies to the States the right of regulating their own remedial system, according to their own will. Sir, the gentleman would remedy what he miscalls an evil in Kentucky, by an infinitely greater evil. He says, virtually, that the people of that State have abused the legislative power, and proposes to remedy the evil, by transferring that power to the Judges, without providing a remedy for its abuse by them. He is right in proposing no remedy for their abuses of this power; for when it is once conceded to them, it will be ille to talk of a remedy for their perversion or abuse of it. It must be irresponsibly, and will, of course, be irremediably exercised. But are we prepared for such a state of things? Are we prepared to sanction beginnings which will lead to such a result? Mr. President, the boundaries between right and remedy are planted deep in nature—the distinction between them is obvious and plain. Shall they be confounded, and the States be deprived of their legitimate power, by judicial mysticism? Shall it be filched from them by judicial subtleties, or extorted by the force of sophisms? Sir, the new theory of obligation is too wire-drawn, too sublimated, too evanescent, for the use of a republican people. The Judges should be permitted to amuse themselves with it as a sparkling abstraction, a pretty little brilliant, a glittering pageant of the fancy, or, if you please, an intellectual aurora borealis—but nothing more or farther. They should not be allowed to experiment with it upon the common sense of the people, at the hazard of their liberty: still less should they be permitted to impose it upon the people as the plan, upon which alone they could exercise the power of remedial legislation. They should not be permitted to send it abroad among the States as a destroying angel, as impalpable, and as destructive of their rights, as was the visit of that mysterious agent to the first-born of the Egyptians. Sir, mystery on the part of the political agents, in any government, is the sure harbinger of the oppression of the people. It addresses itself to the credulity, not to the common sense of mankind. And common sense, or the power of reason, is the criterion to which alone should be referred the propriety or justness of any measure which may affect the liberty or the happiness of man. To the test of this standard alone, should every thing which affects his rights or his interest be subjected. Common sense revolts at the idea that the Legislature may provide a remedy for contingent and possible evils; but ought not, and cannot, exert any remedial agency for the mitigation of a present and urgent evil. That they may provide a remedy for evils which may never happen, but cannot, by any exertion of the remedial power, soften those which are present and pressing. Sir, a wise Legislature is like a wise and skilful physician, whose duty it is, not only to prevent, but, by remedial applications, to cure maladies, and to soften, by judicious lenitives, those which cannot be cured.

One gentleman, [Mr. M'Lane] says, that the Judiciary is the most important department in our Government. He compares it to a fixed star, shedding its clear, but mild light, throughout the political horizon. He, too, pronounces a eulogy upon the Judges, and says they can have no motive to do wrong. It is, (said Mr. R.) a sound rule in legislation, to suppose the worst, and provide against it. The Judges are men, and however good they may be, their successors may not be so. Wise men are subject to the errors of human frailty; foolish and vicious men are never without motives to do wrong. The Judges are men, and it is wise in the Legislature to guard against the injurious exertion of their power, either weakly or wickedly. While, like the fixed star spoken of by the gentleman, they continued to occupy their appropriate sphere, and to shed their lustre upon the other departments, they would have his approbation. But when, instead of the benignant beamings of a fixed star, they pursued the erratic, and desolating course of a blazing comet, threatening destruction to their coordinate orbs, he must be pardoned for withholding his approbation. But, to change the figure of the gentleman, for one less sublimated, he would say that the Judges, when caught poaching upon the legislative manor, should be driven off, and taught to confine themselves to the judicial demesne; and, dropping the figurative, into which he had been seduced by the gentleman from Delaware, he was willing to admit that the Judiciary were an important department in the Government. But their important usefulness consisted in the enlightened and faithful performance of their appropriate duties. Their duty was, he repeated, to expound, not to make laws. It was very far from his desire to disparage the Judiciary, or the Judges. He would avoid, alike, an idolatrous admiration, and a causeless censure, of the Judges. They were not more, and he would not have them thought to be less, than men. But he protested, once for all, against the morbid sensibility displayed by many gentlemen, whenever the powers or the duties of these Judges were drawn into discussion. Sir, the Judicial power is not of a complexion so delicate, nor of a texture so tender, that it cannot bear the breath of dispassionate scrutiny—at least, such was not the character of that portion of it which was exerted in vacating the Execution laws of Kentucky, and in creating a code of its own. It was hardly enough, in that instance, to defy and override the public sentiment of that State—and to outrage decency, and consistency in the manner of doing it, as he trusted, he had sufficiently shown in that part of his argument, which related to the Execution Code enacted by the Judges. He would venture to predict, without pretending to a spirit of prophecy, that whenever the most vigilant scrutiny of the people's representatives shall be withdrawn from that department, the liberties of the people will be endangered. Sir, that is the department through which oppression of every kind, and from every quarter, will attempt to smuggle itself upon the people. It is under color, and through the avenues of justice, in every government, that corporations exert their aristocratic influences. It is through that medium, masked in the forms of rules and usages of law, that oppression of every kind finds its way to the people. The power of wealth, and of all the factitious distinctions which arise in society, is harmless without the connivance of the Judges. Sanctioned by them, it is resistless—it is ruinous. Liberty, Mr. President, is never taken from a people at once, in their aggregate capacity. It is taken now from one, and then from another, under pretence of law, and with the sanction of its forms, until the only liberty left is the liberty of the rich to oppress the poor—the strong, the weak; and it ceases to be enjoyed by the citizens, only because of the resistless sanctity with which it has been wrested from them. Sometimes, indeed, it loses its fragrance by the frequency of its violation, and the people abandon it in disgust, or submit in despair. But in no free Government can the people be oppressed or enslaved without the consent of the Judges.

No man, as you may perceive, sir, said Mr. R., rates the judicial character higher than I do. But it is only valuable when it does its duty, and then it is inestimably so. He was, therefore, for requiring the Judges to do their duty, their whole duty, and nothing but their duty. The difference between the Senator from Delaware and himself, consisted in the supposition, by that gentleman, that the Judges would always do their duty, and no more; and by him, that they might, and would, if the restraining vigilance of the people were withdrawn, often transcend their duty. He was willing to appeal to history, ancient or modern, for the correctness of his opinion. He was persuaded that both would bear testimony in his favor. But why appeal, said Mr. R., to history? Why go to Rome, to Greece, to Carthage, or to England, in quest of facts? Have we not facts enough at home—at hand—of a modern and domestic character? Have not the Federal Judges boldly and unblushingly enacted a code of Execution Laws for the Kentucky District? Has not that State again and again remonstrated against their usurpation of the Legislative power? It was alleged by Cicero, in his prosecution of Verres, as an outrage of the utmost enormity, that, in his character of Quæstor, he had caused the punishment of stripes to be inflicted upon a Roman citizen, for an alleged crime; and that, too, in the most degenerate state of the Roman Republic. And shall it be thought a light matter, in our Republic, yet in its youth and vigor, that two Federal Judges passed a law subjecting the free citizens of the State of Kentucky to imprisonment for debt, contrary to the laws of that State? That they not only passed a law, making indebtedness a crime, but actually inflicted, by their decision, the punishment of imprisonment, by virtue of their own law, upon many unfortunate debtors within that State.

Now, Sir, said Mr. R., if to inflict stripes upon the body of a Roman citizen, charged with a crime, could draw forth from that immortal orator and patriot such a burst of indignant eloquence, what sensations of indignance ought to be felt by the patriots of this free and enlightened country against the Judge who, without color of crime—unless bereavements and misfortune subject their victims to that imputation—by a law of his own enactment, and by his own decision upon that law, and by the agency of his own marshal, has thrown into prison all the debtors of his court!—who has ordained, by rule of court, that poverty shall be punished with loss of liberty!

Sir, this is a point upon which, it would seem to me, there ought to be one opinion in this body and throughout the United States. If you accord to the judges the power of making laws, you do by that very act surrender to them the sovereign power of the Government. If you permit them to carry into effect, by their own judgment, the laws which they shall have made, you transform the Republic into an Oligarchy; and if, in addition to the power of making and interpreting the laws, you permit them to execute them, you substitute despotism for republicanism, and oppression and slavery for freedom.

But I feel almost ashamed to be urging, upon this body, arguments, of any kind, to prove what ought to be taken for granted. Sir, that the Legislative, the Judiciary, and the Executive powers, should be kept separate and distinct, and should be exercised by distinct bodies of magistracy, is an elementary truth acknowledged by all. It is recognized in most of the State Constitutions, and declared to be essential to the freedom of the People; and, in the Constitution of the United States, they are separated with an emphatic caution. And yet the assumption of this power by the Judges seems to excite no alarm. So far from exciting alarm, it is approved and advocated by some of the most distinguished members of this body.

Mr. President, there is a portentous indifference displayed by the States in relation to the violation of the great principles upon which their rights depend. When those principles are outraged in the case of any one of the States, the injured State complains, but her complaints are not heard, or, rather, not regarded, by the others; or, if heard, they are regarded as the ebullitions of a feverish impatience, of a restless and insubordinate temper, entitled rather to reprobation than sympathy. And what can the injured State do more than complain? She cannot alone repel encroachment upon her rights, by the General Government. The strength of each State is in the united efforts of them all, or, at least, of a majority of them. And how can that majority be enlisted in the cause of the injured State? Not by an appeal to her violated principles of State rights, nor by any portraiture of the wrongs which have been done her—nor by any invocation or remonstrance which she can make: for Kentucky has repeatedly remonstrated to the Congress on the subject of the usurpation of legislative power by the Federal Judges.

Sir, it is greatly to be feared that it is with the States as with individuals—they are only to be awakened to a sense of their wrongs, by their sufferings. It is owing almost exclusively to this cause that tyranny prevails, or oppression exists, or ever has existed, in the world. The heavy hand of tyranny is never laid upon a majority of the People at the same time. If they were, awakened by their injuries to a sense of their rights, they would annihilate the tyrant. It is so with the States—if a majority of them had seen the Federal Judges defy their laws, and dispose of the property and the liberty of their citizens, by laws arbitrarily made by themselves, they would have felt the outrage keenly and redressed it instantly. But be feared that, until the Judges should exert their legislative power in the other States as oppressively as they had in Kentucky, they would not awaken to the dangers with which they were threatened. They would not awaken to the consciousness that, in their connivance at the wrongs inflicted upon Kentucky, they virtually surrender their own rights, to the extent, at least, of the violated rights at which they have connived. But why talk of rights? When you have surrendered to the Judges the power of legislation, there are no rights left. You may, and no doubt will, have a splendid, but you will no longer have a free Government. You may have fine roads, and magnificent canals, made for you out of your own money, and by this bright illusion your attention may be diverted from the insidious underminings of your rights and your liberty, by the Judiciary Department of the General Government. But unless you associate with a quenchless love of liberty, and an invincible ardor to maintain it, the most untiring vigilance, your roads will be travelled, and your canals navigated, by an oppressed and enslaved, not by a free People. Sir, even now, while the Judges are legislating for the States, the General Government has, through the head of the Treasury Department, asserted its right to regulate the labor of the People of the States. Sir, the master regulates the labor of his slaves—a free People regulate their own labor.

Mr. President, I could not but remark, that, in the discussion of this matter, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] instead of arguing the question relative to the right of the Judges to make execution laws—instead of attempting to prove, by some principle in the science of politics, heretofore undeveloped, that this power to legislate might be judiciously and safely inferred for, and confided to the Judges—has, throughout, taken it for granted that they possess the power. He is willing, to be sure, to limit it—to restrain it. He is willing that they shall not legislate as to the manner in which lands and slaves shall be sold, under execution, in Kentucky. But, Sir, that will not satisfy the People of that State—it ought not to satisfy the People of the United States. The People of Kentucky insist that either Congress shall furnish an execution code for the United States' Courts within the States, or that executions emanating from those courts shall be carried into effect according to the execution laws of the States respectively. They insist that the Congress and the Legislatures of the States possess the only law-making power which exists among us. They deny that either is so far decayed as to grow and sustain this execrable power asserted for the Judges. They will have none of it, and they invoke you to save them, by removing it, from the unpleasant necessity of resisting it. There is a point beyond which any thing would be better than forbearance. Kentucky has been made to drink deep of the cup of humiliation—her whole remedial system has been, at one time or other, violated by those Judges. First, the power of legislating over the soil within her territory was denied to her in the vacation of her occupying Claimant Laws. Next, her replevin and valuation laws were vacated. And last, though not least, her citizens were imprisoned by them, under color of rules made by themselves, and in contravention of the laws of the State. Her patience and forbearance has not been exceeded by even these enormities upon her rights. Her confidence in the General Government has been the cause of her patience. She has looked to that Government for the redress of these outrages. The fate of this bill will determine whether her confidence has been well founded or not.

But the objections made to the provisions of the bill, by the gentleman [Mr. WEBSTER], demand special attention. Before he examined them, however, he could not but notice the answer which the gentleman gave to the arguments of the Senator from Illinois. That Senator was anxious for the passage of this, or some other bill, to regulate the process of the Federal Court in that State. He stated that the process act of 1792 did not extend to the State of Illinois, she having been admitted into the Union since that period, and that Judge Pope had refused to make process rules or laws for his Court; consequently, that business in that Court was at a stand. Sir, the conduct of Judge Pope, in this particular, was such as I should have expected, from my knowledge of his talents and his virtues. His refusal to legislate on this subject, does honor to his heart, and his head. He possesses too much intelligence and humanity—too much respect for himself, and too clear a knowledge of the rights of the States, and of the extent and limits of his own legitimate powers, to pervert the one to the violation of the other. He will always do what he ought to do, and will never be seduced or driven to do what he ought not to do. He is not the kind of man whom the possession of a little brief authority would be likely to lead to its lawless extension. But the reply made to the complaints from Illinois, by the gentleman [Mr. WEBSTER], was simply that those complaints were groundless; that there was no defect of Law in relation to that State; that the Judge could, by a single rule upon his order book, have adopted the process code of the State. A Judge make a code of Execution laws, by a simple entry upon his order book!!! There is, Mr. President, something grand, something of the moral sublime, in this. It reminds one of the light-producing fiat "Fiat lux et lux erat." Now, sir, although I like the brevity and the energy of this operation, I am not convinced of its legitimacy. Whence the power of the Judge to adopt the code of Illinois? Could he adopt the process laws of other States, or of any other kingdom, or nation? If he could not, why could he not? There is no power conferred upon him, by act of Congress, to adopt the laws of that, or any other State. He might be led, by considerations of fitness, to adopt the laws of that State—as he certainly ought, if he possessed the power. But the power, if possessed, was held under no restrictions, as to the subject or manner of executing it, but those which the will of the Judge might impose. The adoption of a law is equivalent to the making of it—it is a virtual making of it. The law, when adopted, is as obligatory as if it had been enacted. Its obligatory force results from the exercise of the sovereign legislative power in its adoption. Blackstone, quoted by the gentleman to another point, tells us that "sovereignty and legislation are convertible terms—that the one cannot subsist without the other." The gentleman would have the Judge of Illinois to exert the highest act of sovereign power; he would clothe him with the power to make a code of laws, than which a greater cannot be exerted by the Congress of the United States, with the concurrence of the President. What! a District Judge of Illinois, possessing as much legislative power as can be exerted by the two Houses of Congress, and the President of the United States, united!

Sir, the language of the gentleman shews the danger of the principle for which he contends. He speaks of this monstrous power in the Judge as a little matter; as a mere thing of course, of which nobody ought to entertain any doubt; and in relation to which the only matter of surprise is, that the Judge should have hesitated to exercise it. The pith and substance of the gentleman's reply to the Senator from Illinois is—Go to the District Judge of your State; it is his province to make the process laws which you need; why will you tease Congress about a matter which you can have done so easily and so dispatchfully at home: it is a small job; nothing but a system of laws, regulating the manner in which the property of one man shall be taken and given to another man, and by which the citizen may be imprisoned, if he fails to comply with the judgment of the Court; besides, the Judge will know so much better how to interpret it than if it were made by Congress; and, having made it himself, he will feel, on that account, a greater zeal to enforce it.

But, Mr. President, the gentleman (Mr. W.) does not seem to perceive, or, if he does, he has not indicated it, that, if the Judges possess the power which he contends the Judges should have exerted in the State of Illinois, the Congress do not; and that if the Congress do, the Judges do not. That the Congress do possess it, I presume no man will deny, or even doubt. It is pretended, however, that the Judges possess it by delegation from the Congress; that the act which authorizes them to make rules, and alter the forms of process, invests them with that power. But can the legislative power be delegated by Congress? Can they, instead of doing the duties assigned to them by their constituents and the Constitution, appoint sub-agents to do it for them? Can they legislate by deputy? To whom are the sub-agents or deputies responsible, and what is the nature of their responsibilities? Sir, either this power is or it is not legislative. If it is legislative, it cannot be delegated to the Judges. If it is not legislative, and is a ministerial power only, then I yield that it may be delegated. But who can doubt of its being legislative? The power is that of altering the forms of process, and making rules for the regulation of Judicial proceedings; in short, the power of making Execution Laws. Now, sir, we are told in the book referred to by the gentleman himself, that "law is a rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the supreme power of the State, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." Of course a rule of civil conduct, to be obligatory, must be prescribed by the supreme power of the State—and being so prescribed, must be a law. The same book says, "by the sovereign power is meant the making of laws; for wherever that power resides, all others must conform to, and be directed by it, whatever appearance the outward form and administration of the Government may put on." Would the gentlemen, by conceding the legislative power to the Judges, have all others to conform to, and be directed by it, or, which is the same thing, by them? Burlemaque holds the same opinion. He says, "the first part of sovereignty, and that which is, as it were, the foundation of all the rest, is the legislative power, by virtue of which the sovereign establishes general rules, which are called laws."—[Burlemaque, 52.] The same author assigns to the Legislature the power and the duty of prescribing the "necessary forms in contracts and testaments. The manner of proceeding in Courts of Justice," &c. &c.—[Idem, 112.] Again, he says that, "the sovereign ought, therefore, to declare his will, and to administer justice, not by arbitrary and hasty decrees, but by mature regulations, duly promulgated." Vattel says, in relation to this subject, that, "the Legislature should assist the understanding of the Judges, force their prejudices and inclinations, and subject their will to simple, fixed, and certain rules."—[Vattel, 137.] The same writer, speaking in relation to the administration of justice, says, "when the forms are prejudicial, it is the business of the Legislature to reform them."—Idem, 139.] Sir, it must be evident, not only from the nature of things, that the Legislature must be the sovereign power in every State; but the authorities which I have read are all to that effect, and prove that, even in the old Governments—monarchical, and aristocratical—the power of making the rules, and establishing the forms of proceeding in Courts of Justice, belonged not to the Judges, but to the Legislature. It is, then, a legislative, and not a ministerial power. It must be exercised by the Legislature, and cannot be exercised by the Judges. It does not belong to their office; they cannot obtain it by delegation; they can exert it by usurpation only. Is it not strange, sir, that we, just in the very flower of our freedom, should be anxious to concede to the Judges the exercise of the very power upon which our liberty and our happiness depends? Sir, legislation is the life's blood, the very soul of Government. It is by legislation that the will of the people is exerted in self-government. And it is in governing themselves, by their own will, that their freedom consists. In surrendering, therefore, to the Judges, the power of Legislation, we surrender our liberty, our freedom.

But the gentleman [Mr. WHEATON] says that all the arguments which I have brought against the delegation of this power to the Judges, applies with equal force to that provision of the bill which prescribes to the Judges the execution laws of the States in which they preside, as the execution laws of their Courts. He says that it is a delegation of the legislative authority to the States, and that such delegation can no more be made to them than to the Judges. This argument is used by the Chief Justice, in a case reported in Wheaton. I was sorry to see an argument which I considered so fallacious, so deceptive, and which leads to results so much to be deprecated, proceed from that exalted jurist; and I regret to see it acquiring strength, by its reiteration, on this floor. Sir, the cases are not parallel. In the one case, the will of the Judges forms the law for the People; in the other case, the will of the People forms the law for themselves, and, by the consent and adoption of Congress, for the federal Judges. In the one case, the law emanates from the will of the Judges who cannot exercise a legislative will, and upon whom that power cannot be conferred. It, nevertheless, controls the will of the People: in the other, the will of the People is elaborated into law by the employment of the constitutional machinery, and is selected by Congress as the rule of the Judges. The Congress does not confer upon the States the power of legislation; that power is inherent in them: and the Congress, confiding in the wisdom of its exercise, selects the law which is the result of the legitimate exercise of its legislative wisdom by the State, as the rule of proceeding in the Federal Court. It is not the potential legislative will of the States that is adopted by Congress. It is the exerted will embodied into law, which, as definite law, is adopted by Congress as the rule of the Courts. Sir, we have two Governments, and are but one People. Both Governments emanated from, and are sustained by, the will of the same People. There is not a greater paradox in politics than the belief that the same People have, or can have, two wills at the same time, in relation to the same subject. It is, therefore, immaterial whether they express their will upon the subject of process, through their Representatives in Congress, or their Representatives in the State Legislatures. Expressed through either medium, it must be the same. When, therefore, they declare, through their Representatives in Congress, that their declared will, through their State Representatives, shall be the rule of the Federal Courts, they do not confer a power upon their State Representatives to declare their binding will, but adopt, as a binding rule upon the Courts, their declared will. Sir, there is no mystery about this thing—a State can never be without an execution law, unless the People lose the power of will. That law is their defined will in relation to the subject of it, and it is, in its defined state, that this bill proposes to adopt it. Then, the execution law of a State is not a rule imposed by that State upon the Federal Court—it is a rule created for its own courts, and adopted by Congress, if this bill shall pass, as the rule of its courts in that State. And why should not the same rule govern both courts? They relate to, and regulate the concerns and the interests of the same People. But foreigners and citizens of other States may sue in the Federal Courts; and what of that, if, when they go into a State to transact business, by contracts or otherwise, the law of the State, the lex loci, must, it is acknowledged on all hands, govern in expounding the contracts?—and why not the remedial laws of the State, the lex loci, in carrying them into effect? Are the States less to be trusted, in relation to the laws of remedy, than of right? They are both the deliberately declared will of the same People, the latter by recognition, the former by creation. And, if the Congress were to enact a process law, the Representatives of the respective States would be faithful to their constituents, if they did not obey their will, as expressed in the process law of their State.

Mr. President, the American People exhibit the first instance of one people with two governments, which the world has ever seen. The success of the experiment, (if, indeed, it is destined to succeed,) must depend essentially upon the manner in which the will of the People is employed by their Representatives, in working this double machinery. The State Governments are more immediately under the eye of the People, and will be more likely to be worked by their will. But, unhappily, in this Hall, their will is not in quite such good odour, as in the States. Here, it appears, the will of the Government is more venerated than the will of the People. The will of the Judges seems to be all the rage here. They, instead of being governed, as they ought, by the will of the People, must control that will. Sir, there is no legitimate governing power, but the will of the People; and the substitution of any other will, for theirs, is an abandonment of that self-governing power of the People, for which they fought, and in which alone, I repeat, their liberty consists. They cannot be free upon any other grounds. If they are not governed by their own, they must be governed by some other will, and whether that be the will of a despot, or of the Judges, the result, in principle, is the same. They are the vassals of the despot, or of the despots—the Judges. The difference is only in the masters and the manner in which they exert their governing authority.

Judicial Process.

[FEB. 20, 1828.]

Now, Sir, the bill proposes to refer the administration of justice, by the Federal Judges, in the States, to the rules settled by the will of the People of the respective States. The gentleman [Mr. WENDELL] proposes to refer it to the will of the Judges, whenever the will of those dignitaries does not accord with the will of the People. He proposes, indeed, that the Judges shall exercise a supervisory power over the States, and control their will, by altering their rules, and by making new and conflicting rules of their own, to over-ride the will of the People of the State, by the will of the Judges. What, Mr. President, is the tendency of this doctrine? What, but to make the Government too strong for the People—to transfer the power from the People to the Government—to make the Government splendid, and the People wretched—to enable the Government to oppress, and finally enslave the People! Sir, the oppression of the People has always been, and will always be, by their Governments. The power delegated to promote their happiness has been turned against them, and employed to produce their misery. The manner has always been, as I have stated, the substitution, by the functionaries, under various pretences, of their own, for the will of their constituents.

Sir, by conceding this power to the Judges, you do not only open the gates of the city of your freedom to the enemy, but you invite them into the very citadel; and, if you permit them to stay there long, you will not be able, take my word for it, to turn them out. Take my word, did I say? No, sir: take the word of all history—of the history of all governments. Look abroad at the governments of the world—are they free? And why are they not? Sir, the People who compose them were once free; they were formed for freedom; nature made them to be free—she never made a slave. They have been enslaved by the weakness or wickedness of their agents—of their representatives. They have been cheated out of their liberty; they have yielded their power, under the illusive belief that it was to be employed to secure and promote their happiness, and have fared, as they ought to have anticipated—as every People will inevitably fare, who trust those concerns of their liberty to the agency of others, which they can perform for themselves. Sir, the People of the States can make as good Execution Laws for themselves, as the Federal Judges can make for them. Yes, sir, better than even Congress can make for them. They should not only not delegate any power which it is practicable for them to exercise; but they should reclaim, as soon as they legitimately can, all of that character which is now in a state of delegation. Does any man believe that the People could not themselves elect their President as judiciously as the Electoral College, or even Congress could? Sir, the experience of every day admonishes the People to be jealous of their power, as they regard their liberty. But why wait to be admonished by their own sufferings?—why not learn wisdom from the folly and sufferings of others?

Mr. President: The sentiment that the Congress, and the President, and the Judges, are too exalted to be questioned, in relation to their duties, seems to be pervading the public mind. It is certainly strongly advocated here. The advocates of this sentiment in the country point to the grandeur of the operations of the General Government; to the exalted posture of its functionaries, and ask, triumphantly, if it is reasonable to suppose that weakness or wickedness were ever associated with such magnificence? And here we modestly suppose that we ourselves would not do wrong, and that the wrong-doings of others could not escape our detection.

Sir, the American People are at this moment, and for the last three years, have been, in a greatly excited state, because they supposed that a portion of Congress had, in the election of President, misused its acknowledged power, while the prostration of the State authorities, by the Federal Judges, in the exercise of usurped powers, is beheld with calm indifference. The mis-exercise of legitimate power, in the election of President alarms the nation; while a State is disrobed of its sovereign legislative power, by an arbitrary assumption of authority on the part of the Federal Judges, without exciting a sensation beyond the limits of the oppressed State!!

But to return to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENDELL.] I have attempted to prove, and have, as I hope, proved satisfactorily, that the bill on the table proposes as the rule for the Federal Courts, not the power of legislation to be exercised by the States respectively, in which those courts may be held, but the exercised power of the States displayed in their process laws. The Congress chooses now, that her courts shall use them, then, as they shall exist, when they are needed. But, Sir, upon the supposition made by the gentleman, that the bill proposes to adopt, not the exercised legislative power of the States, but the power to be exercised, what can be the objection to even that form of the proposition? He is willing to adopt the existing process laws of the States. Are they different from what they will be ten years hence, or have been ten years ago. In their modifications and forms they may, but will they not be the same in essence? In the heat of summer we wear thinner and lighter clothes than we do in the midst of winter; we sleep under lighter covering in the former, than in the latter season. What is the motive? Comfort. Are not the persons thus differently dressed, in the different seasons, identically the same, and does not the same identical motive, or power, produce these different habiliments, and do these different habiliments constitute the apparel of the wearer? It is the same person, exerting the same power, for the same purpose, at different times, under different appearances.

An execution law is at least as necessary to the people in a state of civil society, as clothes, or covering are in their natural state. Civil society has the same natural inclination to be comfortable, and more power to promote its comfort, than individuals have. Sir, the remedial energies of civil society consist, essentially, in its will. They are the life of society, and it would be as absurd to say that the life which now animates any member of this body, who shall be alive ten years hence, is not the same which will animate him then. We have not different lives for different periods. We enjoy life under different circumstances, and under different states of cheerfulness and depression—we enjoy life, subject to be afflicted by accruing circumstances, which if we cannot control, must control us. It is precisely so with the body politic; like the human body its will is a part of, and identified with its life. Its remedial laws consist in its will, is identified with it, and is essentially the same identical unit with the body itself, whatever may be its different appearances, at different times, and under different circumstances. Sir, the same sun which rose this morning, and brightened and gladdened this gloomy region, will rise this day ten years, though his disk may then be concealed by clouds, or obscured by mists. So the same process law which now exists in Kentucky will exist there as long as the State exists. It may wear different aspects, as it shall be seen through the medium of different circumstances. It will wear one aspect in war, and another in peace, for the same reason that you appear differently clad in winter, from what you do in summer. And would you not, Sir, denounce as a tyrant that person, who would force you to wear the same light, thin dress through the winter, that you wear in the dog days? And ought not the States to denounce, as tyrannical, that act of the Judges, which obliged them, under the extremest privations of war, to renounce the process system which they had formed for themselves, and suited to their gloomy condition; and to use one formed and suited by the will of the Judges, to the most halcyon days of peace?

Sir, it is upon the principle which I am now urging, that all enlightened Judges have determined that all the forms of execution, feri facias, ca. sa. veni. expo. eligi, &c. are but one execution. Civil society is a unit—its will is one and identical, with itself, coexistent with it—they cannot be separated. Civil society ceases with the loss of its remedial will—in it consists the essence of its sovereignty; and it would be as reasonable to assert that there were different sovereignties in the same State, as a different execution law. Indeed the one could not exist without the other. But again, Mr. President: Does not the Senator from Massachusetts acknowledge, by the strongest implication, the force of my argument, in his proposition to adopt the existing (as he calls them) execution laws of the States? Why is he willing to adopt them? Has he examined, and does he know them? Can he, from knowledge, assert them to be fit and proper? No, Sir. Upon what principle, then, does he predicate this consent? Most certainly upon none other than that the execution law of every State, is the natural efflux of its wisdom; that essentially, it is unalterable, and that, in its modifications, it has been suited to the condition of the States, by the exercise of their legislative will. Well, Sir, will not the States be the same bodies politic ten years hence, that they are now? Will not the people possess the same inclination to be happy, which they now possess? Will they not possess the same wisdom, and the same will, to exert it in promotion of their happiness? Can it be supposed that the Federal Judges will then, at any intermediate, or future period, feel more for their happiness, or know better how to promote it, than they will themselves? Why, then, I ask, invert the laws of reason and of nature, in refusing to the people of the States, the exercise of the very power upon which their happiness, not less than their existence, depends?

But the gentleman is elaborate in his objections to the details of this short bill. And first he objects to the provision "that proceedings in equity shall be according to the principles, rules, and usages, which belong to the courts of equity in the States, respectively." This provision, he states, repels the equity jurisdiction of the United States Courts, in those States which have no Courts of Chancery; that Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and several other States have no Chancery jurisdiction, and that, if this bill shall pass, the Courts of the United States can exercise no equitable jurisdiction in any of those States. He tells us, moreover, that the jurisdiction of courts of equity is regulated by the civil law.

Mr. President, I differ from the gentleman, to toto cœlo, both as to the effect of the provision to which he objects, and in his extraordinary position, as to the civil law regulating Courts of Equity. And first, as to the destitution of equitable jurisdiction in the States, which I have just named. I am apprised, sir, that there are no Courts of Chancery in those States; but does it follow that they are without principles and rules of equity? It would seem to me to be impossible that civil society could exist for a moment without those principles and rules. I admit that the civil law is not in force in those States, and I deny the power of Congress to force it upon them, through the Federal Courts, or otherwise. But I insist, that Pennsylvania, (and I take that State as an instance,) has as plenary a system of equitable rules and principles as Virginia, or any of the other States where Courts of Chancery prevail. Her manner of applying those rules to the transactions of men in her courts, is not according to the manner which prevails in Virginia or England. It is not according to the Chancery forms, as practised in either of those Governments; but it is as it ought to be, according to the will of that State, as displayed in her Statute Book, and in the usages of her Courts. Sir, in Virginia, or any of the States where Chancery Courts prevail, a mortgage is foreclosed by bill in Chancery, and this is denominated a proceeding in Equity. In Pennsylvania, the proceeding to foreclose a mortgage is by scire facias. I do not know how they proceed to foreclose a mortgage in Rhode Island, or any of the other States where Courts of Chancery do not exist, but I know, that they have mortgages in those States, and that they must have some mode of foreclosing them. Now, the principles of Equity, so far as they are involved in the proceeding to foreclose, by bill, in Chancery, must be involved in every mode practised in the States having no Chancery Courts. The forms and modes of applying them may be, and no doubt are, different in the different States; but the essential principles and rules of equity must necessarily be the same in every State. Public sentiment, in every State, requires that justice shall be done, in some form or other, to the litigant citizens; and when justice has been done, in any case, the principles of equity are satisfied. When, for instance, the obligee of a lost bond, has recovered its amount from the obligor, in Pennsylvania, equity is as well satisfied as when the same result is produced in Virginia or in England by bill in Chancery. In either of the last named States, the form of proceeding must be by bill in Chancery—in Pennsylvania the form is different.

But, sir, what ought to be conclusive on this subject is, that those States have not chosen to administer justice through Chancery forms. They have not chosen to have Chancery Courts. They are sovereign States, and, most certainly, as such, have a right to establish their own judicial machinery. They have a right to dispense justice according to, or rather through whatever forms they may choose. Now, sir, is it an abrogation of the principles and rules of equity in those States, to require the Federal Judges to administer justice according to those principles and rules as established and observed by them? Shall the Federal Judges decide the cases, which are drawn into their courts, in those States, according to principles and rules of equity which they shall carry with them there, or shall they decide according to the principles and rules of the States? Can any man, who is not prepared to surrender the rights and powers of the States, determine this question in their favor? We cannot suppose that any State is without a competent system. Why should not each State have a plenary system? Surely the transactions and agencies of the citizens, make it alike necessary in every State. If it does not exist in each State, it must be owing to the want of power, or of wisdom, in the State which has it not. It cannot be want of power, for all the States are sovereign and equipollent—quoad hoc. Can it be want of wisdom? Is there any member of this Senate, who will say in his place, that his State is deficient in wisdom? Is incompetent to furnish her citizens with an equitable, plenary, and competent code, both as to law and equity? If he will not say so, will he say that the rights and interests of the citizens of his State shall be decided, whenever drawn into question in the Federal Court, by an alien, or citizen of another State? not by those principles and rules of equity, which have been ordained by the wisdom, and consecrated by the usage of that State, but by a code imparted by the Judges, and unknown to the State?

Sir, the gentleman from Boston, [Mr. WEBSTER] in denying that the States in which there were no Courts of Chancery, had any principles or rules of equitable proceedings of their own, has given a new view of the oldest, and most commercial people of the United States. What, sir, has the dense population of the State of Massachusetts, and the commercial people of the ancient city of Boston, been able to get along for such a length of time, without rules and principles of equity? And if she has but just awakened to her need of them, will she submit to have them imposed upon her by the Federal Judges? Or will she exert her sovereign power in the adoption and creation of a system for herself? The gentleman says that she does not want them. But she owes protection to those of her citizens, who may be drawn into the Federal Court by non-resident suitors. She cannot, without compromising her sovereignty, permit her citizens, within her own precincts, to be subjected to alien rules; rules carried about by the Judges, in manuscript, or in their recollections, unknown to the citizens, and unsanctioned by their State.

Mr. President, we all know, that the obligatory effect of a rule, principle, or law, is derived from the sanction of the sovereign legislative power. The Judges possess no legislative power; their rules, of course, cannot be obligatory. Then the amount of the gentleman's argument is, that the rights of the citizens of his State, and of States in the same situation, are to be decided by rules which have no obligatory force—rules arbitrarily made by the Judges, or as arbitrarily adopted by them; which, in effect, is neither more nor less than to say, that the rights of the citizens shall depend, not upon legitimate rules, but upon judicial discretion. And this, sir, is the doctrine which has been stealing upon the public mind for years—the doctrine which has oppressed some of the States, and which, at the very time when they are invoking exemption from its ravages, is openly advocated, and boldly attempted to be fastened upon them, and extended to the other States!

Sir, the gentleman has told us that the Chief Justice, some years ago, made a set of rules for Courts of Chancery in all the States. Now, those rules are, or they are not, binding. To make them binding, they must have been produced by the exertion of legislative power. Does the Chief Justice, do all the Judges together, possess legislative power? This question must be answered in the negative. Then, however wise they may be, and I am willing to admit that, proceeding from that great man they must be wise, they are unobligatory. Strange, that while we are contending against the exercise of legislative power by these Judges, we are offered, as an argument, in favor of their possessing it, that they have, many years ago exerted it, and, of course, that the States have for many years been subject to the effects of its exercise. What encroachment—what usurpation is there, can there be, which may not be supported by the same kind of argument?

Yes, sir, the Supreme Court enacted a system, consisting of thirty-three sections, or rules, which purport to be rules for the regulation of proceedings in Chancery, and which conclude with a delegation of power to the Judges on their circuits, to make as many more, for the government of proceedings in their Courts, as they in their discretion shall think necessary; provided they do not conflict—with what?—the constitution of the United States? No, sir: with the laws of Congress, or the laws or constitutions of the States? Not at all, sir; who could suppose that the laws or constitutions of the States could, for a moment, obstruct or retard their rule-making power? With what, then, Mr. President? Why, sir, with the code which they had enacted. The only restriction imposed by the Supreme Court upon the Judges, in the exercise of this delegated law-making power, was, that their laws should not conflict with those already made by the Supreme Court. And this code of thirty-three rules, enacted by the Supreme Court, is printed in Gordon's Digest of the Laws of the United States, a work lately published. In the text of that work, it does not appear that they were enacted by the Judges; they would seem, from their collocation with the laws of Congress, and from their import, to have been enacted by that body. It is thus, sir, that the States are legislated for by the Judges; and the concerns of their People, under color of law, regulated by the discretion of unauthorised individuals. For the Judges have no more power to make binding rules and principles of proceeding, than any of the same number of private individuals, out of the millions who compose this Union. To what extent the Judges may have exercised the rule-making power, thus delegated to them by the Supreme Court, (having itself no such power) does not appear. You have seen the execution laws, enacted by the Judges below, for Kentucky. Where is this thing to end, and in what is it to end? In what, unless it be checked, but the annihilation of the State authorities? Indeed, the doctrine, contended for by the gentleman from Boston, goes virtually that length: for, when the States are prepared to be furnished by the Federal Judges, with rules and principles of equity, there can be no reason why the Judges should not also furnish them with the rules and principles of law: for the States are surely as competent to furnish themselves with a system of equity as of law, and the Judges are as competent to furnish them with a system of law, as of equity. And if, instead of asserting their own competency, the States submit to receive from the Judges the one, there can be no reason why they should decline the other. The People who submit to an usurpation of half their rights, are unworthy to retain, and unfit to enjoy, the other half.

But the gentleman urges that the civil law regulates proceedings in equity. Now, Mr. President, by the civil law, every lawyer understands that the municipal law of the Roman empire is meant. That law, he tells us, regulated proceedings in equity in England, and performs the same office in our country. Mr. President, can the gentleman be serious? If that code has force in England, it must either have been adopted by, or imposed upon, that country. The code of no one nation can have force in another, but by compulsion or adoption. Any nation may, if it shall choose, adopt the code of another; and a strong nation may subject a weak one to its code. Now, we know that England has never adopted the civil law; and we know, also, that she never was subdued to the use of it; we know, therefore, that the gentleman is mistaken; that the civil law is not, as a code, obligatory upon the Courts of Chancery in England; and, for precisely the same reasons, we know that it is not in force in this country. But, sir, if it were in force in either country, it could not be in force as the civil law, as the Justinian code. Any nation using it, must use it as her own, and not as a foreign or alien code. If that were not the case, the code would use the nation, and not the nation the code. A nation ceases to be sovereign, when the laws which it uses do not derive their authority from its sovereign power. Its laws must be its own—and this from political necessity. Sir, this is the language of sir William Blackstone, in relation, too, to this very subject; he holds this language "The laws of Justinian, [the civil laws,] bind not the subjects of England, because their materials were collected from Popes or Emperors; were digested by Justinian, &c. These considerations give them no authority; for the Legislature of England doth not, nor ever did, recognize any foreign power as superior, or equal to it, in this kingdom; or as having the right to give law to any the meanest of its subjects."—[1st Black. Com. 79.]

Thus, sir, is not only the language of England, but of every State that is conscious of its sovereign powers, rights, and duties. But, sir, hear the same author further upon the same subject. He says, "there are four species of Courts in which the civil and canon laws are permitted, [under different restrictions] to be used. 1st. Courts of Arch Bishops, Bishops, &c. 2. Military Courts. 3. Courts of Admiralty. 4. The Courts of the two Universities."—[Idem 83.] Here, sir, we are told expressly that there are but four Courts in England in which the civil law can be used, and in those by permission, and subject to restrictions. The Court of Chancery is not one of the four. How, then, could the gentleman expect us to believe that proceedings in equity in England were regulated by the civil law, when those laws were not permitted to be used in Courts of Chancery there, even subject to restrictions. Sir, the authorities read by the gentleman to prove his position, fall entirely short of sustaining it. They were 2d Black. Com. 429, and Cooper XXVI. They only prove what every body knew, that the learning of that country was, in early times, in the possession of the Ecclesiastics, who were Roman Catholics: that they were the first Chancellors, and that the machinery of Chancery proceeding was formed through their agency and influence, pretty much upon the Roman canonical plan. But, surely, the rules and principles of proceeding in equity are very different things from the form of a Chancery suit. But, sir, if the civil law is to govern—if it contains the rules and principles of proceeding in equity, why will the gentleman insist, as he does, that we shall derive our knowledge of it from England? It is not, as I trust I have shown, the code of that nation. It is not, as the civil law, in force there. Why not import it at once from Rome? Why not claim it as a waif? The Roman empire has been wrecked; yes, sir, and the Roman Republic has been wrecked, too. That republic had its code of civil law; why not import and use, as the waif of that republic, its civil code? I should, if obliged to submit to either, greatly prefer the civil code of Republican, to that of Imperial Rome. But the gentleman will have it from England; we must get the rules of equity, says he, from England, through learned judges and lawyers, who have made it (the civil law) their study. And pray, when gotten in that way, or any other, what is its obligatory force upon the people of any of the States? Surely he does not mean to be understood, that it derives its force from the channel through which it is obtained. So far as the Judges form the medium of its intromission, there is, I grant you, Mr. President, much reason to believe not that it will, from that circumstance, possess any intrinsic force; but that they will, in their use of it, give it force enough. The lawyers too, according to the gentleman, are to furnish us with law. As one of the Representatives from the State of Kentucky, I could say to the gentleman—thank'ee, sir, no occasion—the Judges have given that State law enough, without any supplement from the lawyers. So far from receiving it from the lawyers, the State of Kentucky will not receive it from the Judges. She will acknowledge nothing as law, which has not, in some way, had legislative sanction. She will insist, and I hope not without effect, that the Judges shall neither make nor import law.

Sir, the gentleman has kindly offered, as an apology, for what he supposes to be my ignorance, on the subject of the rules, and principles, of proceedings in equity, the consideration, that being somewhat older than he is, I have withdrawn my attention from courts, and their practice, more than he has. I thank him. It is true that I am, perhaps, a little older than he is, and that I have not latterly been much conversant with courts, and their practice. But the gentleman must allow me to solace myself with the hope, that the ungracious weight of years, with which he has complimented me, while it has withdrawn me from courts, and their technicals, has afforded me more leisure than his crowded practice in courts has allowed him, to explore law in its origin, its source, in its first-principle aspect. Whether I have employed that leisure well or ill, it is not for me to say. My reflections, however, have led me to the conclusion, that law is not so mysterious a matter, as judges and lawyers have been disposed to have it considered. Law has been wrought up by its votaries, into a perplexed, and mysterious system. The difficulties of unravelling the transactions of men, rendered perplexed and complicated by artifice and fraud, have been ascribed to the law. The matters of fact are often perplexed, intricate, and difficult to ascertain. But the law is simple and intelligible, and upon a clear understanding of the facts, would be discerned, almost intuitively, by every man of common sense. Sir, instead of the civil law of imperial or republican Rome, translated from the numerous, and ponderous Latin tomes, in which it has lain locked up for centuries, or of troubling the learned Judges and lawyers to apply it, as compounded with the common law, I am for using the domestic law of the States. There is a natural equity in every State, as good as they had at Rome, or have in England. It is inherent in the people composing the States. In the abstract it is precisely the same which regulated proceeding in equity at Rome, in England, and in every State in the civilized world. It is the result of the exercise of mind upon matter. But every State has its own mode of exercising its intelligence upon the concerns of its citizens. That its mode or form of administering justice, should be its own, is essential to its sovereignty. The principles of justice are universal. They are co-extensive with reason; but the machinery of justice is as various almost as the States. Strange, Mr. President, that we should be so zealous to make our own woollen fabrics, so averse to using those made in England, and yet anxious that England should supply us, through learned Judges and lawyers, with the modes and forms by which we shall administer justice in the States! Not only with the modes and forms, but with the principles and usages of equity, as recognized and used by that nation. Sir, if it were contended by Congress that we should not only use British cloth, but that our clothes should be cut and made according to the taste and fashion of that country, I fancy we should rebel outright. Well: The case is precisely analogous. What is the difference, except that we cannot conveniently make all the woollen fabrics, which we need? We have neither the materials, the artists, nor the machinery. But in relation to the principles, modes, and usages of equity, every State has them, as abundantly, and of as good quality, as they exist in England. And, being sovereign, each State ought to be permitted to use them according to her own will. I insist that she has a right to do so. The gentleman has read Blackstone to prove that "Equity is the soul and spirit of all law." That "positive law is construed, and rational is made by it."—[2nd Black. 429.] Sir, if it be so important, and I grant its importance to the extent stated in the book, how wretched must be the condition of the States not to possess it—to be dependant upon learned Judges and lawyers for it!

Sir, the book read by the gentleman confirms the sentiment which I have urged—asserts the position for which I contend—and that is, that equity is justice, and exists in every state of civil society ; that it is, in relation to the moral, what the sun is to the natural world—it is the light of reason, shining upon the transaction of men, and shewing the relation of things ; and that each State has the right to use this light according to its own judgment and taste ; as in relation to the light of the sun every proprietor of a building has a right, in constructing it, to give it what kind of exposure, and as many, or as few windows as he chooses : aye, and according to what order of architecture he may select. * Now, sir, we should smile at a proposition to restrict the States to the use of British sunshine ; and how much more absurd is it to oblige them to use the lights of British intellect, as the only medium through which to discern and ascertain the relations which their citizens bear to each other, to the transactions in which they may be concerned, and to their Government ? I have said, Mr. President, that Law, as a science, is the most simple and rational of all the sciences ; as an art, it is difficult, complex, and mysterious. It is peculiarly so in the country from whence it is the wish of the gentleman that the learned Lawyers and Judges shall import it. He has spoken of the laws, beginning with those of the universe, in a manner well calculated to show his own knowledge of them and their mystery. Waiving those of the universe, which are in better hands than those of the gentleman or myself—where I am content to leave them—I would say, that as nations have the relation of intercourse with one another, out of this relation results the laws which regulate it. Those laws are principles of natural fitness, recognised and acknowledged by the intelligence, by the common sense of the intercommuning nations, on account of their obvious fitness, as binding rules of intercourse between them. These rules are denominated the laws of nations, and are, in fact, the laws of nature. Each nation has laws relative to the governors and the governed. These laws, in free governments, are the obvious principles of fitness, resulting from that relation, and are denominated political law.

Judicial Process.

In every nation, or state, there are also laws regulating the intercourse of the People with one another, and these, Mr. President, are called civil law ; which is divided into civil and criminal. Every body is bound at his peril to know these laws. And can it be believed that before he can know them, he must apply for them to learned Judges and lawyers ? No, sir ; it is all a common sense matter. Every man of well balanced mind, knows the distinction between right and wrong, and knows the justice of every case, the moment he has clearly comprehended the facts of it, as well, and even better, than many learned Judges and lawyers. He knows it by intuition. Sir, not only his comfort here, but his happiness or misery hereafter, depend upon his knowing, and observing, practically, the principles of justice and equity. His duty to himself, to his neighbor, and to his God, requires the knowledge and practice of equity and justice. It would be idle to talk of duty, and of conscience, upon any other hypothesis. Why, sir, conscience consists, almost exclusively, of this very knowledge. And I presume, few of us would be willing to give our consciences into the keeping, of either Judges or lawyers. The latter, indeed, are not said to be very remarkable, for possessing good ones of their own. Then, I repeat, sir, that law but recognizes and enforces the distinction which exists in the conscience of every man, between right and wrong. It does not consist in any arbitrary or factitious system, artificially constructed, by the politicians of a state ; but in the principles of fitness, resulting from the relations of men to one another, in a state of society ; and of a recognition by civil society of those natural principles, as the rules of their conduct. In this recognition by civil society, of those natural principles of fitness, consists their obligatory legal effect. They were binding upon the conscience of man, and destined to regulate his conduct in a state of nature. They were to individuals, in a state of nature, what the laws of nature now are to nations. But their adoption and recognition by civil society, superadded to their natural, a legal obligation ; and the legal obligation of every rule of law or equity, in any State, results from the exercise of the sovereign, legislative power of that State, in the tacit, or express adoption, or recognition of it. No rule or principle can acquire the force of municipal law, from any other source. A man may learn in England, or at Rome, or Venice, the relations of things, and the resulting principles of fitness ; but to give those principles the force of law in any state, requires the legislative sanction of the sovereign power of that state. And herein, Mr. President, lies the difference between free and vassal states. Free states appropriate, by legislative sanction, those universal rules and principles of equity and justice, and use them as their own. Vassal states are regulated by laws enacted or adopted for them by others. Now, sir, the jurisdiction of courts of equity, is employed in administering justice in special cases, or in certain classes of cases, which the laws cannot, owing to the judicial machinery, in their ordinary operation, reach and explore. Those cases, or classes of cases, were not, more than the ordinary cases, without their obligatory rules and principles. Like all the common cases, decided in the ordinary course of adjudication, they were subject, in common with them, to the ordinary rules and principles of equity ; but they were special, and the operation of those principles was general. The general principles could not be applied to the special cases, or classes of cases, for the want of a judicial medium. Such was the case in England, and hence her Chancery Courts for the trial of that description of cases. But those cases, when tried in chancery, were decided by the same rules and principles of equity, by which the ordinary cases were decided in the law courts. The manner of examining and trying the cases was different, in the different courts ; but the rules and principles of decision were the same in both courts. The object in both courts was the same. It was to do justice. The rules and principles of decision were the same. And there never would have been a court of chancery in England, had it not been for the inaptitude of the judicial system of that country, and of the rules of the common law, to the trial of the special cases which I have named. But, sir, does this inaptitude exist in any of the States in which there are no Courts of Chancery ? The very non-existence of those Courts, in those States, is an evidence that it does not—is an evidence that, under the existing laws, full and complete justice can be done in every case ; and full and complete justice is the equity of every case.

Mr. President, I should not have dwelt so long on this part of the subject, if the gentleman had not made it the subject of his most elaborate efforts ; if he had not, by his manner, seemed to indicate that he was occupying a region which abounded in mysteries, scarcely known to any but himself ; a region, the Delphic duties of which he seemed to think belonged to himself. Thinking that there really was no mystery in the matter, except that produced by the mysterious operation of his own mind upon it, I, perhaps, in turn, have been a little too elaborate. But, sir, having a strong conviction that there should, in the laws and political machinery of a Republic, be nothing either mysterious in its nature, or intricate in its texture, I have been led into a detailed argument, which I fear may have been thought by some tedious. Yet, surely, sir, when the importance of the question is considered, I shall be pardoned. We have been contending at the boundary line which separates the legislative from the judicial power, and at the line which separates the National, and the State jurisdictions. Sir, the moment you permit either of those lines to be transscended or obliterated, we are gone. There is nothing left worth contending for—consolidation ensues, and a splendid Empire will but point to a wretched and enslaved People. But, while the People continue to make and understand their laws, to use none that they do not make, and hold to strict responsibility those who administer them, they are safe, and will be happy. Sir, I can have no objection to a reconsideration of this question. I do not want the bill to pass, unless it has the approbation of a majority of this body. The Senator from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. McLANE] have each acted towards me, in the progress of this bill, with a generosity and magnanimity which commands my respect and demands my acquiescence in the motion for a reconsideration. Those gentlemen, I am sorry to say, are both opposed to the bill, but for reasons infinitely more plausible than those urged by the Senator from Massachusetts. I shall therefore assent to the reconsideration of the question, and to any modification of the bill which may be more agreeable to the Senate, and does not confer on the Judges the right to make rules—to that, I never will consent.

Mr. TAZEVELL followed, in opposition to the reconsideration: To whom Mr. ROWAN briefly answered.

Mr. WEBSTER replied briefly to some of the remarks of Mr. ROWAN.

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to.

THE LATE GENERAL BROWN.

Mr. HARRISON, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, rose and said: I rise, Mr. President, to perform a most painful duty—that of announcing the death of Major General Jacob Brown, the distinguished commanding General of our army. He died yesterday, in this city, at half past twelve o'clock. I am aware, Mr. President, that, in the performance of a duty of this kind, something like an eulogium upon the character and actions of the hero, whose loss we deplore, might be expected. At all times unequal to such a task, I am particularly unfitted for it at this moment. Besides, what could I say of General Brown, that is not already known? His best eulogium would be found in a recital of his brilliant achievements, and with these every Senator present is familiar. We all recollect, sir, with what thrilling anxiety our attention was turned towards the Niagara frontier, in the late war, when it was announced that an officer of acknowledged bravery indeed, but without military education, and with limited military experience, had been placed at the head of our Army. We must also recollect with what joy and gratitude to Heaven, we heard of his first brilliant exploit, rapidly followed by a second, and with what perfect confidence we then relied, that the final result would be such as it was—eminently glorious to himself, his army, and his country. Sir, said Mr. H. I will turn from this scene to one of a different character, but not less interesting, and eminently calculated to shew the ruling passion of his soul, at a moment when there can be no deception, no affectation of that which is not real. It was the good fortune of General Brown to be surrounded on his death bed by a large family. A wife, who was entitled to all his tenderness; and children, who justly merited his affection. In such a scene, on such an occasion, it may well be supposed that his mind would be turned with intense anxiety upon the future fate of objects so justly dear to him; and such was the fact. He knew that the hand which had directed them, would be soon cold; the hand from which alone they received their daily support, would, in a few short hours, be lifeless, and no longer able to supply it. But, after having committed these beloved objects of his affection to that Almighty Power which had hitherto protected them, his thoughts incessantly turned to his country—to that country which he had so faithfully and successfully served, for which he had bled, and for which, as he believed, he had given his life. He spoke with raptures of her happiness, of her exalted rank among the nations of the earth, and her glorious destinies; and almost his last sigh was breathed for her continued prosperity. Such, sir, said Mr. H. was the man, in life and in death, for whose memory I ask the tribute of respect contained in the resolutions which I now submit:

“Resolved, That the Senate have learned, with deep regret, the death of Major General Jacob Brown, the late Commanding General of the Army, and the distinguished leader in the glorious battles of Chippewa, Niagara, and Erie, in the late war.

“Resolved, That, as a mark of respect to the deceased General, the members of the Senate will wear the accustomed badge of mourning on the left arm for one month.

“Resolved, That, if the House of Representatives concur, the Senate will, in conjunction with the House of Representatives, attend the funeral of Major General Brown, on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock.”

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the first part of the resolution. He thought it would establish a bad precedent, to go into mourning for any individual other than a member.

Mr. HARRISON expressed his regret, that his friend from Maryland should oppose the resolution offered by him. That gentleman was so distinguished for his liberality of sentiment, and his high sense of the services of meritorious public officers, he hoped the gentleman would not persist in his objections.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. observed, that no man was more sensible than himself, of the eminent services performed by General Brown. But it was a new thing for the Senate to go into mourning on such an occasion. Other general officers had died without any such expression of respect; and he did not think it was proper to commence such a practice at this time. He could not oppose the resolutions; and he had no disposition to do so; but he thought they would be better without the second clause. It was all the Senate could consistently do, to say that General Brown deserves the thanks of his country; and that the Senate lament his decease; and that they will attend his funeral on Wednesday.

Mr. CHANDLER expressed his high opinion of the great merit and services of General Brown. He thought, however, that, when a military man died, it was an appropriate ceremony to bury him with the honors of war. He thought with the gentleman from Maryland, that it was a new thing for the Senate to go into mourning on the occasion. He believed such a method of expressing regret for the death of a military man, was not countenanced by the legislative bodies of any country. He should, therefore, be forced to oppose that part of the resolution.

Mr. NOBLE said, that if he voted against the resolution, he wished the reason to be understood. He was averse to the precedent which would be established by resolving to wear mourning for a military man. The case of General Washington was no parallel with the present. He was the saviour of his country—he had been at the head of its Executive—and lived in peace, as in war, the first, most virtuous man of the age. At his death the whole country was plunged in mourning; and it was consistent that the Legislative bodies should wear the badge. He was averse to voting against this resolution, because he regretted the death of Gen. Brown, and sympathized with the feelings of his family. He wished that the portion of the resolution, which declares that the Senate will go into mourning, might be withdrawn; as he thought a homage of this kind to a military man, would assimilate us too much to a despotic Government. In every other case, the members of each separate profession bestowed these honors on their deceased companions. The members of the bar wore mourning for one of their fraternity; and Legislative bodies did the same. The Army, he believed, went on the same principle; and there it ought to stop. He did not wish to encourage any practice which should take the shape of idolatry, for services, however great. He was sorry that he felt constrained to make these remarks. He honored General Brown in every station; he lamented his death; and in every consistent manner he was ready to testify his respect for his character, and his memory. Nothing was farther from him, than to treat with disrespect the feelings of the family of the deceased, with whom he sincerely sympathized.

Mr. BELL moved to strike out so much of the resolutions, as related to the Senate wearing mourning.

Mr. HARRISON acceded to such a modification, and the resolutions having been so amended, were agreed to.

A joint resolution of the other House, for the appointment of a committee of three from each House, to make arrangements for the funeral of the late General Brown, was received and concurred in.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1828.

Both Houses of Congress this day attended the funeral of General Brown.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1828.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the office of Major General of the Army of the United States is unnecessary, and, therefore, ought to be abolished; and that the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to bring in a bill for the purpose of abolishing said office accordingly.

JUDICIAL PROCESS.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to establish Judicial process in the States admitted into the Union since the year 1789.

Mr. KANE offered several amendments.

Mr. ROWAN inquired whether they were in order?

The CHAIR stated that they were not in order; but that the gentleman might attain his object by a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of La. made a few remarks, and the CHAIR remarked, that it would not be in order to move any amendment which would strike out any part of the bill adopted at a former period, but that any proviso might be added to it.

Mr. KANE then moved an addition to the bill, giving the power to the District and Circuit Courts to alter and modify the rules of the State Courts, and to the Supreme Court to frame new rules from time to time, &c.

Mr. ROWAN moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, so as to restrict this power to "matters of form only." Which was agreed to—19 to 12.

The amendment, as amended, was then adopted, and the bill passed to be engrossed for a third reading.

A few moments after the last vote was taken, Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that, when the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky was adopted, he was absent; but as he understood that the bill in its present shape would operate upon all the States, he should move to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary. He thought its provisions ought to be so framed as to suit the purposes of all; and as the decision upon such questions belonged peculiarly to that committee, this bill ought to be once more referred to it. The bill had gone through various forms, and, in that in which it now appeared, he could not vote for it, however anxious he might be for the adoption of some measure which would give to the new States the process promised by this bill. But he could not support it while it proposed an innovation upon the Judicature of the old States, with which, in reality, it ought to have nothing to do. He hoped, therefore, that this matter, made complex by the various motions in relation to it, would be again submitted to the investigation of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HAYNE inquired whether the motion to recommit was in order. The bill had been ordered to a third reading, and until it had been read a third time, he thought it was not in order to move its recommitment.

The CHAIR said, that in strict parliamentary rule, the motion was not in order; but it had been always the practice to accede to a motion to recommit, when not opposed by a Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said that he was averse to the bill in its present form, because it would doubtless be lost, if persisted in. The bill was framed for the new States, and for them only. If the old States were left as they were, they would be satisfied, and he knew no reason why they should be interfered with. If they were so interfered with, the members from the old States would vote against the bill, and it would probably fail.

The CHAIR said, that, if the gentleman from S. Carolina objected to the motion, it would be considered out of order. In that case, the gentleman from Massachusetts could move the reconsideration of the vote, by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. HAYNE said he made no objection to the motion, and had spoken merely on the supposition that it was contrary to the rules.

Mr. ROWAN observed, that he should object to the motion. He had no fear that the bill would be endangered by opposing it, as the Senate had twice decided in favor of the bill in its present form, and it had once been objected, at an early stage, that the old States were not included.

Mr. BERRIEN considered it an error, that all the old States were satisfied with the present judicial process. It was also a misapprehension to suppose that this bill would be otherwise than inconvenient, or that it would remedy the evils now complained of. To confine the exercise by the Courts of the United States, of the revising power, to "matters of form only," would, in a great degree prevent the Federal jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The power to prescribe rules for their own courts had been hitherto given to the Federal Judges, under certain limitations; and it could not be confined to forms alone, without doing serious injury.

Mr. KANE said, that he should vote for the recommitment, as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky seemed to him inexpedient and improper.

The question was then taken on recommitting the bill and was decided in the affirmative, 23 to 16.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1828.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. HARRISON had leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, widow of the late Maj. Gen. Brown; which was read twice, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

OFFICE OF MAJOR GENERAL.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER, to abolish the office of Major General in the Army of the United States, was considered.

Mr. CHANDLER said that he fully believed the office of Major General was not necessary in the present state of our Army. This was no new opinion, but had long been entertained by him. In the year 1821, a bill was brought into the other House to fix the Military Peace Establishment; and a vote of the House was taken on the question of retaining one Brigadier General, and decided in favor of it by a large majority. But the friends of General Brown moved an amendment to the bill, and had sufficient influence to succeed, and thereby ensure his retention in the service. Mr. C. said he was not easily induced to second the views of the friends of General Brown; but he did eventually vote for the amendment providing for one Major General and two Brigadier Generals. He had after regretted the vote he then gave, and had determined, on the first occasion that might offer, by the vacancy of the office, to move to abolish the office of Major General, convinced, as he was, that a feeling of gratitude to General Brown, and not the sober judgment of Congress, had retained him in the office. One Brigadier General was, he thought, sufficient for the present condition and wants of our Army. There would be two Brigadier Generals left after the abolition of the office of Major General, and they would be able to do all the duties which could be required or needed from a Major General in a time of profound peace. The measure would also be a saving to the country of a considerable annual sum.

Mr. HARRISON observed that, until this morning, he had not been aware of the tenor of the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from Maine. He had supposed that it was in the general form of resolutions for an inquiry. On the contrary, he found it to be an imperative direction for the abolition of the office of Major General. The ordinary course was, to refer all such matters to a committee, which would investigate the practicability and expediency of carrying into effect the measures proposed, and make a detailed report to the Senate of all the circumstances relating to the subject, and probable effects of its adoption. In its present aspect, the resolution met with his decided disapprobation. It was well known that, besides the Major General, for whose death so much regret was now felt, there were three Major Generals by Brevet. If the object of the resolution went no farther than to refuse to fill the vacancy made by the death of General Brown, it would, in fact, not make the change anticipated by the gentleman from Maine. Each officer would take his rank, pay, and emoluments, as pointed out by the present regulations. If economy was, therefore, the object, the resolution would not compass the purpose for which it was offered.

Mr. CHANDLER said that his object was to abolish the office altogether. He would, however, go farther, and endeavor, by some additional provisions, to avoid the effects predicted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON said that the whole object ought to be embraced in one bill, as it could be more conveniently considered when taken up entire, than when the details were separated. He wished to look at the whole of the projected change at once. To speak, however, of that which had been proposed by the present resolution, it was a well known, as it was a universal practice, where vacancies occurred, to fill them with the officer next in rank. This would be the case in the present instance. The oldest Brigadier General would take the situation vacated by General Brown. Another Brigadier General would succeed to the oldest. The senior Colonel would be promoted to the rank of Brigadier, and so on, through all the subordinate ranks of the army. There would be no economy in the adoption of the resolution. If it passed into a law, we should have officers in precisely the same places, doing the same duty, and drawing the same pay. Although a nominal change would be effected, it would not be a real one, so far as the object of the gentleman from Maine extended. There were other objections to the measure, which he had now, scarcely time to demonstrate to the Senate. The present establishment was supposed to be a permanent one. Its effects upon the condition of the army had been highly salutary, and he believed that it was popular. The system was most thorroughly sustained, by historical facts and experience. It was necessary that every army should have a Commanding General. By no other plan of command could unity of design and action be ensured: for in military affairs especially, was the direction of one head required. There had been memorable instances of defeat from an opposite state of things, which must be familiar to the minds of all who have become conversant with military history. A case in point was the failure of the French army in the Peninsula, which is attributed by a judicious historian to the want of a commander-in-chief. The French forces were commanded by several distinguished officers, of equal rank, whose operations wanted consistency, and were, therefore, rendered ineffectual. On the other hand, Lord Wellington, having the supreme command, gave to his movements that unity of purpose, and direction of all his forces to the attainment of the objects to which his operations were turned, that gave him a decided advantage. The same error caused much evil in our first campaign on the frontier of Canada, during the last war. It would ever be so; and, to prevent similar embarrassments, the present system had been considered effectual. The fact of the existence of peace did not alter the principle. The Army was organized with a view to a state of war. It was, in its present state, a skeleton, representing the outlines of its form in a period of hostility, which were to be filled up when a period of actual service should arrive. The grand principles of its formation were drawn from the position in which it would be necessary to place it in time of war. It could hardly be proper to calculate upon the continuation of the present state of things. He was not sure that the world, as it now existed, promised perpetual peace. While there existed a possibility that a state of war might exist, it was prudent to retain so much of an organized army as would ensure that our preparations to meet it, should it arrive, may not be disconcerted. The present system compassed this design, and went no farther, and he, therefore, considered that it ought not to be altered. He was desirous that the resolution might be made in the form of an enquiry, when facts and arguments could be produced to the Senate, which would materially assist in coming to a right and proper decision.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he understood the object of the resolution to be to abolish whatever related to the office of Major General. He dissented from the Senator from Ohio, as to the operation of the measure. Every officer, in case it should go into effect, would remain in the present rank, until promoted by the due course, which was the nomination of the President of the United States, and the consent of the Senate. Without this process, the vacancy made by the death of General Brown would remain without an incumbent. Nor did the death of this officer make a regular routine of promotions a matter of course. The President might nominate some citizen to fill the office, as in the case of General Brown, and of General Jackson, who were taken from the People. The President was not bound to promote the Brigadier Generals. He did not think the rank of Major General necessary, and he knew well the reason for retaining in the service the Brigadier Generals after the war. They had done great service during the war, and the country felt too much gratitude for those services to allow them to be turned off. It was not that they were needed to command our little Army of 6000 men. There seemed to him no difficulty in the question. The office was not required by the existing state of things; and he should, therefore, vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that his object was to test the opinion of the Senate as to the abolition of the office of Major General. It was not necessary for this purpose to send the resolution to a Committee. He did not agree with the gentleman from Ohio as to the effect of the measure. He saw no inconvenience that could arise from it. The practice had been changed by the act of 1821, so that the orders of the Department, instead of going through the hands of the Adjutant General, passed first through the hands of General Brown. No inconvenience could arise from striking off the office, and he was not convinced that the reasoning of the gentleman from Ohio, as to the economy of the measure, was correct.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that it was the usage to appoint a committee, consisting of men most conversant with military affairs, to whom all questions on the subject were referred, as it seemed, as a matter of course. The gentleman from Maine and Ohio, who now differed so widely on the subject, were members, and it was certainly expedient to refer the resolution to their investigation. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine, was, he apprehended, a departure from the rules of the Senate; and, he thought, would produce much embarrassment, if persisted in. There were many considerations which would most appropriately occupy the attention of the committee, and which ought to be examined before the Senate passed upon the resolution. They must enquire what the effect of the abolition of the office of Major General would be upon the Brevet Generals, and upon the Army, and its discipline. Upon these, and many other questions which naturally presented themselves, and which could not be settled in a partial or hurried investigation, he wished the committee might deliberate and report. He found an additional reason for wishing the reference from the diversity of opinion that had been shown by the two gentlemen of the Military Committee. They are totally at variance in their opinions of the operation of the measure, and others, who are not so well versed in military affairs, may well, under such circumstances, ask for information. Let us, therefore, send the resolution to the Military Committee, that these gentlemen may meet each other, investigate the whole subject, compare their views, and report whether it is expedient to abolish Brevet rank altogether, or whether the country will be served by abolishing the office of Major General. When this is done, the Senate will be prepared to act understandingly on the subject. With these views, he was in favor of referring the resolution to the Military Committee.

Mr. MACON said he thought the gentleman from South Carolina was mistaken. He believed the rule was to settle the principle of any question first in the Senate, and then to send it to a committee to settle the details. He alluded to some instances of this in former legislation. As to the project itself, it met with his approbation. He believed, if a nation went to war, it was bad to have too many high officers. They were not generally the men who did the most for the glory of the Army. By whom, said Mr. M. were your great exploits performed during the last war?—I don't mean to say any thing against the old men—they were performed by men in the vigor of life, and full of ambition. And if you have another war, it will be so again. There was always about an equal share of military talent in every Army. Times of peace did not call out that kind of talent. When war came, the kind of character you want will come out, nor was it necessary to be seeking it out when it was not wanted. In time of need, military genius will always show itself without its being necessary to search after it. He was in favor of abolishing the office of Major General, and thought it not necessary that it should be submitted to a committee.

Mr. HAYNE rose to move an amendment of the resolution; but

Mr. BERRIEN said, that, with the permission of his friend from South Carolina, he would offer an amendment which he had committed to writing, and which would embrace the views of that gentleman. He then moved a substitute to the resolution, making its object matter of the inquiry of the Military Committee, to report upon it by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. HARRISON said, that, in answer to his remarks, the gentleman from Maine had stated that his objects were solely the abolition of the office of Major General, and to save the amount of that officer's pay. But Mr. H. felt well assured that the measure would not save a dollar. His friend from Maryland had mistaken his remarks as to the manner of promotion. He did not say, that, if an officer was killed, the next in command succeeded to his rank. He had intended to say that he did succeed to his command as completely as if he had his commission in his pocket. He could not suppose that a good reason could be adduced against referring the resolution to the Military Committee. They would report the facts, and give a statement of the probable effect of the resolution. He had no other anxiety on the subject, but as far as its decision would operate upon the discipline of the Army and the expectations of the People. There could be no objection to the reference; because any gentleman could have an opportunity of expressing himself when the report of the Committee came up. He would assure the Senate that there was enough to be said, and to be developed on this subject, which could not be done in a casual debate, to render it a fit subject for a reference. He, therefore, hoped the gentleman from Maine would accede to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that there appeared to the gentlemen of the Senate a great difficulty in deciding whether the office of Major General was necessary or not. For his own part he did not think an investigation by a Committee necessary; and was opposed to it, not only because the question could be as well settled in the Senate, but for the reason that the session had far advanced, and many other important subjects were yet to be acted upon, which might interfere with this resolution, if it should be referred.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. hoped the amendment would not prevail, because the discussion of the question could as well take place now as hereafter. The subject had, in former times, been thoroughly debated. After the war, the subject of a peace establishment engaged the attention of Congress. The number of men to be retained was fixed by different persons variously, from 10 to 20,000; the former number was fixed upon. Afterwards, in 1821, the matter was again discussed, a further reduction proposed, and the Army was brought down to 6,000, and certain officers were to go off the list. It was then argued that the officers could not be dispensed with; that their numbers could not be reduced without destroying the Army, by lessening the discipline which they assisted to keep up. Next year, however, Mr. Monroe, in his message, stated that the affairs of the Army went on well, and that its present organization was as it should be. It was well known that the office of Major General would not have been retained but for the merit of the incumbent. He had fought several battles; displayed great skill and courage; and was unwilling to leave the service. To retain him, therefore, and as a reward for his services, he was made Major General. General Jackson, who was willing to retire, was appointed Governor of Florida. That the office was useless, he never had a doubt. In the days of Jefferson there was but one Brigadier General retained upon the peace establishment. Nor was there any greater necessity for a Major General now than then. The Army was at present billeted about in parties of twenty men in a place—the whole consisting of but 6,000—yet, with all the discipline, and out of this small number, by the documents, it appeared that from 1,500 to 2,000 deserted every year. He recollected that, at the time of the appointment of General Brown as Major General, it was argued that it was necessary to have the commanding officers at the Seat of Government, that they might despatch the orders from the Department, and be directly in contact with the Goverment. But he knew not one advantage that had arisen out of it. Your Army, said Mr. S., is overstocked, and there are now, in this mere shadow of an Army, officers enough for one of 50,000 men. All the facts were now before the Senate. Every member was more or less acquainted with them. He, therefore, thought it better to let the gentlemen of the Committee express their views here. Or, if they are taken off their guard by any sudden argument, let them ask for delay. He would favor such a request. He wished to hear the views of gentlemen conversant with the subject, and hoped they would express them before the Senate.

Mr. BENTON was of opinion that the decision of the Senate, on this resolution, would not be assisted by the investigation of a committee. He believed its discussion in the Senate would be equally productive of a satisfactory result. Not thinking, however, that the subject could be decided in a moment, he thought the resolution of the gentleman from Maine had better be laid over until another day. With this view, he moved to lay it on the table until Monday; but observed that he would withdraw the motion, if any gentleman desired to express himself.

Mr. HARRISON said he hoped that a decision might first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. If that failed, he would accede to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri with pleasure.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that, in making his motion, he had been actuated by a wish to obtain information on a subject with which he was not familiar. He had heard nothing in this debate to alter the opinion he had previously entertained, or to enlighten him on the subject. If the resolution was referred to the Military Committee, gentlemen conversant with the matter would be able, at a future day, to give information upon which it would be safe to decide. With a desire to confine the Military Establishment within the narrowest limits, he wished to avoid any measure which should operate injuriously upon the usefulness or efficiency of the Army. He would submit to the gentleman from Maine, whether it would not be better to allow the resolution to go to the committee, to afford that light upon the subject, to enable the Senate to come to a deliberate decision, and enable the Senators to examine their votes on the subject, with satisfaction, at an after day. He should suppose that these considerations would operate to demonstrate the propriety of a reference. He was not a military man, but was called upon to perform his duty, which he wished to do understandingly.

Mr. HAYNE expressed a hope that the gentleman from Missouri would not press his motion. Should the amendment fail, he would then be disposed to lay the resolution on the table. If the Senate was favorable to an inquiry by the Committee on Military Affairs, it ought to be made immediately: and, if not, a delay ought to be had, and the subject acted on liberally. Some discussion has arisen on the effect of the measure. But, if the office should be abolished, would that settle the difference between the two gentlemen of the Committee, whose opinions are at utter variance? One says that it will remove the expense of the pay of the Major General, and the other says that it will not save a dollar; but that a motion will take place through all the grades of the Army. Let us have these questions examined, and let us have some ground to act upon. If it can be demonstrated that the army may be reduced from a division to a brigade, I am willing to do it. But I want, in the first place, to have light upon the subject, and know how and why to act. As to the remark of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Macon] that principles were first settled in the Senate, and the details afterwards in the Committees, there is a wide difference between cases, where the principle is to be settled before the details, and those in which facts are, to be explained, to enable members to form a decision upon the subject. This matter peculiarly required to be investigated by a Committee, and he hoped it would be referred.

Mr. NOBLE said, that we had had two peace establishments, and in each there had been a Major General. How the Senate were, by the gift of prophecy, going to suppose the effect of abolishing the office, he did not know. It would be the duty of the committee to go back and make inquiry into the causes for the creation of that office, and report the result of their inquiries. He was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. He wished to have the facts. It could not be that the gentleman from Maine was afraid to trust to a committee of the Senate; and if not, his object would be more easily obtained by the reference. He did not wish to vote in the dark. It was a very important subject, and ought to be acted upon with caution. He had formerly been opposed to a standing army; but it was difficult to say whether, at this time, it could be safely increased or diminished. The subject ought, therefore, to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TAZEWELL remarked, that he did not understand the reason for wishing for a precipitate decision. The gentleman from Maine did not oppose the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to lay the resolution on the table until all the members should have become informed upon the subject. But it is said that it is proper to refer the subject to a committee. This is a statement to which a doubt may be started. In different bodies the modes of proceeding are different. Had this resolution been introduced in such a body as the House of Representatives, it would have been committed—to what?—To the Committee of the Whole, because, as it affects the whole country, every member ought to have an opportunity to hear the arguments pro and con, and to offer his opinion upon it. But in this body, said Mr. T., it is, the same thing to submit a subject to the whole Senate as in the House to refer to the Committee of the Whole. This was the reason why he thought the resolution should be laid on the table until every member was satisfied with the opinion he should have formed upon it. There were subjects of great importance, which ought not to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, because they depend upon facts not accessible to all the members, and which could be more easily obtained by a standing committee, or of which the members might be in possession. But was this such a subject? The questions he would ask were: Does this subject interest the whole country?—and is it necessary that it should go to a committee to obtain the facts? Now, Sir, said Mr. T., I think we can get as much information in the Senate as from the Committee on Military Affairs. Besides, the opinion you get from the committee is but the opinion of a majority of its members. You do not hear the opinions of the minority, while, if it was discussed in the Senate, you get the opinions of all. Therefore, this being a subject which interests the whole Union, and which, in the other House, would be referred to a Committee of the Whole, and as the subject under consideration can as well be understood without a reference to a select committee as with, he was in favor of laying it on the table.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that, when the report should be brought up, there would be ample opportunity for discussion, so that the minority of the committee would have an opportunity of opposing the report. Those who were unacquainted with the subject, would be better able to understand it by the assistance of the report. He was not disposed now to discuss the matter. But, in asking for information from the Committee on Military Affairs, he simply desired to avoid any error which he might fall into, if, uninformed, he should be called upon to give his vote. If the Senate should be averse to the reference, he wished to record his vote in favor of obtaining that information, without which, he must feel doubtful what course to take. He, therefore, asked the yeas and nays on the motion to amend.

The call being sustained, the question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BERRIEN, and decided in the affirmative.

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1828.

ON THE PUBLIC DEBT.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by him on the 26th ult.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether any error has occurred in the construction of the fourth section of the act, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the public debt," passed the third day of March, 1817, in reference to the amount of surplus revenue to be retained in the Treasury; and, if so, to report an amendment for restoring the section to its true intent and meaning.

"Also, That the same Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering and amending the same section (if no error be found in the construction thereof) as to reduce the amount of surplus revenue required by that section to remain in the Treasury, from two millions of dollars, to one million or less.

"Also, That the same Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering and amending the fifth section of the same act, as to invest the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund with a discretionary, instead of a limited authority, in making purchases of the public debt, at its market price, whenever, in their judgment, such purchases can be made beneficially for the interests of the United States, and when the state of the Sinking Fund and existing engagements will permit them to do so.

"Also, That the same Committee be instructed to make a report to the Senate, showing within what time the present debt of the United States may probably be paid off; and upon what articles, and to what amount, the present duties may then be reduced or abolished, consistently with the general interests of the whole Union."

The resolution being read, Mr. BENTON rose, and addressed the Senate. He said that the first branch of the resolution went upon the supposition that there was an error in the construction of the Sinking Fund Act of 1817 and that he might avoid all occasion for misapprehension, here or elsewhere, he would say at once, that this error, if it existed at all, was of older date than the existence of the present Administration; and, of course, that the inquiry that he proposed to institute, whatever might be its result, was not intended to have any bearing on the conduct of gentlemen now at the head of affairs. He believed, himself, that the error existed, that it was injurious to the public service, and that it was the duty of the legislative department of the Government to correct it. The fourth section of that act directed, that, whenever, "in any year," there should be, "at the rise of Congress," a surplus in the Treasury of more than two millions of dollars above the appropriation for the service of "such year," that all the excess above that sum should be forthwith paid to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be by them immediately applied to the purchase or redemption of the public debt. The words of this section, said Mr. B. are as clear and positive as words can be, in limiting the amount to be left in the Treasury, to two millions of dollars, over and above the appropriations for the year; but the construction which has been put upon them, as we see from the annual Treasury Reports, makes these two millions to be exclusive of the unapplied balance of the previous year's appropriations. These unapplied balances usually amount, at the end of each year, upwards of three millions of dollars, and are usually reduced, in the course of the first quarter of the ensuing year, to less than two millions; so that a reservation of two millions, at the rise of Congress, is amply sufficient to meet them. The difference of the two constructions is, that, by my construction, there must be a surplus of two millions in the Treasury before any thing can go to the Sinking Fund; by the Treasury construction, there must be a surplus of about four millions first. This construction is clearly at war with the words of the statute, and still more with its plain intent and obvious meaning. Its intent was to hasten the extinction of the public debt, and for that purpose to prevent a single idle dollar from lying in the Treasury; but this construction leaves two millions idle in the Treasury, or rather in the Bank of the United States, idle to us, though it may be productive to that institution, while the People of the United States are paying its interest, equal to $120,000 per annum, to the public creditors.

Mr. B. entered considerably into detail, for the purpose of showing the nature and amount of these unexpended balances. He said they existed in all Governments, and must necessarily exist to a greater or less amount, according to the magnitude of their receipts and expenditures. To illustrate this, he would suppose that the present year was the first of the existence of this Government, and that the appropriation for its service was ten millions of dollars. Now, it would follow, of necessity, that the whole amount of this ten millions could not be paid out in the course of the year. Distance alone would prevent some demands from getting in; casualties and accidents would prevent the regular arrival of others; defective vouchers, or press of business in the offices, would prevent some from being adjusted, for weeks, or months, after they came in; in some instances the service could not be rendered, the work could not be done, the contract could not be performed, for which the money was to be paid, until after the lapse of the year; and in many cases, the amount appropriated, would be more than enough, and would leave a balance that would not be called for at all. From all these causes, it would certainly happen, that a considerable portion of the ten millions voted for the service of the year, would remain unexpended at its end; and so on, year after year, as long as the Government existed. The history of our own Government shows that these balances amount to upwards of three millions of dollars; and they are always considerably reduced in the first quarter of the ensuing year, so that two millions at the rise of any session of Congress, is an ample allowance to meet them. It was upon the knowledge of these facts, that Mr. Lowndes, the able and accomplished author of the Sinking Fund act of 1817, fixed upon two millions for that purpose; but even this I hold to be an unnecessary provision; for the annual appropriation of another ten millions before the rise of Congress, for the new year's service, would leave another unexpended balance of three millions to meet that of the preceding year; and so on, as long as the Government lasted; at the end of which, and not before, would the two millions be wanted to pay off the outstanding claims.

Mr. B. said, that the manner of stating the public accounts at the British Treasury, shewed the nature and amount of these balances more plainly than they are seen in our annual Treasury Reports. The English used three columns, we but two. In the British account, the first column shewed the object of the appropriation; the second shewed the amount appropriated; the third, the amount paid out. In ours, we only see the object of the appropriation, and the amount paid out. The difference is, that in the British account, you see the balances in detail, upon each separate item; in ours, you only see it in gross, and that some where else, in the body of the report.

With respect to these balances, Mr. B. said they amounted to a large sum, constituting a standing deposit

Bank which had the keeping of the public money, and certainly yielded a handsome profit to that institution. In England, while the principal disbursing officers were their own Treasurers, the profit on the keeping of these balances, was a perquisite of the office, and quickly made the fortune of the incumbent. The elder Mr. Pitt, when he was Paymaster of the forces, about the year 1740, was the first who refused to appropriate the profits of these balances to his own emolument, and accounted for them to the Government. The average balance in the Paymaster's hands, was then about 100,000 pounds sterling, and interest about four per cent.; so that Mr. Pitt gave up about 4,000 pounds per annum, which any banker would have given him for the deposit and use of his balances. In later times, when the financial concerns of the Government were so much increased as to swell this balance to a million sterling, Mr. Burke, being Paymaster of the forces, followed the example of Mr. Pitt, and accounted to the Government for the thirty thousand pounds per annum, which it commanded from the bankers. At present, the Bank of England keeps the Government money, and the aggregate balances amounted some years, to eleven millions, equal to double the amount of our whole revenue. Whether the bank paid interest on so large an amount, he knew not, but he did know that the Bank of the United States paid nothing for the use of the public money in its hands; he believed there was often five or six millions on hand, from the collection of the public revenue; and he submitted it to the Senate to say, whether it was right or excusable, to augment that great and gratuitous deposit, to the amount of two millions more, by acquiescing in an erroneous construction of one of our own statutes?

Mr. B. proceeded to the second branch of the resolution, which proposed to reduce, or to repeal entirely, the reservation of two millions of dollars, if the construction he contended for was not adopted. If his construction was adopted, and the act of 1817 amended accordingly, then the reservation might remain to pay so much of the outstanding claims of the previous year, as remained unpaid at the end of each session of Congress. But, if that construction should not be adopted, and the Treasury practice should continue, of reserving this two millions, in addition to the unexpended balance on hand, then the question would present itself, how far it was proper or justifiable to leave this two millions as a permanent and gratuitous deposit in the Federal Bank? He conceived it would be neither proper nor justifiable to make such an unprofitable disposition of so large a sum of the public money. There was no necessity for it, nor any possible way of using it for the public good. The common notion, that this reservation was a contingent provision for unforeseen demands, was unfounded and fallacious. No such demand had ever occurred since the foundation of our Government, and none such could be paid, if they did occur: for, not a cent of this money could be used, until Congress should meet, and pass an appropriation law to draw it from the Treasury. No such reservation existed before 1817, and no part of it had been used since; and these facts should be sufficient to shew the correctness of the construction for which I contend. But, if that construction is not adopted, the same facts will shew the propriety of repealing the reservation in toto. The repeal would let two millions more go annually to the Sinking Fund than would otherwise go to it, and would save $120,000 of annual interest, a sum of sufficient magnitude to claim the attention of all the friends of economy.

The third branch of the resolution proposes to enlarge the authority given to the Commissioners by the 5th section of the Sinking Fund act, so as to vest them with a discretionary, instead of a limited authority, in making purchases of the public debt at its market price. As the section now stands, the authority given by it is nugatory.

The limitations defeat its intention. The Commissioners are restricted from purchasing the three per cent. stocks until they fall to sixty five dollars for a hundred, and the six per cents until they are at par; and the four and a half and five per cents they cannot purchase at all, because they have been created since the passage of the act, and are not included in it. The three per cents are now at 95, and will not fall lower except upon the prospect of being paid, (for the value of stocks is now in proportion to their duration;) the six per cents will never be at par; and the four and a half and five per cents are, some of them, irredeemable for seven or eight years to come. In the mean time, it is certain that the means of the Treasury will be competent to the extinction of several millions of debt more than is redeemable, and, unless the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have authority to purchase at the market price, this large accumulation of money must either lie in the federal Bank, as a gratuitous deposit, or be lavished upon objects which might not be thought of except for this tempting pile of money. The question, then, for Congress now to decide, is, whether this accumulation of money shall go to the bank for nothing, or be lavished upon unknown and unknowable objects, or be applied to the reduction of the public debt in the only practicable mode, that of purchasing it up before it is redeemable, at the market price. My own opinion is decidedly in favor of this last alternative. I believe that our Commissioners may be safely trusted with this authority. The British Commissioners have exercised the same authority since the first establishment of their Sinking Fund in 1816: they have purchased twenty times the amount of our present debt, and have never been accused of abusing their trust. Our Commissioners must be equally worthy of public confidence. They consist, and must consist, of men who cannot be presumed to lack discernment to see, or integrity to prefer the best bargain for their country. They are gentlemen who fill, and must fill, the highest offices of the country—the Vice President, the Chief Justice, the Secretaries of State and Treasury, and the Attorney General. An objection to conferring this authority on such a body of men, cannot be an objection to them, but an objection to the object of the authority; that is to say, to the payment of the debt itself. That there are persons who will make that objection, is beyond question. I speak, not of Senators nor of individuals, in or out of this Chamber, but of numerous and powerful classes of the community, whose sentiments are known to me. There are such classes, and I will specify them. 1. The holders of the debt are against its payment, because they wish to live at their ease upon the interest, and have the whole country bound and mortgaged to them for the ultimate payment of the principal. 2. The inhabitants of the places in which the debt is owned are against it, because it has drawn an hundred and fifty millions of dollars into their neighbourhoods, and is still drawing on at the rate of three millions per annum. 3. Some disinterested people are against it, because they are afraid that foreigners will carry off the twenty millions owned by them, and make a dearth of money at home; as if the place of this twenty would not be supplied by the forty millions paid to domestic creditors, and which would then come into circulation; and as if the foreigners had not already three times carried away the amount of their capital in interest, and would again carry off its amount, in the same way, in every successive period of sixteen years, until the capital was paid! 4. Another class is opposed to it, because they look upon a public debt as auxiliary to the strength and duration of the Government, by interesting the moneyed interest, and binding them to its support. This, Mr. President, is a very ancient doctrine, but not without its advocates in modern times. It is the invention of a crafty Greek, who had to make up in fraud what he lacked in force; I speak of Eumenes, who was Secretary to Alexander the Great. This man of the pen, upon the death of his master, put in, among the Generals, for a kingdom out of the wrecks of his empire; and having no army to sustain his pretensions, he had recourse to fraud to raise one and bind it to him. For this purpose he borrowed all the money he could from officers and soldiers, and then told them that their chance for payment depended upon their supporting him in possession of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, provinces which he had marked out for his future kingdom. Of course these officers and soldiers did not want to lose their money; and, like provident men, fell in with the only course which could save it. They fought for Eumenes; they made him king, they made his children kings after him; and, in return, the king and his children made the People of the kingdom perpetual tributaries to these money-lenders, in the payment of interest on the sum borrowed. And this, Mr. President, is the origin of the notion which has been so compendiously expressed in our own country, in that famous declaration, that a public debt was a public blessing. In later times, and in our parent country, we have seen the policy of the crafty Greek revived and acted upon by a crafty Dutchman, William, Prince of Orange, who had need of both fraud and force to maintain himself on the throne, from which he had chased his father-in-law. He also bound the moneyed interest to his support by borrowing their cash, and thus laid the foundation for that frightful national debt, which now overhangs and overwhelms the British empire. Such an example as this should explode the notion that a public debt was a public blessing. The doctrine, at best, is only applicable to monarchies, founded in force or fraud, and where one part of the subjects have to be bribed to keep the rest in subjection; and even then the debt must be large, diffused over the country, and held in many hands; while our Government is Republican, founded on the affections of the People, and our debt is small; one third of it owned by foreigners, the rest centered in a corner of the Union, and held by a few. 5. The last class of objectors which I shall mention, consists of those who think our debt a trifle, which can be paid at any time, and who are for letting it alone at present, and applying our money to other objects. This, Mr. President, is the most dangerous class of objectors; for they are numerous, honest, perfectly well intentioned, and mean no harm themselves, but do the greatest possible mischief, by becoming the allies of the money-lenders, and of the sticklers for the blessedness of a public debt. It is to this class of politicians that Great Britain is indebted for her present tremendous debt. That debt is the growth of a single century—a short period in the life of a nation—and took its gigantic start, in the very doctrine which I am now combating. At the commencement of the last century, this debt was but sixteen millions and a half sterling (about seventy millions of dollars)—very nearly the amount of our debt at present, and as little prospect of its growing to what it now is. One class of politicians were then anxious to pay it off; another considered it as a trifle, which could be paid at any time, and insisted upon applying the public money to other objects. This class prevailed; and what was the consequence? Why, sir, the season of peace, in which alone a public debt can be paid, passed away; wars came on; and one year of war creates more debt than many years of peace can discharge. The war for the security of the Protestant succession came on, and raised the sixteen millions to fifty-four millions; that for the Dutch barrier followed, and raised it to seventy-eight millions; then the seventy years' war, which carried it to one hundred and forty millions; then the war with us, which put it up to two hundred and thirty millions; and, finally, the wars of the French Revolution, which advanced it to nine hundred millions, equal to four thousand millions of dollars, at which it now stands, mocking all idea of payment, and crushing the People under a frightful load of taxes, to meet the annual interest. Such a result should be a warning to us. It should admonish us to eschew the policy which has proved so fatal in our parent country. It should caution us to pay our debt while we can, and not to run the risk of meriting from our posterity of an hundred years hence, the bitter reproaches which the English are the present day lavishing upon their ancestors of the reigns of Queen Anne and George the First.

The fourth and last branch of the resolution requires the Finance Committee to report on the probable time within which the present debt of the United States may be paid; and upon what articles, and to what amount, the duties now payable, may then be reduced or abolished. This is an inquiry, Mr. President, of the deepest concern to the People; and the report of the Committee, if ordered to make one, will be looked for with the greatest impatience and solicitude. In my own opinion, our debt may be paid off in five years, and duties abolished to the amount of eleven or twelve millions. The debt is now, nominally, sixty-seven millions—in reality, about fifty-eight; for seven millions is in the United States' Bank Stock which is worth more than par, and brings a dividend equal to its interest; and thirteen millions is in three per cent. stock, which is fifteen per cent below par, and may be bought for about eleven millions. A Sinking Fund of thirteen or fourteen millions would extinguish the actual debt, in five years, (letting all the public works go on as usual) and it would require but little aid from our legislation to make that fund amount to thirteen or fourteen millions. It is ten millions now, and is increasing from the improving state of the commerce. The restoration of the 4th section of the act of 1817 to its true and obvious meaning, would increase it two millions more; and a more rapid sale of the public lands, according to the plan which I have had the honor to propose, would further increase it, to the amount of another million or upwards. Thus, in five years, the debt may be extinguished, and the great questions placed before Congress, whether the present revenue shall be kept up? And if so, for what objects? Or reduced? And if so, upon what articles the reduction shall fall, and to what amount? These will be great questions, worthy to engage the deliberations of the whole Union, and the discussion of them may develop a new line in the division of political parties. Some may be for keeping up the whole revenue, and making the Federal Government strong and splendid; others may be for a reduction of the taxes, and for limiting the revenue to the just and necessary support of a plain Republican Government. I shall myself be found in the ranks of this latter party; and to enable it to act best for the public good it is necessary that the public mind be consulted before it acts. The abolition of duties will be a delicate and responsible task—it will be the counterpart of an imposition of duties—and should be executed in strict subordination to the will of the People. For one, I should wish my constituents to know my sentiments, and, in return, I should like to know theirs. If we disagree, I promise them one of two things—either to execute their will, or to retire from my station. Here, then, is my creed: I am for abolishing duties in toto, as soon as the public debt is paid off, upon all articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, which are not made at home at all, or not made in sufficient quantity to merit national protection; and I am for continuing them on articles of taste and luxury, and upon such rival productions of foreign countries, as our security in time of war, and our general independence as a nation, requires to be made at home. This is what I have said on a former occasion, and now repeat, because I have been misrepresented, and my words mutilated and garbled for party purposes. I will be more explicit, and specify some of the articles which I would select for exemption from duty. I will name coffee, of which we have imported forty millions of pounds weight in the year; teas, of which the imports have been ten millions of pounds; spices, imported to the amount of six million of pounds; cocoa and chocolate, four millions; linens to the value of three millions of dollars. Upon these articles, and others of the same class, which might be named, the duties might be abolished, I apprehend, with advantage to manufactures, as well as farmers and merchants: for they are necessities of life which enter into use in the living of every family, and lowering their price, would be lowering the price of labor, which the manufactory demands. Salt, sugar, blankets, and flannel, present another class of necessaries and comforts, upon which some diversity of opinion might arise. They are necessities of life, and partially made at home, but not in sufficient quantity to answer the public demand. Large importations of them are made from abroad, and heavy duties are paid upon them. Of salt, we import four millions of bushels, the duty twenty cents to the Government, and ten cents profit on it to the merchant; of sugar, eighty millions of pounds, the duty three and four cents to the Government, and one more to the merchant; of blankets and flannels, we import to the value of a million and a half of dollars, paying above four hundred thousand dollars to the Government, and near two hundred thousand more to the merchant. Upon these items there may be diversity of opinion, and the will of the People should be known. Let no one say it is too soon for the People to begin to think upon this subject. I detest that saying, in all its bearings and applications. It is never too soon for the People to think, but often too late! It is not too soon for them to begin to think now about the abolition of duties. Their Representatives will have to act one way or the other, in four or five years; and would, doubtless, wish to be informed of the sentiments of their constituents. The report of the Committee, which I propose to obtain, will give them that advantage. It will set the public mind to work, and will enable the People to manifest their wishes in time to guide and enlighten the decision of their Representatives.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the Committee on Finance did not, on any occasion, shrink from its duty, and they would take up the subject as speedily as possible. He would make but one remark upon the statements of the gentleman from Missouri, in relation to the two millions of dollars reserved in the Treasury. There were several contingencies to which this sum was liable. One was the practice of Congress frequently to make appropriations of large sums of money, not calculated on by the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimates; and then this sum came in and fulfilled the designs of Congress. Last year, this application of the two millions was made to a large amount. Congress made such liberal demands upon it, that but four hundred thousand dollars remained in the Treasury at the commencement of this year.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, rose in reply to Mr. BISTON. He said he should not oppose the reference of the resolutions, which was the usual course; but he could not permit them to pass to the Committee, after the elaborate argument by which they had been recommended, without expressing his entire dissent to the opinions and views of the gentleman from Missouri.

I do not believe there is any error in the act of the 3d of March, 1817, either in principle, or in the construction of it. I think the act plain, that there is no misconception of its meaning, and that it is founded in just views of our financial affairs. This act was intended to appropriate ten millions of dollars annually to the redemption of the public debt, after the year 1817, and was, consequently, a standing appropriation after the current expenses of the year, if the Treasury was adequate to pay it. This part of the law gives rise to no difficulty, as the reservation does not apply to this section. But an additional section of the act is in these words: "That, after the year 1817, whenever there shall be, at any time after an adjournment of Congress in any year, a surplus of money in the Treasury, above the sums appropriated for the service of such year, the payment of which to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund will yet leave in the Treasury, at the end of the year, a balance equal to two millions of dollars, then such surplus shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the Sinking Fund, to be paid at such times as the situation of the Treasury will best permit, and shall be applied by the Commissioners thereof to the purchase or redemption of the public debt."

By this section, two millions are directed to be left untouched in the Treasury, and all the surplus, after such reservation, is to be applied to the public debt. The gentleman from Missouri supposes that this reservation is either a misconception of the act, or is founded in erroneous principles, it being, as he supposes, unnecessary to reserve, even by estimation, any money in the Treasury, and, consequently, that all the estimated resources for the year may be safely appropriated by anticipation. The act seems too plain to be misconceived, and has received a uniform construction by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. It must be a surplus of money in the Treasury, over and above the appropriation for the service of the year, and the ten millions, and the two reserved millions. The balance is surplus, and is, by the act, appropriated to the public debt.

"After the adjournment of Congress," the estimate is made for the year. The nett balance of the Treasury, at the close of the year, (excluding what was appropriated for the service of the last year, and all funds not available) is added to the estimated revenue of the year. A sum equal to the appropriations made by Congress for the service of the year is set apart—ten millions are directed to be applied during the year to the principal and interest of the public debt. If any balance remains in the Treasury, according to the estimate of the revenue, two millions is allowed to cover all deficiencies and variations of the revenue, and the surplus is applied to the public debt.

The reason why two millions was directed by the act to be reserved, was, that the calculation of the amount on which they are to operate, is founded on an estimate of what may be in the Treasury during the year, not what is actually there. It was known that our revenue was liable to fluctuations of two or three millions a year, from causes that could not be anticipated even one year in advance. Our importations are subject to variations, and the revenue arising therefrom to corresponding irregularities. There are, besides, inequalities in the different quarters of the year, that materially affect the receipts of the year; and we have experienced the same thing from the sales of the public lands, so as to baffle all calculation of the actual result of the revenue for the year. It was a knowledge of this uncertainty, in all financial estimates, that induced the reservation of the two millions, to guard against a probable contingency of applying more to the public debt than might be found in the Treasury. The wisdom and the foresight of this provision has been exemplified by the experience of the last ten years. In 1817, the estimated receipts from customs were twenty-four millions; the actual receipts exceeded that sum by two millions, and this is probably a solitary instance. In 1818, the estimated receipts were twenty millions; the actual were three millions less. In 1819, estimated twenty-one millions; and the revenue fell short near a million. In 1820, the estimate of nineteen millions was found by the result to be four millions too much. In 1821, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated fourteen millions; but the Committee of Ways and Means, with the same data, estimated 15 millions. It produced but 13 millions. These differences arise with the ablest men, with all the information necessary to a correct judgment. They can but approximate the true result. There are some facts and some principles which are useful in forming these estimates; but, with all their aid, it is but conjectural. There are no known laws that govern them. Experience has shewn, perhaps, that two millions is a safe allowance for the fluctuations of commerce, and the various exigencies that may arise during the year. In the last twelve years, the receipts have varied from near thirty-four to thirteen millions. But from this series we are able to form a more accurate estimate of the general average of the revenue. The receipts for twelve years may be said to average twenty-one millions—for the last five years twenty-two millions; and this is a sufficient basis for all financial calculation. It will probably vary from twenty to twenty-four millions. We may allow, in round numbers, ten millions for the ordinary expenses of Government, established by law; ten millions for the public debt; and the extraordinary appropriations average from one to three millions. So that, upon no ordinary calculation, can more than ten millions be applied, nor can we anticipate there will be a surplus.

Again: We know that, during that period, the receipts of the Government have not allowed the regular application of the ten millions, and have not been found equal to this standing demand on the Treasury. We have paid, during that period, $134,506,206, of which $18,786,748 was provided for by loans; leaving the amount actually paid $115,719,453; whereas, the application of ten millions for twelve years would have extinguished one hundred and twenty millions. There is, therefore, due to the sinking fund, more than four millions. This shews, however, how nearly it has met the expectations of the country, and is an evidence of the ability of the distinguished man who framed the bill. But it shews, at the same time, that there has been no surplus.

It seems to my mind the gentleman labors under some erroneous impression on this subject. He seems to think that something has been lost, by mismanagement of the funds, either by the operation of this act, or the misconstruction of it, and supposes, by changing the act, he will save the interest of two millions a year. Sir, since the operation of the act, there has never been a surplus of two millions, which could have been applied to the debt. On the contrary, on the 1st of January, 1818, '19, '20, '21, the four first years after the act creating the Sinking Fund, and also in 1824 and 1825, there was no balance in the Treasury, but a great deficiency, to wit:

1820, 5,201,157	1825, 151,259

On the 1st January, 1822, there was in the Treasury only $491,166; on the 1st of January, 1823, there was in the Treasury $5,462,412 not applied, because there was no redeemable debt to which it could be applied. On the 1st January, 1826, there was a sum equal to a million in the Treasury, and that balance still remains, and will be carried to the estimated receipts of the year, to compose the fund of the Treasury, for the year, out of which the appropriations for the year will be taken, including the ten millions; and if there is any surplus, after allowing two millions for variations of revenue, it will be also applied to the public debt. If the gentleman could find the two millions which could have been, but which have not been applied, in consequence of this act, I would consent to apply it; but if, at any period, that sum had been applied, the Treasury would be now minus a million. The error consists in the idea that such sum has laid idle in the Treasury. It was never there. A view of the whole subject will show the sound discretion which has been exercised over the application of the funds, since the peace, with the exception of the sum that remained, in 1823, unemployed; but that was the business of Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury could not purchase stock; and there was none at that time redeemable.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended, in his report, in December, 1826, a loan of sixteen millions, at 5 per cent., to pay off a debt of 6 per cent., and which, if carried into effect, would have produced, at once, a large saving to the Government, but this proposition was rejected by Congress at the last session. That, to my mind, was the time and place for economy. That would have realized more than could result from the interest of the imaginary two millions, if they had actually existed in the Treasury.

Sir, the payment of the current expenses of the Government, and the ten millions, will leave us from two to three millions a year, for all objects of a miscellaneous character, including internal improvements, roads, canals, breakwaters, piers, deepening channels, removing obstructions in rivers, purchases of land from Indians, and various other claims upon the country. During the last three years, a large sum has been applied by Congress to these objects of great utility, and of indispensable necessity. These appropriations will, doubtless, be continued by Congress. What future expectation can there be, that there will ever be a surplus of two millions? We have an actual surplus, now ascertained, of a million, but we have a bill appropriating a million to the surviving officers of the Revolution; and, while it is proposed to apply the million to the public debt, it is, at the same moment, proposed to raise the million for the officers by a new loan; and where is the economy of that?

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates an excess of receipts, for the present year, of $2,352,874, and this sum is liable to the usual variations. But what are the demands upon it? There is a bill before us, which contemplates the commencement of a breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware, which will cost more than two millions, and which proposes $250,000 a year. There is another anticipated at Nantucket, of about half that cost, which will also require $200,000 a year. There are applications for opening a communication from Albemarle Sound to the Atlantic; deepening the channel at the mouth of Cape Fear river; opening the falls on the Wabash; removing the rafts in Red river, and obstructions from the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and many others of less importance. This is besides the removal of Indians and purchases of land, the claims of States for advances during the war, and the private claims now pending, amounting to more than half a million.

Now, the simple question is, whether these objects are of more pressing importance than the payment of this additional two millions to the public debt, which would hasten its extinguishment little more than one year, while these great objects must be neglected. Upon this point my mind is made up.

The regular application of ten millions will extinguish the public debt early in 1836, and, in the mean time, from two to three millions a year may be distributed over the country, to improve the navigation, by artificial harbors, deepening channels, erecting piers, and other useful works upon the coast; to improve the communications between the States, by the internal commerce of the country, now vastly greater than the foreign. The public debt is in a progress of rapid extinguishment, and quite as rapid as it ought to be, not to disturb the commerce, or the capital, or the circulation of the metallic medium of the country. The stock of the United States, to a certain extent, forms a part of its capital. By paying it off, you do not increase the circulating medium, but you destroy that part which is a substitute for capital. How far this stock enters into the capital upon which trade and commerce is carried on, I do not know, nor can I anticipate the effect upon them, of withdrawing, in a short period, seventy or eighty millions of stock. It is probable that, by a gradual operation of ten millions a year, no dangerous effect will result. Every thing will gradually accommodate itself to the changes going on. But nothing is more to be dreaded than causes which suddenly derange the money market; a panic, then, deranges every thing else. The moment the drain is felt, the Banks curtail, money appreciates, property sinks in value; pecuniary embarrassment, sacrifice, distress, and bankruptcy, follow. It is the business of statesmen to look to this, and to guard against it. If a drain of specie in the Western country has produced great sacrifice and ruin, what would be its effects upon the Atlantic States, and in our large cities? Twenty millions of this stock is held by foreigners, and the gentleman says that we are tributary to them, to the annual amount of the interest. When this debt is paid off, if this sum is reinvested in the country, we shall still contribute to them the amount of this interest; but there is reason to expect that foreigners will not invest in any institutions of the States. The capital is attracted here by a profitable investment in public stocks of the Government, on the faith of which they rely. They have no confidence in local institutions. If twenty millions were withdrawn too suddenly, it might disturb the circulating medium, and, thereby, the trade and commerce, as well as the value of property. I wish the public debt paid off, as fast as it is safe to do so. I think the rate of ten millions a year is rapid enough, and ought not to be accelerated.

The gentleman says there is a balance of four millions, at all times, in the Bank of the United States, the use of which that institution enjoys gratuitously. It is true, the Bank receives, in deposit, at different places, the whole revenue of the Government, which they pay out to the order of the Treasury, as it is called for, to meet the appropriations; that about a quarter of the amount, varying from three to five millions, is always in the vaults in advance; the use of which, he supposes, is a boon to the Bank, and without equivalent. If we had a treasury of our own, we must always have a quarter year's revenue in advance. That must lie idle and unemployed in our coffers. That immense sum must be trusted to the integrity of a single individual, and must pass through the hands of twenty irresponsible agents. Disbursements must be made, loans discharged, and pensions paid, at various points. It would require a complicated machinery; and, even then, expenses and losses would be incurred, and inconveniences experienced. I believe the Bank a necessary appendage of the Treasury, which, besides affording a sound currency for the payment of duties, facility of exchange, and transmission by checks, performs, without compensation, and without loss, all the moneyed operations of the Government. Is it nothing that we have a safe depository, and a responsible agent? Is security and accommodation nothing? We are large stockholders ourselves, and partake, to that extent, in any profit it may give. But, sir, how infinitely more important must this institution become in time of war. Besides, this balance is always appropriated, and no longer the fund of the nation. It is deposited for those who have a right to receive it, and that right is perfect at the end of the year, and liable to be drawn at any time.

I concur with the views of the gentleman, for political reasons, in the propriety of graduating the price of public land to the quality—this is but justice to all classes, and it is due to those States whose lands are of inferior rate. I concur, also, in the expediency of reducing the price of the lands, because I believe a man is a better citizen, and has a better provision for his family, who is the proprietor of a section of land, than the owner of half a section—as the owner of a half is superior to the owner of a quarter section. By making him a proprietor, you render him independent; you elevate him in the scale of society; you give him a stake in the common stock of the community; you make him a citizen, instead of a dependent. I would go farther: I would give to every head of a family half a section of land, who should actually inhabit and cultivate it for five or ten years. The country, besides making him a freeholder, and stimulating his industry, and providing for his family, will be greatly compensated by the general improvement of the State, by the increase of population and production, and by contributions to the revenue. These lands are a vast resource to the People, but very inconsiderable to the Government. They will not yield more than a million a year, while you are exhausting the capital; but, if they were cultivated, they would add, by increased production, five or ten times that sum, in duties on consumption.

I differ, however, entirely, with him, as to the effect of a reduction of the price of the lands upon the revenue. He supposes the effect would be to double the amount of the receipts. These sales are limited now, by the ability of the purchasers; you may sell twice the quantity for half the price, but you cannot increase the amount of money; and, if you could, you would drain the new States of their specie, and produce the ruinous consequences we have before witnessed, from that cause, in the Western States. If it could be effected, it would be unwise to increase that drain, for the mere purpose of paying the public debt a year or two sooner than by the natural means now in operation.

If I differ with the gentleman on these points, I disprove still more his ulterior views. The object seems to be, to force the revenue to the highest point, to stop the progress of all our improvements, to press the payment of the public debt in five years, in order that, when that is accomplished, we may remove the duties, and lighten the burthens of the People. I think I have shown, that the ideas of two millions surplus in the Treasury, and of two millions from the public lands, are both fallacious.

If relief is the object, I think the mode extremely injudicious. The plan is, to discontinue the usual appropriations for Internal Improvements, by which three or four millions are annually carried back to the People, to reward their labor and improve the country; and to add an extra four millions to the immense Sinking Fund of ten millions, that, by a great effort, the debt may be extinguished in five years. Now, on the contrary, I would propose, if we must discontinue these important National works, and suspend all improvements, to abolish the duties at once upon tea, coffee, spices, cocoa, chocolate—those necessities of life, which enter into the consumption of every family, and of all classes, and which are not produced in the country—and, if necessary, to diminish those on wines, silks, and fine linens, &c. This would be a relief, while it would not impair, the protection of our productions, or retard, injuriously, the payment of the public debt. This debt will be paid in good time, by the regular operations—there is no motive for straining every thing to the utmost point of tension—suspending all works of public utility, extorting four millions from the People, merely to expedite that object.

The gentleman from Missouri, in looking forward to the extinguishment of this debt, has broached new and dangerous doctrines, which go to the foundation of all protection, and, carried into effect, would ruin this or any other country. I hope I misunderstood him. But what he has said touches me in a tender point, and I cannot permit it to pass. It is said in terms that mark deliberation—and it is distinctly announced—that these principles are to form the distinctive lines between the great parties that are to divide the politicians of this country.

He says, "I am for abolishing duties in totò, as soon as the public debt is paid off, upon all articles of prime necessity, or ordinary comfort, which are not made at home, or not made in sufficient quantity to merit national pro"tection." And, to make his views more intelligible, he adds, "salt, sugar, blankets, flannels, present another class of necessities, and comforts, upon which some diversity of opinion may arise; they are necessities of life, and partly made at home, but not in sufficient quantity to answer the public demand." If from this is to be inferred, that these articles do not deserve the national protection, because they do not supply the public demand—and the protecting duties are, consequently, to be removed—and this is to constitute the line between the parties, I have no hesitation in saying on what side of that line I shall be found. This doctrine followed out to its consequences, would reach wool, hemp, cotton bagging, iron, lead, and almost every article, agricultural and manufacturing, which is now the object of National protection.

Sir, I am unwilling to touch the great system of protecting duties, upon which I believe the prosperity of the country, now, essentially depends. The laws, upon the faith of which capital is invested, and labor directed to all the various pursuits of life, should be sacred. If this revision is to take place, where will it end? One interest will be sacrificed at a time, until all confidence is lost in the faith of our laws, and the permanency of our policy—until the capital, industry, and spirit of the country is broken, and disorder, confusion, and ruin, result.

The necessities of life, which the soil produces, instead of being singled out as peculiarly worthy of sacrifice, ought to be the objects of special care. No People can dispense with the use of them; no nation can be independent without them; in war, you could not procure them; in peace, you will have no means to buy them.

Sir, I am the more surprised, as the gentleman from Missouri has so recently aided in establishing this system. He rendered a most acceptable service to his State, by an ample protection of its chief staple. The removal of that duty now, would produce very injurious effects upon the industry and trade of that State; and with the People, to whom he now refers the subject of abolition of duties, it will be a question, whether they are willing to sacrifice, annually, a million of productive labor, to save a tithe of that sum, by removing the duties on other articles, which they obtain by an exchange of theirs. Let us test the correctness of this doctrine of abolishing duties, because the article is not produced "in sufficient quantities to answer the demand." We import, annually, more than 10 millions of pounds of lead, in different forms, equal to near half a million of dollars. Some of these articles are considerably increased in value by manufacture. Missouri abounds with lead ore—she produces now about half a million of dollars a year—but she does not supply the demand; she has, however, the material, the labor, skill, and capital, to supply, in time, "the public demand." Now, upon the principle assumed, because there is a market at home, and the public demand for lead not supplied by Missouri, the duty must be abolished. Sir, we have soil and labor to produce sugar and molasses, equal to the consumption of the country. But, at present, we require six millions of dollars worth from abroad. We have an open market at home for the employment of slave labor, to the additional extent of six millions a year; and we may safely calculate the annual consumption of these articles in twenty-five years, at sixteen millions of dollars. This demand, in due time, will be supplied under the present fostering care of the Government; but, upon the principle laid down, because we do not now, "answer the public demand," it will "not merit the National protection." The duties must be removed, and the market supplied by foreigners, and the value of the soil and labor sacrificed. Sir, that will present a great question to all the Southern States, the value of whose slave property must now depend on the cultivation of the cane. The market of all agricultural productions is now fully supplied. Flour, tobacco, and cotton, are now pressing on the demand; they have fallen to the lowest prices; but there remains one great field of labor open to their enterprise, sufficient to give employment to a great portion of their slaves, and that alone, at this time, gives any value to that property. Remove this, and we are thrown into direct competition with the Islands, and our productions and our labor must sink to the level of theirs. It would annihilate, at one blow, at least half of the value of the Southern property. But, sir, without this protection, sugar could not be made. It would not only be an entire sacrifice of all the capital employed in it, but it would make a wide ruin. Besides, sir, what will you give in exchange for eight or ten millions of dollars a year in sugar? And, if you take that amount of your present exports for this article, you must limit yourselves to that extent in something else. Sir, the whole amount of the sugar enters into the internal trade of the country, and the whole of it either goes off by exchange with the several States, for their peculiar productions, or the money remains in the country.

Sir, I had no hand in creating this system of protection, but it is sacred now with me. The wealth of the country, and the prosperity and happiness of the People, are now intimately interwoven with it. It has become a vital interest. The extinguishment of the public debt, and the pension list, which will be effected in eight years, by the present operation, will reduce the expenditure below eight millions. The abolition of duties on articles not grown or made in the country, will reduce the revenue at least eight millions. Teas, coffee, spices, cocoa, chocolate, wines, silks, and linens, will produce $7,600,000, which will reduce the revenue to 14 or 15 millions—and to 13 or 14 without the aid of the lands, and leave the capital and labor still protected; and, I trust, it will never become necessary to disturb the present order of things, or important to reduce the revenue below that sum. This will afford us from five to six millions a year of surplus revenue, to be disposed of by the wisdom of Congress, in the mode in which, according to their discretion, the greatest amount of good will be produced to the country. What can be more cheering and animating to the statesman and patriot, than the regular application of such a sum, for a single century, to the improvement and embellishment of his country? The rivers it will open, the harbors it will deepen, the canals it will form, the roads and rail-ways it will construct, and avenues of trade it will create—the monuments it will erect to the glory of the country!

The anticipation of the surplus revenue has already brought to the consideration of Congress two modes of employing the money. The one is to apply it, annually, to the great improvements of every kind, in their proper order, to facilitate the intercourse and the communications between the States; the other proposes to divide the sum among the several States, according to population. It is too soon to enter upon the relative merits of the two systems. I greatly prefer the former, because I believe the States incompetent to the great national works that are necessary to connect the several parts of the Union.

But, if the majority of the People should eventually decide against the expediency of pursuing the great system of improvement, I greatly prefer the distribution among the States, to the abolition of duties: and if we should ever determine—which I hope we shall not—to forego the general system, I have no hesitation in saying, that the most beneficial consequences may result, even by the direction of the States, in establishing permanent funds for education—rendering that cheap and accessible to all classes; and by judicious application to objects of public usefulness. If it was for no other purpose than to levy a fund for the support of the State Governments, it would be infinitely superior to the abolition of duties.

This fund, distributed among the States, according to population, will enable each State to dispense with direct taxation. Their taxes are levied only on property, while capital stock and income is exempt. Those of the United States fall equally upon the wealth of the community.

Sir, I do not oppose the reference of the resolutions. I am satisfied to leave this subject to the Committee, believing they will disapprove all the objects contemplated by them.

[Mr. BENTON said he thought the gentleman from Louisiana had fallen into an error in relation to the two millions. He found, by the law for the regulation of the Treasury, that the sum of 2,000,000 was to remain in the Treasury over and above the appropriations of Congress. It, therefore, could not be disposed of, as the gentleman supposed. If the United States was to be considered as deriving happiness and prosperity from the existence of the public debt, then Great Britain must be the happiest nation in the world: for her debt amounted to nearly four thousand millions of dollars.]

Mr. JOHNSTON said, that nothing which had fallen from him could have called for that remark. He had uttered no sentiment of that kind, and was incapable of uttering such opinion in relation to the affairs of this country. His remarks were limited to the time of paying the debt, and the policy of forcing the payment in a short period, and to its possible effect upon the currency. The debt already exists; it is the excess of our expenditure, in two wars, over our revenues; it is the cost of our independence, and the acquisition of what will be four States in this Union. It is a subject little understood in its effect and operation upon the wealth, commerce, and currency of the country, and one upon which it is easy to excite public prejudice. A public debt is, no doubt, a public evil; but is an evil, from which, by injudicious management, much greater evil may result. By paying off large sums at once to foreign creditors, you may produce a drain of specie—by throwing large sums suddenly into the community, you may disturb the regular operations of the money market, in which revulsions may take place, not only injurious to individuals, but to great branches of trade—the whole commerce—and upon property itself. You draw upwards of twenty millions a year from the body of the People: the payment of the public debt goes back to large cities, and to foreigners; ten millions of this sum are now devoted to that object. Would it not be better to apply the balance to improvements in different parts of the country, or to reduce the duties upon certain necessities of life, not produced here? If a public debt is an evil, it is not so to the extent of the debt. The funding of the public debt created a capital of eighty millions. How far that capital has supplied the want of specie—how far it entered into commercial transactions—how much it augmented the value, and fixed a certain standard to property—how many debts it paid—how much distress it prevented—what has been its general effect upon national wealth and character—how far it has accelerated the rapid growth and advancement of the country, and the general prosperity—cannot now be known.

We have acquired a vast domain of land, and increased our revenues. A large portion of the purchase money went to our own citizens. The amount of the foreign debt is so much capital brought into the country, or has served to preserve the balance of trade, or to prevent drains of specie. It serves as a medium of exchange in large transactions, and is the basis of many institutions. It is a safe investment for widows and children, and there are eight thousand creditors holding this stock. Still, sir, there is an obligation to pay it off, easily to the People, and regularly, not to produce any unequal action.

The public debt of England was not created, because it was a public blessing; but is the effect of her peculiar position, the nature of her government, and the course of her continental policy. How far it has operated to create her gigantic power and immense wealth, and to make her the first nation in Europe, we can all see: but whether the acquisition is worth the cost, to her People, is doubtful. It is a debt of enormous amount, and is an evidence of her vast resources, and the faith of the nation. It is, however, due to her own citizens, of whom three hundred thousand are stockholders: more than half of that number draw less than ten pounds a year each; and about a third less than three pounds a year. A large mass is held by a few individuals, but who, also, spend large sums, perhaps the whole amount of their revenues. The money is forced rapidly through the community, and back into the Treasury. But, while this goes on, the aggregate of wealth is increasing.

Mr. J. said, he did not wish to be misunderstood. He was happy to see the realization of all our wishes in the extinguishment of this debt. It will occur, by the regular application, in ten years. I shall be glad to be relieved from such a burthen, especially as it will relieve the public lands from the pledge—relieve us from the necessity of holding them up for revenue, and enable us to adopt a more liberal policy towards the States; as it will enable us to diminish the duties seven or eight millions, and give us the disposition of six or seven millions for great national objects.

Mr. MACON said, that, as he had understood it, this was merely a motion for inquiry. He did not accede to the proposition, that, if the public debt was paid off, it would reduce the capital of the country. The public debt was like a private debt. If he should give his bond of a thousand dollars, he believed that, if he did not pay it when he was able, it never would be paid. It was with a nation as with an individual. If we do not pay our public debt when we have money, there is no certainty that it will ever be paid. The difference between them was, that, exactly in proportion as the public debt was liquidated, the taxes upon the People would be reduced and they would have more money at home. He had long thought there was a strong party in the country, which did not want the public debt paid off. Not in the administration, but in the Legislature; and that party was for spending the money of the country for all kinds of projects, instead of applying it to the public debt. It was just as it was with individuals who spent all their income and neglected their debts; and it could not lead to beneficial results. England might have paid off her debt more than once, if they had followed a prudent course. For himself, he wished to see the public debt discharged. We shall not always go on as at present. There will come a time for war. We are continually preparing for it; and when we are ready, we shall go to war. He had been a long time desirous to see some more direct means taken for paying the debt of the Nation, but he began to despair; and now, instead of calculating upon its being done, he did not know as that happy event would ever take place.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Md. the bill making appropriations for certain Fortifications, for the year 1828, was taken up in Committee of the Whole; and the amendment offered by the Committee on Finance, appropriating $50,000 for the erection of a Fortification at the mouth of the river Barataria, near New Orleans, being under consideration, Several letters and documents, in relation to the proposed object of appropriation, were read, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Md.

Mr. DICKERSON opposed the amendment, observing that, last year, it was understood that the appropriations were to decrease yearly; instead of which, here was a new project, not mentioned in the former plans. He had observed, that the estimates had always fallen far short of the expenditures on the works; and, as he believed the system of fortification was going on to a length, which Congress had never, by any vote that it had given, authorized, he wished to see those fortifications finished, which had been already commenced, before he could vote for any new ones.

Mr. HARRISON, in reply, contended that, when the estimates had fallen short of the expenditures, it was from the impossibility of arriving at the exact sum in advance which a work would cost. As to the fortification now proposed, he considered it essential to make valuable and efficient the various works which had already been completed for the defence of New Orleans. The passage which was to be defended by this fortification, could be entered independently of the passages which were defended by the works already constructed; hence, the expenditure upon them, without this additional provision, would be thrown away. The branch of the Mississippi, at the entrance of which it was proposed to place a fortification, would otherwise be accessible to an enemy, who could land there, and transport his forces up the river to New Orleans. The defence of that city was essential, from its great commercial importance; and it had been defended, during the last war, by the skill of its General, and the bravery of the troops. We could not always depend on having such a General, or such soldiers. If we shut one avenue of approach, and leave open another, the expenditures on the works would be fruitless. The vicinity of New Orleans was peculiarly undefended; and a large force could not be suddenly brought to bear upon its defence. Another reason why this appropriation ought to be made at this time was, that the officers who had been employed on the works already erected, would be enabled to superintend the erection of the fortification of Barataria; and, as they had become accustomed to the climate, no risk would be incurred by placing new officers there. It was true, that this position had been formerly overlooked; but this ought not to operate to prevent the completion of a work deemed necessary to the defence of a point so important. At the present time, the country was able to make the expenditures, and, as it was out of the power of any one to predict at what time such works would become necessary, it was prudent and expedient to prepare for any exigency which a state of war might present.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in defending the amendment, remarked that, in 1816, Mr. Crawford, in a report upon the subject, had given it as his opinion, that $800,000 might be annually appropriated for fortifications. For several years this sum was appropriated. In 1821 the amount was smaller, in consequence of a scarcity in the revenue: yet, when it could be done, this sum had been regularly applied to this object. The whole amount of the present bill, including an appropriation for Pensacola, and one for Charleston, was 646,000 dollars, 150,000 dollars less than the sum pointed out by Mr. Crawford, which had been followed up as the rule of Congress whenever the amount could be spared. The position of Barataria had hitherto been overlooked; yet all that had been done for the defence of New Orleans would be useless, without this further appropriation. An enemy would have the fortifications already erected in the rear, and pass up the inlet at the mouth of which this fortification was to be placed, and reach the city unobstructed. They would not be so stupid as to attack the fortifications, when they could advance upon their object by an unfortified pass, and could make the attack where there would be no defence. This fortification must be made at some time, and it seemed to be expedient to do it now, while the officers of the United States were employed at New Orleans in constructing other similar works. It was a prudent and economical course to provide for doing the work at this period. He was of the same opinion as the gentleman from New Jersey, as to the errors which had been committed in the prosecution of the system of fortifications. In many instances, the fortifications erected had turned out to be useless. Still, he was in favor of going on with the system, and of providing, in particular, for the defence of those points which were weakest, and of the greatest importance. Little had been done in this way at the South, while, from the sparseness of the population, artificial defence was most required. The people in the North, from the populousness of the country, contrive to defend themselves in some way or another. They had also already received far greater attention from the Government than the South. But the fortification of New Orleans was not done solely for the benefit of that city. The whole Western country, the trade of which goes down the Mississippi, is to be protected by the defence of this point, and there was scarcely a State in the Union that was not, in a commercial point of view, interested in this object. Every section of the country sends vessels there for freights, and are, consequently, to be benefited by the protection of the commerce of that quarter of the Union. He hoped, therefore, that no serious opposition would be made to the amendment.

Mr. DICKERSON said, he did not think the fact, that certain men had been employed at New Orleans, and still wanted employment, and ought to be kept in employment, were good reasons for erecting any new works of the kind. He doubted the statement that an attack could be made by troops transported up the river Barataria in boats, as artillery could not be conveyed in this manner. Besides, they would land on the other side of the river, than that on which New Orleans was situated. As to the sums hitherto appropriated, he did not think Congress was pledged to apply $800,000 to fortifications. He did think, however, that, whenever $50,000 was expended upon any such work, they had had experience enough to show that it became a pledge for the expenditure of half a million. The gentleman from Maryland seemed to think the Government bound to appropriate eight hundred thousand dollars annually, because it was the opinion of Mr. Crawford, who had recommended it, or considered it expedient. Mr. D. had as high a respect for the opinions of Mr. Crawford as was entertained by any man; but he would not vote for any man's opinions. He was opposed to embarking in any new expenditure for fortifications until those already commenced had been completed; and some computation of the length the Government was to go could be arrived at.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, that, after the war, Congress had appointed a board of engineers to examine the various posts, with the view to the erection of fortifications; and, although no particular vote had been given by Congress upon the system, yet, they had been in the continual habit of appropriating money, from time to time, for these objects. The three first years after the war, these appropriations were made without designating the works to which they should be applied. Afterwards they made specific appropriations; and, in this manner, they had gone on ever since. Had a specific system been adopted, it would scarcely have been more binding upon the Government than it is at present. But there had been difficulties in the way of any such organized plan. It was formerly impossible to frame an entire system. But as far as it could be done, a plan had been marked out, and followed up. It was a general understanding that those works, necessary to national defence, should be gradually completed, and the first object was the protection of the great cities. The defence, for instance, of New York, whose commerce was of such vast importance, and where the property, always afloat, was of immense value, and involved the interests of citizens of every part of the Union, was a matter of national importance. It was also of great moment to protect the commerce of

[SENATE.]

New Orleans, although the amount of property in the city was not so great as that of New York: yet the trade of the vast interior country, of which New Orleans is the depot, creates, during three months of the year, a vast trade, in which all parts of the Union, in one way or another, participated.

It was needless to urge the necessity of defending a city where so much wealth was continually deposited, and needing protection in case of hostilities. Fully sensible of that necessity, Congress had hitherto made appropriations for the fortification of the most prominent points of defence. One point only remains; and unless it were also provided with a fortification, the troops of an enemy might disregard all that had been already done, and transport their troops and artillery up the Mississippi, and attack the city more easily than General Packenham ascended the main approach to it. There were several passages above the point, by which the enemy could pass into the Mississippi, without being obliged, as was the case with General Packenham, to cut a canal. Three or four canals, leading into the Mississippi, would afford this convenience to an enemy, after he had once ascended beyond the point which this provision proposes to fortify. The remark of the gentleman from New Jersey, that he could only reach the opposite side of the river, is, therefore, not correct. It was perfectly true, as had been said by the gentleman from Ohio, that, if this pass were not fortified, the money expended on the works already constructed, would have been entirely thrown away. On the score of economy, the project ought now to be carried into effect. Two engineers are now employed on the other fortifications in the vicinity. The materials for the work were all in a state of preparation. The works for making bricks, which had cost a large sum, were all in operation, and the principal articles required could now be obtained, from the existence of these preparatory works, and from the fact that the contracts are now open, at least thirty per cent. cheaper than three years after the suspension of operations. Then the whole expense of a commencement of the works must be incurred. So that it was not an unreasonable supposition, that, by making the appropriation now, the sum of 50,000 dollars will be saved to the Government. The amount of the appropriation proposed this year was 150,000 dollars below the sum originally fixed upon for annual expenditure on objects of this nature. There was no want of the means; and if the money was not expended for this object, it would be applied to some other. The question therefore, was, whether this was not the most important object to which it could be devoted. It appeared to Mr. J. that, if they stopped now, the whole system would be obstructed. Nor, in this case, would the gentleman's idea of beginning no new works fairly apply; as this new work was, after all, but a part of the plan contemplated at first, when the defence of New Orleans, by fortifications, was planned and commenced. It could not be supposed that the Government was to expend large sums to protect one approach to the city, and leave another entirely open to an enemy. Hence, it was but fair to argue, that, even if this pass were originally overlooked in the reports, Congress could not, with propriety, neglect it, when it was shown that its defence was essential to render useful the works on which large sums of money had already been expended. Mr. JOHNSON considered that the erection of these works ought to depend on the country to be defended, and not on the amount of the expenditure which they would require. Congress would not have refused to erect Fort Jackson, for the defence of the Mississippi, because its cost was 50,000 dollars more than had been estimated. It was not the cost alone, but also the object to be gained by it, that Congress was to consider. He did not believe that the expense had so far exceeded the estimates on these works as was supposed.

In some cases it doubtless had done so. But he believed that, when the whole contemplated chain of defence should have been finished, the excess would not be more than one million. This was trifling in comparison to the importance of the works which would have been completed. Able men had made those estimates, and he thought them as nearly accurate as possible. It was true, that inexpedient appropriations had been made; but they did not offer good ground of opposition to plans of self-evident importance and utility. As to New Orleans, there could be no doubt of the necessity of protecting the city and its commerce with fortifications. The facility of approach, the difficulty of defence, and the amount of property continually exposed, all pointed it out as a point which must be fortified against the attacks of an enemy. The only question seemed to be, whether the object should be carried into effect now or hereafter. The gentleman from New Jersey says, that the position is not to be found in the original system. But that fact, said Mr. J. does not decide the point as to the importance of the work. The point in question had recently been examined by General Bernard, and other Engineers; and, the proof was now as strong that the work proposed was needed, as it could have been, had it been laid down in the original system.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation of 50,000 dollars for fortification of the harbor of Pensacola. Mr. D. made a few remarks, which were mostly inaudible to the reporter, previous to reading an extract from the report of General Bernard on this subject. He observed, in conclusion, that he did not profess to have any recent information as to this point; but, if it was not explained, he could not vote for the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said, that this subject had been fully investigated in the other House. It was known that we had a Navy Yard at Pensacola, and that its position made it one of the most important points in the Southern section of the country, for the protection of our commerce. He read the report, made last year, of the Chief Engineer, in which was stated the necessity of fortifications at this point, and observed that the present appropriation only contemplated the purchase of materials.

Mr. HARRISON considered that the gentleman from New Jersey had not given the proper interpretation to the report of General Bernard. He thought that report went to show the importance of fortifications at Pensacola, rather than the contrary. Whether Pensacola was the proper point for a naval depot or not, was not the question. The navy yard is there, and wants protection. The position of the place is on the sea, and it can be approached, without notice, by an enemy's fleet. It was so situated, in a country which could not contribute much to its defence, that it was essential that means should be provided to protect the large amount of public property which will be deposited there, and for the protection of our commerce. A small naval force might find shelter under the guns of the forts of this place, from a superior squadron, and be able to give great facility to our trade, as a canal would soon be constructed from Pensacola to New Orleans; and thus the former place be an outlet to a great portion of the Mississippi trade. Mr. H. remarked, in conclusion, that some of the reports had stated that there were but two other points more important than Pensacola, and they were Boston and New York.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that, according to the report of Gen. Bernard, the fortification of Pensacola would require a garrison of 12,000 men in time of a siege. If this was the case, the protection afforded by it to our Navy and commerce would be dearly bought. He had always been opposed to the selection of this place as a naval depot, and if it had been fixed upon as such, and was to cost the country so great an expense, he thought that the Government ought to back out of it. The matter ought to be thoroughly examined before any money was expended there for fortifications. The expense—the number of men required to defend it—its exposed situation—all these ought to be considered before Congress made this appropriation.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, opposed the motion at considerable length. He considered the erection of fortifications, absolutely necessary at Pensacola, where, from the fact of its being a naval depot, large amounts of public property must continually be exposed. He agreed with the gentleman from New Jersey, that our fortifications had generally cost double the amount of the estimates. But he found, in this fact, no good reason why, if they were to be erected any where, they should not be in the Southern section of the country. He demonstrated, by a statement of facts, the importance of Pensacola, as a naval post; and spoke also in favor of the appropriations for fortifications at Savannah and Charleston, S. C. If they were to stop in this system, they ought to stop short, and deal by one part of the country as they did by the other. One portion ought not to be defended, and the other remain undefended. He was, therefore, in favor of going on—not that he wished to be considered an advocate of a system of fortifications, consisting of useless armaments, but he desired that, where necessity called for the means of defence, they might be given. He did not depend much upon the Engineers; but their estimates would be as correct in this case as in any other. He, therefore, trusted that the South would be allowed to share in the benefits of the system, since it was necessary that it should be continued.

Mr. BERRIEN opposed the motion. He considered that the question presented in the discussion of this system, was, whether Congress would force the enemy to carry on war without our limits, or, whether we shall suffer all the complicated evils, which our people endured in the last contest with Great Britain, and, from a want of preparation, undergo a similar expenditure of blood and treasure. The system has gone on thus far, unimpeded, and, since objections are now offered; it is to be asked, "Whether it is to be made general in its operation, or to stop short, after a partial application to but one favored section of the country?" North of the Chesapeake, millions had been expended, if not in a lavish, at least in the most liberal manner. At New Orleans a considerable expenditure had also been made; but between these points nothing had been done. And was this still to be so? Are we [said Mr. B.] without the pale of protection, that no appropriation can be extended to defend our shores from the assaults of the Nation's enemies? This was not a proposition of original expediency. It was not a question of mistaken policy. But here lies the essence of the question. You have fortified one portion of the country, so that the efforts of a hostile visitation are turned aside. Another portion of the country is left defenceless, and the natural consequence is, that the enemy is thrown upon that unprotected part; and that, while our Northern brethren are shielded from the terrors of war, upon us in the South the whole fury of hostility is poured out. North of the Chesapeake, the country is thoroughly defended; South of that point, the People are left to themselves. The selection, by the gentleman from New Jersey, of Pensacola, was, he thought, peculiarly unfortunate. Pensacola was so situated that its defence of our commercial interests was a most important consideration. The Island of Cuba was considered the key of the Gulf of Mexico. The only point whence we could exercise any control over the commerce of the Gulf, was Pensacola. It had been fixed upon as the only eligible point for a naval depot. He looked upon it as highly important in its defence of New Orleans, as there could be no great time before the two places would be connected by a canal; and he deemed it not unlikely, that this communication would be continued to the Atlantic. The importance of a force at Pensacola could not be doubted. A strong post, in the rear of an enemy, who should attack New Orleans, would operate much to his embarrassment, and would require a great addition of force. It was not the people of Florida and Louisiana, who were to be benefited exclusively by such a work. He would correct an error of the gentleman from New Jersey. He had read the report erroneously; as 1,200, and not 12,000 men are said to be required to garrison the place. It has been well said by the report, that eight-tenths of the United States are deeply interested in the defence of this post. Mr. BERRIEN then read an extract from the revised report of the Board of Engineers, in support of his opinions, and concluded by urging, that the fortification of Pensacola was essential, because it is a naval depot, and a mass of public property must necessarily be collected there—because it would essentially protect the trade of New Orleans—because it would control the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico—and because it is idle to fortify New Orleans, if this important post is left undefended.

Mr. DICKERSON defended his motion by some further remarks.

Mr. COBB spoke at considerable length in opposition to the whole system. He considered the late discovery of the point of Barataria, not a little surprising. He said he laid down the ground broadly, that Congress had been regularly deceived by the Board of Engineers, ever since the late war. He did not know when the expenditures were to end, as every year they increased, and new projects were continually starting up. When one fortification was done, it must be torn down, and another of two hundred guns be put up in its place. This was the constant course of the system, which ought, instead of system, to be called a vampyre, which was feeding with insatiable appetite on the blood of the Treasury. Mr. C. then made some remarks on the tardy progress of some of our larger fortifications—Fortress Monroe, in particular. He considered the money expended at the Kip Raps so much money thrown into the ocean. He viewed the whole system to be nurturing the germ of a standing Army—and dangerous to the liberties of the country. He wished to know, after the forts were finished, how large the expenditures for their armaments would be; and supposed it would be a lucrative affair for the Ordnance Department. In conclusion, Mr. Cobb declared, that, if he could procure a vote of the Senate, he would move to refuse to pass a single appropriation for this system, whether for finished or unfinished fortifications—and then he would vote to send the Engineers over the ground again, to profit by the errors that had already been committed.

Mr. EATON then moved an adjournment.

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1828.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, yesterday:

To the Senate of the United States:

WASHINGTON, MARCH, 3, 1828.

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 3d January last, requesting the communication of information in my possession relative to alleged aggression on the rights of the citizens of the United States, by persons claiming authority under the Province of New Brunswick, I communicate a report from the Secretary of State, with a copy of that of the Special Agent, mentioned in my Message at the commencement of the present Session of Congress, as having been sent to visit the spot where the cause of complaint had occurred, to ascertain the state of the facts, and the result of whose inquiries I then promised to communicate to Congress when it should be received.

Fortifications.

[SENATE.]

The Senate are requested to receive this communication as the fulfilment of that engagement, and, in making it, I deem it proper to notice, with just acknowledgment, the liberality with which the Minister of his Britannic Majesty, residing here, and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick, have furnished the Agent of the United States with every facility for the attainment of the information which it was the object of his mission to procure.

Considering the exercise of exclusive territorial jurisdiction upon the grounds in controversy, by the Government of New Brunswick, in the arrest and imprisonment of John Baker, as incompatible with the mutual understanding existing between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, on this subject, a demand has been addressed to the Provincial Authorities, through the Minister of Great Britain, for the release of that individual from prison, and of indemnity to him for his detention. In doing this, it has not been intended to maintain the regularity of his own proceedings, or of those with whom he was associated; to which they were not authorized by any sovereign authority of this country.

The documents appended to the report of the Agent, being original papers belonging to the files of the Department of State, a return of them is requested, when the Senate shall have no further use for them.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up—being the bill making appropriations for certain Fortifications for the year 1828; and the question being on agreeing to the amendment adopted yesterday, in committee of the whole, making an appropriation of 50,000 dollars for fortifications at the mouth of the Barataria, near New Orleans—

Mr. HARRISON said that it gave him pleasure to be able to state, that the late period at which this proposition was brought forward, was not owing to any negligence on the part of the engineers. The point now proposed for defence had been mentioned in every report of the engineers upon the defence of New Orleans, that had been made to Congress. In the report which he held in his hand, and which had been read yesterday, by the gentleman from Maryland, the fortification of the point designated as Grand Terre was recommended as of great importance. The point was that which was now presented to the Senate as the fortress of Barataria. As to any error in the reports of the engineers, he did not consider that the Military Committee were at all responsible for their correctness, as these subjects were, after having been acted upon in the other House, referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate, to decide upon the question whether the Government had the means at disposal for carrying them into effect. It was impossible that the Committee could go into an examination of the correctness of the report, as the only function of the Finance Committee was to decide upon the details. He merely made these remarks to relieve himself from any supposition that he was, from his situation in the Military Committee, to be supposed possessed of minute information on these subjects. He should move an amendment to the bill—to strike out the word Barataria, and insert "Grand Terre." He did not intend to go into an argument to show the necessity of the provision to the permanent defence of New Orleans. He would merely make one remark, in relation to an observation made by the gentleman from Georgia, in the debate of yesterday. He said that when this pass was fortified, another post would be needed at the mouth of the Lafourche. Mr. H. looked upon this as erroneous. He had examined a large map at the War Department, and found that it was so long and circuitous, that it would not probably need fortification. In some of the reports, it had been said, that this river might require some trifling fortification; but, at any rate they would make no very important consideration.

Mr. COBB observed, that the discussion of yesterday had resulted in a beneficial manner, since more information had been elicited than the Senate had possessed previously. He had said, yesterday, that the fortification of Barataria had never been reported on before; and even the Chairman of the Military Committee had allowed that the statement was correct. It now appeared that the report of the engineers, made in 1821, did mention this work, but made a different name. It was at Grand Terre, and not at Barataria, and noticed, it was true, in the general plan—but, it would be perceived, that it was set down in the 2d class—and it, therefore, appeared to him, (Mr. C.) that the time had not arrived to begin upon it. In other parts of the country, works in the second and third classes had not been commenced upon. How this plan, so gravely and so solemnly made, could be departed from, he did not know. How the works at New Orleans, embracing the three classes, could be carried into effect, in opposition to this plan, he could not tell. If the plan was proper and judicious, he thought its advocates ought to adhere to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. said, that the name of Barataria was, from peculiar circumstances, notorious. Every man in the community knew where Barataria was situated. But Grand Terre was not known, and he should have difficulty in finding its exact location himself. Grand Terre merely signified high land, and was applied, generally, to almost every point of high ground. He hoped, therefore, from the want of distinctness in the position pointed out by the appellation Grand Terre, the gentleman from Ohio would withdraw his motion.

Mr. HARRISON said, that he was willing to withdraw his motion, or move to insert Grand Terre, near Barataria.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. said, that he wished it might be withdrawn: Barataria was far the best name. He presumed, that, when gentlemen examined the report yesterday, the position was not recognized, because it was spoken of under the name of Grand Terre. It seemed to him to be a matter of very little importance whether the fortification was to be of the second or the third class.

Mr. CHANDLER said that, as there seemed to be several places called Grand Terre, in Louisiana—[Mr. JOHNSON said, it was merely the general term for high land]—he thought that the appropriation ought to be omitted, until a point could be fixed upon. He did not know how it happened that this project came before Congress at so late a period; but it seemed to be less known and understood, than was desirable. He, on this ground, thought it better to delay it until those forts were completed, which had been already commenced. He would rather legislate upon the most important objects first. It appeared to him that the Government was going too largely into the system; and a little delay of those objects which were not of the first importance, would, he thought, be advisable.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, that he believed the whole opposition to this project, with the exception of that of the gentlemen from Georgia, and New Jersey, arose from want of information; and, as the subject was one of great importance to the State which he represented, he hoped the Senate would hear from him a brief explanation of the facts. The gentleman from New Jersey, had, in the first place, supposed, that this point was not noticed in the original report—that it had escaped the attention of the engineers—and, at this late period, had been found out, and presented to Congress. Mr. J. said, he recollected, many years since, that this point was mentioned in a report of the engineers, which gave not only a view of the topography of the country, but contained some information which was considered improper to publish to the world. The reason was, that it would have been unsafe to give to foreign nations information of this kind, which they might have an opportunity of using to our prejudice. In that report, this point was laid down as one of the greatest importance in the defence of New Orleans. As to the river Lafourche, which was mentioned, yesterday, by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. J. had examined the report on that head, and it was then stated to be a long, narrow, shallow stream, which could easily be obstructed. It was idle to think of defending with fortifications such a pass as this. Two pages of the report were devoted to the subject of Barataria; and it was said that a fort, at the mouth of the river, would defend all the right bank of the Mississippi. It was also stated, that there was a work, during the war, on this river, called the Temple; but it was not an effectual defence, because there was two inlets below it, before arriving at the mouth of the river, and which communicated with the Mississippi, and it was, therefore, considered necessary to fix on this point called Grand Terre. The same position had been mentioned in subsequent reports. It was sufficient to shew, that it attracted the notice of General Bernard, on his first visits to the country, and of other scientific individuals. But, to any gentlemen who would cast his eye over the map of Louisiana, it must be apparent, that Barataria is the best avenue of approach to New Orleans. The water was deep, and an attack could, by its navigation, be made on the city, before any obstruction could be thrown in its way; and without a fort at its mouth, the approach of an enemy could not be retarded. It was much more important to establish a fortification here, than on the Mississippi, because the river could be more easily obstructed. The gentlemen had led themselves into a mistake, as to the classes laid down in the plan of fortification. It was absurd to suppose that there was to be any preference in the erection of those different classes. New Orleans was the point to be defended, and the different fortifications might all be considered as one work. New Orleans was an important place—its defence was necessary; and it did not depend on the kind of forts by which it was to be defended; it was the point itself which gave it a rank among the first class. For instance, if we look at New York, it is a place of vast importance: but would it be questioned whether its defence should be delayed for years, because the works were of the third rate? He thought this would be an absurdity. The three forts by which the city would be defended, might be of the third class; but when taken together, they constituted a work of the first. The same reasoning would apply to many other places, and with particular force to New Orleans. It would hardly be contended, that, because the works proposed at Mobile are of the first class, in point of magnitude, that they must be completed before those at New Orleans could be commenced. The argument of the gentleman from Georgia, as to the classes, was, therefore, indefensible. The opponents of this provision had, perhaps, produced some effect on the Senate by their remarks, as to the excess of the expenditures, in certain cases, over the estimates. This had happened, it was true, in some instances. The fort at Rouse's Point was one; the Pea Patch another. But, it would be remembered, that the estimates for these works were made before the present Board of Engineers was organized; and, for the errors in these cases, they were not responsible. It was the same in the case of Fort Washington, which was, undoubtedly, situated improperly. But, so far as the Board had gone, it was a matter of astonishment that the expenditures had so remarkably coincided with the estimates. The gentleman from New Jersey had found what he considered a single error in the expenditure upon Fort Jackson. But a statement of the facts, as detailed in the report, was only necessary to explain this apparent discrepancy. The Engineers had found that, in the Southern climate, barracks and stores were absolutely necessary, and these they were obliged to build. To these objects 50,000 dollars had been applied, and this expense was the excess of which the gentleman complained. Otherwise than this, the estimates had not been exceeded. To return to the proposed fortification at Barataria: It had been reported upon by the Board, and it could not but strike every one at a view of the map. It was known to the army in the war, and was looked upon as an important point. He repeated, that the classification of the works was highly improper, if it were to cause the larger forts only to be finished first. Several of the larger works were planned at points of minor importance; but this gave no priority to their erection, in point of time. He trusted that the amendment would be sustained.

Fortifications.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that as to the fortification now proposed, he was opposed to it on the ground of its uselessness. It was to be situated at the mouth of a river in which there was a bar, over which vessels drawing eight feet of water could not pass, and eighty miles from New Orleans. Through an avenue of approach like this, he thought there was no danger that an enemy would attack the city. As to the proposition to alter the name of the point, Grand Terre, it appeared, was not designated. And if it had been put down, it was in the third class; nor was it considered of immediate importance, or it would have been earlier presented to Congress. This was evident, from the report upon the subject; and there could be no danger in allowing this point to remain until the others were completed. For proposing this delay, he thought there was ample cause. Instead of having been sent to Congress by the Secretary of War, in his estimates, it appeared to have come to the Senate by the suggestion of a member to the Secretary.

Mr. D. then alluded to the wasteful expenditure on several works of the kind; referring more particularly to the fortification at the Pea Patch. Of the appropriations to this object he gave a detail, and declared that, while the original estimate was $258,000, the amount of the expenditure had been upwards of $450,000. There were many other works of which such statements might justly be made. Old Point Comfort, in particular, had swallowed similar sums—upwards of one million having been expended on that position. He wished to stay this system, until information could be had as to the extent to which it was to be carried, and the effect already produced by the system. Until some more definite plan was formed, Congress ought to go no further. He could not, he knew, stop the works which were already begun. His design extended, therefore, only to any new projects. He thought, with the gentleman from Maryland, that the scale on which the system was framed was altogether too magnificent. He thought the circumstances of the country did not call for this expenditure. If we were in a state of war; if the enemy were at our door, and the right bank of the Mississippi were threatened with an attack, he should be in favor of the appropriation. But not in the present state of things; especially when the report of the engineers states, that the work contemplated is not of immediate necessity. He thought that the fortifications already erected, or in progress, at New Orleans, were sufficient for the present. One of the gentlemen who had spoken on this subject had said, that we could not do too much for the defence of New Orleans. But Mr. D. considered that to expend money uselessly would be doing by far too much. He did not assent to the idea, that, by leaving this pass undefended, the defence of all the others would be useless. If all the passages to the city but this were secured, it would render the defence of this pass far easier. It was his opinion that an enemy would never pass the bar in the river Barataria; and if a fortification were ever erected there, he considered that it would only be useful as a protection to commerce. He should content himself, without further remark, and would merely call the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment.

The call for the yeas and nays having been sustained, Mr. BENTON said, that the course taken by the gentleman who had just taken his seat, seemed to him an unfair species of legislation. It appeared to him to be improper to draw parallels between different portions of the Union, while they were legislating for the safety of the whole. If such a manner of legislating were to be adopted, he believed it would rather be against the gentleman himself, as there had been more money expended on fortifications in the vicinity of his State, than in any other portion of the country. I, said Mr. BENTON, do not agree that any such principle ought to be acted upon as a set-off. No such principle could be followed up effectually, because works for the general defence were not to be charged upon the section in which they are erected. He did not look upon the works at New Orleans as erected for the defence of a single city, but to protect the property and interests of nearly one-third of the Union. They were for the defence of those people whose produce finds a market there, and whose city, in reality, New Orleans is. It resulted, then, that those fortifications were for the defence of the Valley of the Mississippi. So that it was a great mistake to suppose that they were for the protection of the city alone. It was for the protection of the property deposited there. He mentioned this, because it appeared that such opinions were entertained. The gentleman from New Jersey supposed that this work, at the mouth of the Barataria, would be unimportant. It is worthy of inquiry, in what does he consider the importance of a fortification to consist? It seems that he looks upon the height and thickness of the walls, and the number of the garrison, to be the only criterions; and because this fort is to be manned by 80 men in time of peace, and by 400 in time of war, he considers the defence of this point as altogether unimportant. But how are the works classed by the engineers? By the object to be defended, and the property to be protected. This, therefore, he puts among the first class; and he does right, because, if there is any first class of defensive works, those which protect the mouth of the Mississippi ought to be so ranked. There was no other position which combined the same considerations in favor of its entire protection. No other point was at once so important to defend, and so difficult to regain. Is it necessary, said Mr. B., at this time, to go into a historical detail, to show that strong forts have been taken by the neglect of some of the subordinate means of defence? Need we refer to Seringapatam, in India, which was reduced by an enemy following a footpath, the defence of which had been neglected? The greatest cities had been reduced by similar means. And ought we to neglect any of the practicable passes of the Mississippi? Much instruction might be gathered by a reference to the history of the late war. Was it by the Mississippi that the enemy advanced upon New Orleans? No: it was by a little channel of minor importance. Yet, New Orleans was alone protected by the bold breast of our soldiery, fighting on their native soil, for the country they loved. These minor points were not to be neglected, as, without attention to them, the most stupendous works of defence would prove futile. To this subject might be applied the saying of Lord Burleigh—that, if you take care of the pence, the pounds will take care of themselves. The great avenues, from their being the great thoroughfares, will always command attention, and be well fortified; the little ones are overlooked, and left unfortified, and through these the enemy often enters. He knew that there was great difficulty in bringing the minds of a body of civilians to embrace all the facts necessary to decide upon operations to be carried into effect at a distance of some hundreds of miles. There were historical facts to prove that the clearest directions given to individuals, having in view operations of which the best judgment could be formed on the spot, had proved altogether useless. There had been instances in which the orders of the war minister had, at the close of a victorious campaign, been returned, unopened, by the successful General, who had, when arrived upon the scene of action, wisely trusted to his own judgment for direction; while, had he followed the orders given him, total ruin would have attended the arms of his country. Prince Eugene was a memorable instance of this. He could not conceive of any thing more difficult or delicate, than for a body of civilians to undertake to decide upon the relative importance of different fortifications in preference to the recommendations of men perfectly skilled in military science and engineering. It would not do for men, under such circumstances, to allow their own opinions entirely to predominate. We must give in, somewhat, to the opinions of men conversant with these subjects.

The point now under consideration had been recommended by the engineers; men considered proficient in the science of which they were professors. As such they must be considered, as long as they were entrusted with this important duty; and to somebody it must be entrusted. By their directions, then, we must go on in this system. We act blindfold without it. Nor is it too great a confidence to place in those selected to render the information upon which Congress is to act. He hoped that the amendment would be adopted, from a conviction of its importance; for the defences of New Orleans would not be complete without the provision contemplated by it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, for the year 1828, was taken up, and an amendment, reported by the Committee on Finance, was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE moved to strike out the words "one thousand" in the 70th line of the first section, so as to make the appropriation for the expenses of Visitors at the Military Academy at West Point, $500, instead of $1,500.

On this motion a debate arose, in which Messrs. WHITE and HARRISON took part.

Mr. BRANCH moved to strike out the whole sum; which motion was debated by Messrs. CHAMBERS, JOHNSON, of Ken., CHANDLER, WHITE, SMITH, of Md., and MACON.

CLAIMS FOR SLAVES.

On motion of Mr. SEYMOUR, the bill supplementary to an act passed March, 1827, for the adjustment of claims of persons entitled to indemnification under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and for the distribution of the sums paid, and to be paid by the Government of Great Britain, under the Convention entered into between the United States and his Britannic Majesty, concluded at London, on the 13th November, 1826, was taken up, and read a second time.

The bill, which was explained by Mr. BERRIEN, proposed to extend the time at which the Commission should expire, from the close of the present session of Congress, to the first of December next, and is founded on the representation of the Agents for a large number of the claims in Georgia and Louisiana. The memorial of the Agents stated, that, after most of the claims from those States had been allowed, and seventy-five per cent. paid upon them, another class of claimants had set up claims, founded on a different description of evidence. These claimants assumed, that, having had slaves taken from the country during the war, it was to be presumed that the other points of fact were corroborative of their claims, and that the burthen of proof lay upon the other claimants, to show that these claims were not made under the provision of the Treaty. The memorial stated, that, should this novel principle be established by the decision of the Commissioners, the memorialists would need time to seek for evidence, to oppose these claims, in foreign ports; hence, an extension of the duration of the commission was asked.

Mr. TAZEWELL opposed the bill at considerable length, on the ground of its being entirely unnecessary. He thought the time allotted for the fulfilment of the duties of the commission was sufficient. Neither the claimants nor the Commissioners had stated that an extension of time was wanted. He thought, when the business could be done promptly, there was no necessity of spinning it out, that those gentlemen might enjoy their salaries from year to year, for the distribution of 1,200,000 dollars, among its just claimants. If the claimants, whose rights had not been settled, would come forward, or if the Commissioners themselves would say that the time pointed out was not sufficient, he would decide upon their statements to the best of his judgment; but while it was only on the representation of persons who had already received their share of the money, and who wished to prevent others from receiving theirs, upon which the bill was founded, he should oppose it.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that it was within his knowledge that many of the claimants were but just beginning to come before the Commissioners, and he was prepared to believe that there were many claims that could not be settled during the term, at the close of which the commission was to expire.

Mr. BERRIEN replied, at considerable length, to the remarks of Mr. TAZEWELL. It would be an extremely delicate matter for the Commissioners, who were receiving salaries for the performance of their duties, to solicit a continuation of the term of their services. The limitation fixed upon by the act to which this was supplementary, by its very terms, contemplated the probable necessity of extending the time of service of the Commissioners, as it was made to expire during the sitting of Congress, so that, if requisite, it might be prolonged. He did not think the amount of the salary was a consideration to be placed in opposition to the dispensation of justice to the various claimants, for which the commission was instituted. He then gave a history of the various transactions in relation to this object, and contended that, if the bill were not passed, that portion of claimants, whose claims had already been allowed, and who had received 75 per cent. on their respective amounts, might be deprived of the residue, by an award in favor of others, whose claims rested on evidence of a far less conclusive character. If the applicants were allowed time, he conceived that they could repel the claims of those who put the burthen of the proof upon them. He felt confident that, when such a consideration as the necessity of delay, for the purpose of giving a fair opportunity to these individuals to defend their rights, was put in the scale, the amount of salary to the commission would not be allowed to outweigh it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then moved to lay the bill upon the table, observing that he was very desirous of getting through with the appropriation bills, knowing that the War Department was suffering great inconvenience from their delay.

Mr. TAZEWELL replied, at great length, to Mr. BERRIEN.

Mr. BERRIEN again answered Mr. TAZEWELL, and differed with him, entirely, as to the character of this bill, in its relation to the duties of the Commissioners.

Mr. TAZEWELL replied, at great length.

Mr. BERRIEN explained some of his remarks, which, he conceived, had been misapprehended by Mr. TAZEWELL.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, that the interest of the citizens of Louisiana, in the bill under consideration, was his only apology for interposing between the gentlemen who had taken a part in the discussion. The question submitted to the Senate, derived particular claims to its attention, from the adverse interests of different States, the large amount of money to be distributed, the obligation of the Government to have it done according to the legal rights of the parties, and the influence which their decision on this bill will have upon the adjudication of those rights. It imposed on Congress, he thought, the necessity of doing what was necessary to do, justice between the parties—and that was the inquiry. Mr. J. said a short history of the origin, progress, and present condition, of the claims, would enable the Senate to see what justice demanded at their hands. The British Government stipulated, in the treaty of Ghent, to restore the property which she had taken during the war, and which remained in the United States at the ratification. But, in defiance of the treaty, she carried away such slaves as she had allured to her, or captured, as remained in the United States at the period of the ratification. The slaves which had been carried away before that time, were lawful prize of war, and we had no right to demand restitution. In consequence of this violation of the treaty, the United States claimed, in behalf of her citizens, an indemnity for the slaves which she had thus deported. The British Government refused to pay, on the ground that slaves were not embraced in the meaning of the treaty, and the subject was at length referred to the Emperor of Russia, who decided that the slaves that remained in the United States, at the date of the ratification of the treaty, should be paid for; and a mixed commission was established, to ascertain the number and value of the slaves which had been carried away, and to award the amount to the claimant. The Board, organized under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, met, fixed the value of the slaves, but disagreed upon every other point, until the Board was suspended, the British Commissioner refusing to proceed to the appointment of an umpire, in the mode provided in the treaty. The Government of the United States then represented the real state of the case to the British Government, and a treaty was finally concluded, by which the latter agreed to pay $1,200,000 to the United States, being 75 per cent. on the amount claimed in the definitive list, in full of all claims under this article of the treaty, which sum the Government received, and undertook to pay and distribute to the claimants on the definitive list, who were legally entitled to receive it; that is, to those whose slaves and other property was in the United States at the period fixed in the treaty, and which the British Government subsequently carried away. An act of Congress was passed at the last session, to create a Board for the adjudication of the claims, and the payment of the awards. The Board met, received evidence of the capture of the slaves, their being in the limits of the United States, at the ratification of the treaty, and upon the evidence thus produced, they decided on all claims submitted to them, and ordered 75 per cent. of the amount to be paid to each claimant, who made good his proof. The great difficulty was not in proving the loss of the slaves, but the fact that they were still in the United States, at the peace, on which fact, alone, was the indemnity due. The claimants of Louisiana, Georgia, Maryland, and a part of Virginia, established their right by competent proof, and had an award of the arbitrators. The other claimants—composed of all those who had, at any time during the war, lost slaves or other property, unable to find any evidence that their property was within the terms of the treaty, the slaves having, doubtless, been carried away during the year 1814, to the British Islands—thought of the expedient of creating a presumption, because they could get no proof, that all the slaves which the British army captured at any time during the war, remained in the country until the peace, and claiming to be all paid as if they had, like the other claimants, proved themselves within the treaty; although the fact is notorious, that many were carried away during the war, and a strong presumption that all were carried away before, because they had failed to prove they were here.

This pretension, started at the present session of Congress, and almost at the close of the term of the Board, has been answered by an able argument, and the case now stands suspended, for the decision of the Board. But, in this new and unexpected state of things, it will be seen that the prolongation of the Board, until next Fall, is essential, whatever may be the decision of the Board. If they decide that the presumption of the slaves being in the United States, is so clear and strong as to supercede the necessity of proof, it will, strange as our position will be, become our duty to prove the fact that they were actually deported, before the time, and that the British Government was not bound to pay for them. In fact, after proving our claims within the treaty, we shall be obliged to prove that the other claimants were not within the treaty. If the presumption should be rejected, as weak and improbable, the rejected parties may have an opportunity of looking further for evidence. The Government are under a solemn obligation to divide this money according to the legal rights of the parties, and to afford them a fair opportunity of procuring evidence. The point on which their cases rest is the point of time when the slaves were deported. If before the ratification, they are not entitled to indemnity. The fund is provided for that particular class whose property was not carried away, and which, therefore, ought to have been restored; and the Government is bound to see the distribution made among that class alone. The party who presents his claim under the treaty, must prove what he alleges: that is, that his property was in the United States at the peace, and had not become British property, by removal from our jurisdiction. Is it sufficient for a man to prove that he lost his negroes, during the war, to entitle him to dispense with all proof of the principal fact, to wit, the time when the negroes left the country? It was lawful to take them before the ratification; it was a wrong, and a violation of the rights of the parties, to take after they had bound themselves to restore. Now, sir, if it should be determined to let in this presumption, to establish the claims of all persons who lost property during the war, will it be too much to give the parties litigant before the Board, a short time to procure the evidence to rebut this presumption? It is enough to ask them to prove, by the strictest evidence, that they are within the terms of the treaty, and then to prove that the adverse party are not, without refusing them the necessary time to do what you require of them. The time demanded will afford full time to investigate the subject, and to procure evidence, whoever may want it, and ample justice will be done. No injustice can be done by the delay; it may result from the opposite course. Let those who really lost their property, under the treaty, by deportation after the peace, receive the indemnity which is their due, and let all the evidence be procured on the subject, and the strict legal rights of the parties be finally adjusted according to the spirit and meaning of the treaty. This question about the force of this presumption is a mere interlocutory decision on what is competent evidence. It is not contended to be final. It is, at best, like all presumptions, only sufficient to throw the burthen of proof on the opposite party—all they ask is the time to find the proof, to disprove this presumption, and to destroy its effect by proving the contrary; and, surely, we cannot, with any appearance of justice, refuse the time. Dauphin Island, said Mr. J., which has been alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, was a part of the United States, and so determined by the American Commission, and since by the Board; but that is a subject of political law, which belongs to the sovereign power to decide.

Mr. J. concluded that great injustice might be done to the bona fide claimants, under the treaty, if the Board was obliged to decide without evidence.

Mr. HAYNE remarked, that he was a member of the committee which had reported this bill, and he was convinced that the object of the Commission, which was to distribute fairly and equitably the sum paid by Great Britain for deported slaves, under the first article of the Treaty at Ghent, could not be carried into effect, without the prolongation of the term of its duties, proposed by this bill. He had supposed, when the bill came up, that it could not be effectually acted upon to-day. But it had been debated to so late an hour, that he thought it would be economy of time to decide it now.

Mr. WHITE then moved to lay the bill on the table, remarking that the Commissioners had met within a few days, and might decide the question on which the bill was predicated, before the close of the session; and should the decision be such that the bill would not be required, it might be dropped; on the other hand, if the decision should be such as to make this provision necessary, the bill could be taken up and passed.

Mr. COBB said that it was impossible to surmise when the decision of the Commissioners would be pronounced; and suggested that the bill might, by the course proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, be so delayed, as to prevent its passage this session.

Mr. MACON thought there was no reason for acting hastily on the bill, as it was probable that Congress would remain in session for two months longer at least. His friend from Georgia knew how quick a bill could be run through when a majority was in favor of it. He thought there would be no danger that the bill would not be acted upon, if it should be found necessary.

Mr. WHITE added a few words in support of his motion, which he renewed. The question being taken upon it; the Senate divided, and it was rejected, Ayes 16, Noes, 20.

Mr. HAYNE hoped the bill would now be acted upon. He thought its passage would be jeopardized by any further delay.

Mr. WHITE said, that he wished it might be understood by the claimants, that no further extension of time was to be allowed. He wished that the time might not expire during the next session of Congress, and, therefore moved, that the words "1st of December" be struck out, and "1st November" be substituted.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that, as it might be necessary to seek the evidence required, in England, the period had been fixed upon, in order to enable those who sought it, to avail themselves of the Fall packets. In this case, the intelligence would be received about the first of November; and after that period, a time would be required to enable the Commissioners to act upon the evidence obtained.

Mr. WHITE then withdrew his first motion, and substituted another, which was assented to by Mr. BERRIEN, making the term of the Commission expire on the 30th of November, instead of the 1st of December, and which was agreed to.

Some further conversation took place between Messrs. BERRIEN and TAZEWELL.

Mr. ROBBINS observed, that he had been absent during the debate upon the bill, and desired to be excused from voting, which was agreed to.

The question then occurring on engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was decided in the affirmative, (Mr. TAZEWELL having called for the yeas and nays,) by the following vote :

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Cobb, Ellis, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnston, of Louisiana, Noble, Rugles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Maryland, Thomas, Webster, Williams.—23.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1828.

VISITERS AT WEST POINT.

The unfinished business of Tuesday was taken up, being the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1828 ; the motion of Mr. BRANCH, to strike out the appropriation of 1,500 dollars for the expenses of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, being under consideration—

Mr. HARRISON made some explanations, as to the comparative expenditure of former years and the present time. He said that, formerly, very little else but the transportation of the baggage of officers was subject of charge, on account of this visitation. As civilians had latterly been chosen as the Visitors, and some of them residing at a great distance, the payment of their travelling expenses had swelled the amount to the sum at present required.

Mr. CHAMBERS remarked that the expenditures had hitherto been paid out of the contingent fund, but had now swelled to an amount sufficiently large to require a specific appropriation ; and the Secretary had very properly referred the matter to Congress.

Mr. HARRISON added, if this appropriation were refused, there could be no Visitors to the Academy, as it could not be supposed that private individuals would pay their own expenses, while on a duty to which they were called by the Government.

Mr. WHITE said that his chief objection to the appropriation was, that there was no law creating the officers to whom it was paid. He knew of no law which created such an officer as a Visitor of the West Point Academy, and he considered that, when any office or commission became sufficiently important to be provided for by a distinct item in an appropriation bill, it ought to be supported by the authority of law. The expense for this object had swelled from 200 to upwards of 2,000 dollars, and had, therefore, become an item worthy of attention. Until the law appointed the officers, explained the duties, and fixed the manner and rate of their compensation, there ought to be no specific appropriation for the purpose. If this provision was stricken out, it would not have the effect of preventing the visitation, as the matter would remain as it was before. It was in the power of the Department to send Visitors, and it might be done as before. The sum, while a small one, had been paid out of the contingent fund, and if the present motion prevailed, it would remain, as in times past, in the character of an incidental expenditure, the contingent fund being the same sum as formerly. These were the reasons why he should vote for striking out the whole sum.

Mr. NOBLE spoke at great length in opposition to the motion. It had been stated, he said, that, from the beginning, the appointing and paying the Visitors to the Military Academy was an assumption of power. If it was so, Congress had to complain of itself. The power had been employed for years, and must have been within the knowledge of Congress. Why, then, if it was an assumption of power, had not Congress interposed to prevent its continuance ? It had also been said, that a system of favoritism was practised at the Academy ; and he had heard of well-born sons being preferred to others. If such was the case, he wished another resolution might be introduced, to inquire who created the system of favoritism. It would be found that members of Congress were at the bottom of it. They ought not to shield themselves. Call for the names, said Mr. N., of those who have recommended cadets, and you will find that members of Congress have had more to do with this scandal about well-born sons than any one else. It ought to be inquired into, and this imputation not allowed to go out to the People, to create a prejudice against the Administration. He spoke in high terms of the character of the Secretary of War. If this appropriation was thrown out, it would not have the effect which gentlemen supposed. It would not be as it was formerly. It would show the Secretary that this was an expenditure which Congress did not approve, because it was not in the spirit of retrenchment, of which they had heard so much. This was one of the continual and continued attempts to put down the present Administration, which he believed to be the best in the known world. If the gentleman from Tennessee complained of the amount of expense for this visitation, he could inform him that the most expensive Board of Visitors had been that over which the present Governor of Tennessee presided. That gentleman had thought it his province to give dinners, for which Mr. N. did not blame him, but only mentioned it to show who encouraged the extravagance, if such it was to be considered, of the Visitors of West Point. He should go for the whole appropriation, and regretted that the motion had been made, because it might be construed as a reflection upon the present incumbent of the War Department.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the contingent fund of the War Department had uniformly been 10,000 dollars, and the expenses of the Visitors had been paid out of it. The sum for their expenses had of late years become so large, that the Secretary thought it had better be supplied by specific appropriation. He had asked for 3,000 dollars, but the other House had cut it down to 1,500. The Secretary had also asked for 15,000 dollars for the contingent fund. The House had reduced that sum to 10,000 dollars. If, now, this provision were denied, and the Secretary were to pay the Visitors out of the contingent fund, it would be reduced to 7,000 dollars. Whether this would be sufficient provision for the contingent expenses of the year, he did not know.

Mr. CHANDLER observed that he had at first been in favor of making and retaining 500 dollars for this purpose ; but, under the consideration that these officers were not appointed by law, he should vote for the present motion. The Secretary would be able to meet the necessities of the institution by appointing a smaller number of Visitors, and by calling in more military men.

Mr. WHITE replied to Mr. NOBLE. If a gentleman from his State was a President of the Board on a former occasion, and gave dinners there, it did not alter his view of the case. If that species of civility had been practised, and it was the desire of his brother officers, Mr. W. saw nothing to object to it. It mattered not to him whence the members of the Board came. He went on a different principle altogether. If every member came from his own State, unless the law appointed them, he should be equally against an appropriation bill which provided for their compensation.

Visitors at West Point.

[SENATE.]

Mr. HARRISON differed from the gentleman from Maryland. If the motion prevailed, there would be no visits hereafter. The Secretary would properly conclude that the plan met the disapproval of Congress, and they would probably be altogether abolished. As to the supposition that the selection of Visitors was not authorized by law, it was erroneous, as the Secretary of War had the authority to appoint the Visitors, and Congress, in making the appropriation, would give it the sanction of law. This was not an incidental expense, but one that was called for yearly. If Congress disapproved of the plan, it ought to be abolished altogether; and he doubted not that would be the consequence. As to the Military Academy, although he was not convinced that its plan was the best, it was like a standing Army—a necessary evil—as it was impossible that we could cope with European skill, without scientific officers. If the Academy was an institution with which we could not safely dispense, every means ought to be taken to make it useful, and to contribute to its proper management. In this point of view the Board of Visitors was of important service; and he hoped the provision for it would not be stricken out.

Mr. KANE expressed himself a strong advocate of the Military Academy, and was impressed with a belief in the advantage of the Board of Visitors. The power to appoint them was not granted by law, but by implication; and was a part of the prerogative of the Secretary of War. He was called on, however, to vote in the dark on this motion; as he had not been informed by the Chairman of the Finance Committee, in whose statements he always put great confidence, whether the sum proposed by the bill for this purpose, might, or might not, be taken from the contingent fund. He should, under his present view of the matter, rather vote against the appropriation, and allow the Secretary of War to pay the Visitors from the contingent fund.

Mr. BENTON said, he was indifferent as to the event of the motion. He disagreed as to the effect anticipated from it by the gentleman from Ohio. He had examined the statement of the sums which had been, in past years, expended for this object, and he divided the different sums, for nine years, into three averages. That for the first three years was 274 dollars per annum; that for the second term, 338 dollars; and that for the last three years was 1956 dollars. He thought the appointment of Visitors necessary; but he thought a sum was preferable which should be a medium between the first and the second term. He should, therefore, vote for striking out, not intending, thereby, to oppose the continuance of the visits, or sufficient appropriations.

Mr. KING said, that he intended to vote against the motion, and he would give the reason. He approved the visits; thought the President had the power of appointing the Visitors, and, that while the expense was kept within proper bounds, there was no necessity for a special appropriation. The practice of sending Visitors was authorized by the custom in appointing officers to examine the Land Offices, and to examine the business of collections. He thought the sum ought to be fixed specifically, and the Secretary would act accordingly. As the question was, whether the appropriation should be struck out, and the matter left to the discretion of the Secretary, or a specific sum be fixed upon, he was against the former; but was desirous that the proper sum should be fixed by law.

Mr. McLANE rose to ask for information, as to the reasons for the increase of this expenditure, of the Chairman of the Committee on Finance. He was in favor of the examinations of the Military Academy, but was far from being satisfied that this appropriation was necessary. As far as he had received information, the appropriation was altogether too large. It was difficult to account for the augmentation of the expense which had grown up from year to year. He wished to know why the sum for this expenditure should be greater in 1826 than it was in 1825. He thought if the contingent fund could supply this fund formerly, it could now be drawn from the same source. He would also ask the Chairman of the Committee of Finance, on what ground 15,000 dollars were asked by the Secretary of War, as a contingent fund, and 3,000 for this purpose—thus swelling the demand of the Department to 18,000 dollars. He merely rose to ask for information on these heads.

Mr. PARRIS observed, that one reason for the increase of the expense of Visitors at the Academy, arose from the fact, that it was formerly merely a school for Military practice, and none but military men were needed to be chosen as visitors. But latterly, the Academy has been also devoted to general education, requiring the examination of scientific and literary, as well as military men. These individuals had been chosen from various parts of the country, and some of them from the most distant States.

Mr. HAYNE said, that there was another fact, which seemed to him important. Last year the contingent fund of the War Department was 10,000 dollars, and out of it the expenses of the Visitors were paid. He wished to know why there must also be 1,500 dollars. If he could be told why the contingent expenses should be greater this year than last, he would vote for it, but not otherwise.

Mr. CHAMBERS made some further remarks, and read a letter of the Secretary of War, detailing the causes of the change in the system of visitation. Strong prejudices had formerly been felt against the Academy, and it was thought expedient to select the Visitors from the different States. Mr. C. said, the Secretary had not anticipated the payment of this sum out of the contingent fund, and the inevitable consequence of rejecting this appropriation would be, that no Visitors would be sent to the Academy.

Mr. HAYNE did not anticipate that the refusal of this appropriation would have the effect to abolish the visitation. It would merely restore it to its former state, as other expenses had been paid out of the contingent fund last year. He objected to voting for any appropriation, without knowing the reason; and he had heard no cause for this additional demand.

Mr. HARRISON remarked, that if this provision was stricken out, there would be no means for defraying the expense of the Board of Visitors.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that, for a series of years, the contingent fund had been $10,000. Why a larger sum had been asked this year he did not know. It was true, as the gentleman from South Carolina had said, that the expense of the Visitors had hitherto been paid out of the contingent fund; but the Secretary now says, that if this sum is not granted, he cannot defray it from that source.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that the question was, whether the Senate would appropriate $11,500 instead of $10,000, without information as to the cause of this increase of expenditure.

Mr. NOBLE made a few remarks, when the question being taken on the motion to strike out the appropriation, it was rejected.

Mr. WHITE then renewed his motion to strike out "1,000," so as to reduce the sum to $500, and the question being taken, was decided in the negative.

Mr. COBB moved to amend the 1st section of the bill, by striking out 10,000 dollars, (the contingent fund,) and insert 8,500 dollars.

Mr. KING said, if the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw his motion, he would move to reconsider the vote on striking out the whole appropriation; having voted for that motion, he would remark, that he did it with the hope that a smaller sum would be fixed upon. That not having been done, he chose rather to strike out the whole, than vote for the sum of 1,500 dollars.

Mr. NOBLE opposed the motion.

Mr. CHAMBERS called for the yeas and nays, and the question being taken, the motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. COBB then renewed his motion, upon which some discussion occurred.

Mr. HARRISON moved to commit the bill to the Military Committee, that the Secretary of War might be called on for information.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, thought it ought to go back to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., observed, that he presumed the information could be had as to the former disposal of the contingent fund; but as to any estimates of its prospective application, it was not probable any information could be obtained, as the very signification of contingent expenses was, that those expenses were unexpected, and such as could not be provided for by a specific appropriation.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. COBB and McLANE, Mr. HARRISON withdrew his motion.

FRIDAY, MARCH 7, 1828.

[The Senate was principally occupied, this day, in the discussion of a private bill.]

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1828.

OFFICE OF MAJOR-GENERAL, &c.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the resolution referred to that Committee, on the 29th February, authorizing an inquiry into the expediency of abolishing the office of Major-General in the United States' Army, accompanied by a resolution, that the abolition of said office was not expedient.

The report was read, on motion of Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made some remarks upon a portion of the report, relative to Brevet rank. He observed that, on this head, the inclination of the Senate, he thought, might be misconceived.

Mr. HARRISON said, that the Committee had, as far as possible, followed the directions given by the Senate, on referring the resolution. They had been instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Major-General, and, also, whether those next in rank should be deprived of the Brevet promotion.

Mr. CHANDLER made some remarks, which were heard indistinctly.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed, that he did not wish to have the opinion go abroad, that the Senate felt a disposition to abolish Brevet rank. He thought such a conclusion would be formed, were the report, in its present shape, to go the public. He, therefore, moved to strike out that portion of the report which relates to the Brevet rank of officers claiming promotion.

That portion of the report was again read.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that it appeared somewhat strange that such difficulty was found in understanding the resolution, when it was not only so perfectly plain in itself, but had been so fully explained.

Mr. HARRISON said that he believed the gentleman from Maine had never entertained the design of striking off the Brevet rank. But the Committee was called upon to give an opinion upon the whole subject. He did not know whether the gentleman from Maryland understood the matter as he did—but it certainly was contended, when the reference of the resolution was discussed, that one Brigadier-General was sufficient in our peace establishment. The question presented to the Committee was, what would be the effect of abolishing the office of Major-General? They were of opinion that, if the office lately filled by Major-General Brown were to be abolished, a similar rank would be assumed by the Major-General by Brevet, next in rank, by force of the regulations by which the army was governed. He looked upon this result as inevitable. Therefore, the Committee considered that, in being called upon to pass upon the expediency of abolishing the office of Major-General, involved the necessity, also, to consider the effect of abolishing the rank of Brevet Major-General. The Senator from Maine did not express the objections which he had now conceived, against the report, in the Committee room, this morning, where it was read in his presence, although he had objected to the conclusion arrived at by the Committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, did not assent to the opinion, that, if the office of Major-General were abolished, we should still have two Major-Generals in our army. There was inconsistency in the very idea. He contended that, if the office was abolished, the two Brevet Major-Generals would enjoy the rank of Brigadiers, only—not Major-Generals. He did not like the idea of pulling down every thing; nor did he wish that the public should be under the impression that it was the design of the Senate to abolish Brevet rank, and, for this reason, he hoped the passage to which he had alluded, might be stricken out.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that it was true, as stated by the Chairman of the Military Committee, that he had heard the report read in the Committee room, and did not then disagree to it. But it was because he had not seen its bearings in the same light as at present. He had said, on a former occasion, that our army did very well with but one Brigadier-General: but he did not, thereby, imply that Brevet rank ought to be abolished.

Mr. BENTON said, he wished the gentleman from Maryland would consent to modify his motion, so as to allow the report to be recommitted, generally, to the Military Committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. acceded to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HARRISON said, that, having heard no objection to this motion, he should not oppose it. He would merely say, that the gentleman from Maryland and himself were entirely at issue. He contended that, by law, there were two Major-Generals in the line, and that, if the office held by General Brown were abolished, the first in rank of those two officers might claim the station to-morrow. He did not see how the gentleman could get rid of the fact, that there were, at this moment, two Major-Generals in the service, receiving the pay and emoluments of the station, and considered universally as such.

Mr. CHANDLER said, he would merely point out to the gentleman from Ohio the effect of his doctrine, if it should be correct. Suppose the President of the United States should appoint a civilian to the office—does he contend that Generals Gaines and Scott could take a command superior to the individual appointed?

Mr. HARRISON answered, readily, that, if a civilian were appointed to-morrow, the first in rank of those Generals would have a legal right to supersede that individual.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said: And I say, promptly, if he dared to do it, and I were the Major-General appointed, I would have him put under arrest for his presumption.

The motion to recommit was then adopted.

Mr. EATON observed, that he had long considered something necessary to be done on this question; and since the subject, generally, was before the Committee of Military Affairs, he would submit the following resolutions :

Resolved, That the Secretary of War inform the Senate of the amount of money that has been paid to the officers of the Army, during the year 1827, on account of Brevet rank, and which they would not have been entitled to receive, if not from that Brevet rank.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the propriety and necessity of so amending the existing law, as to restrain Brevet appointments in the line and staff of the Army, on account of ten years' service in the same grade, and to prohibit the giving a second Brevet to any officer, where a previous Brevet has been had.

Resolved, That the said Committee inquire if, on Court Martials, and on command upon separate detachments, Lineal and Brevet rank cannot be better ascertained, and with greater certainty defined, that thereby collisions may be prevented.

CLAIMS OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the adjustment of the claims of the State of South Carolina, against the Government of the United States.

The report of the Military Committee on that subject, having been read, at the request of Mr. HAYNE,

Mr. HARRISON, (Chairman of the Committee,) briefly explained the merits of the bill. The report just read, said he, had gone so extensively into the subject, that it was hardly necessary for him to enter on it at large. The account upon which the claim of South Carolina was predicated, contained a great many items; the principle of which, having been allowed by the General Government, put the subject of interest entirely at rest; there being no question but that, on the money actually allowed, and paid to the State, interest was justly due. The cases of Virginia and Pennsylvania, who had been allowed interest by Congress for advances made by them, were somewhat different in detail, though not in principle. South Carolina had entered into these expenses for the defence of the country, without having any previous bargain with the General Government. Virginia and Pennsylvania, upon a call made upon their patriotism, borrowed money from the Banks, which they expended in the service of the country, and it was because interest had been paid by them, for the sums so borrowed, that interest was allowed them on their advances.

The case of South Carolina was nearly similar to that of those two States. She did not borrow the money, to be sure, which she advanced; but she had a fund producing an interest of 12 per cent. per annum, which, without any hesitation, she appropriated, when danger threatened. The Committee were therefore of opinion, that equal justice ought to be meted to the State of South Carolina, which had been meted to Virginia and Pennsylvania, the actual loss of interest being the same, in effect, as the actual payment of interest. In relation to another item of the account, viz: for cannon-balls furnished by the State, it was necessary, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that the balls should be procured at all events. The General Government was unable to furnish them, and they were cast at the expense of the State. The enemy not having made the expected attack, they remained until the close of the war, and then the Government refused to receive them, because they had not been made of the proper size. Another item was for the transportation of baggage, which had been rejected, because it had been customary to allow more than eight wagons to a regiment. Without their having the means of ascertaining how many wagons were necessary, in the peculiar case of the State of S. C., whether eight or nine, the Committee could see no reason why she should not be allowed this item as well as for the cannon-balls, since she had actually expended the money in both cases. He had seen operations where 40 wagons would hardly be sufficient for a regiment. There were some other small items, said Mr. H. and one of $ — for blankets. With regard to this last, he would observe that the troops of the State had been called out in a very inclement season, and the State, finding that blankets were absolutely necessary, had furnished them. The Committee, however, not finding any precedent for an allowance of this kind, did not think proper to sanction it.

Mr. CHANDLER wished the State of South Carolina to receive the same justice which had been granted to other States, and no more. He was not well informed what had been allowed in other cases; but, from what he did understand, in this case it appeared that the State of S. C. had a fund vested in bank stock, which, without having been called on by the United States, she expended in her own defence. He objected to the claim for pay of the staff officers, as he believed it had never been the practice of the Government to allow pay to officers of a State to carry on its own operations. With respect to the charge made for cannon-balls, the State, he said, had the strongest motive to place herself in an attitude of defence, and was therefore perfectly right in procuring those balls. She had them on hand at the close of the war, and if they did not answer the calibre of the United States, and did that of South Carolina, she ought to have retained them for purposes of her own defence. As to wagons, he believed the rule had been to allow them in reason. If any State had been allowed as many as South Carolina charged for, he should not be disposed to object to the allowance. Whatever had been the custom, in similar cases, he was disposed to accede to, in the present one.

Mr. HAYNE entered into the merits of this bill much at large; exhibiting in a clear and strong point of view, the justice of the claim, which the State he represented in part has upon the General Government. Mr. H. showed that South Carolina was in an exposed state, and that when the enemy were hovering on the coast, and the General Government without money or arms, that she came forward without asking terms, and took the money which she had vested in bank, yielding her 12 per cent. on every dollar, and loaned it to the Federal Government. Mr. H. answered all the several inquiries and suggestions made in relation to this business; showing the conduct of his State, as at once disinterested, patriotic, and worthy of imitation.

Mr. RUGGLES said he was not satisfied to pass the bill in its present shape; though he would not object to it, if it were worded in the same manner as the bills passed for the benefit of the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, and New York: because, by all those States the money advanced had been actually borrowed and the interest paid by them. He thought there was a distinction between the cases of those States, and that of the State of South Carolina. The fund expended by the State of South Carolina was, in her own hands, precisely in the same situation as if remaining in her Treasury; and where a State advanced funds for her own defence, out of money actually in her Treasury, he did not believe she had any just claim for interest. The repayment of the principal, said Mr. R. had generally been considered a sufficient allowance. Whenever a State expended funds of this description, it was for the defence of her own soil; all the States had a common interest with the General Government to defend their own firesides, and therefore ought not to require interest on money so expended. Mr. R. here read, in illustration, the law passed in favor of the State of Virginia, to shew that it was only on account of the money advanced by her, having been actually borrowed, and interest paid; that interest had been allowed her. It was on this very principle, said he, that the laws passed in favor of the State of Virginia, and the other States just mentioned, were so guarded that no interest was to be paid them except where they had been actually under the necessity of borrowing money and paying interest. Before he sat down, he would move to amend the bill by striking out the first and second sections.

Mr. RUGGLES was followed by Mr. CHAMBERS, in opposition to the amendment, and in support of the bill.

Mr. COBB said, before he voted, he would make one inquiry of the advocates of the bill. He understood that the State had accumulated a fund of half a million of dollars which she invested in the stock of a bank; the whole of which stock was held by herself. Now, he wished to know whether the advances made, had been made out of the capital of that bank, or out of the promissory notes issued by it.

Mr. HAYNE said, he would endeavour to answer the inquiry made by the gentleman from Georgia, though he confessed it would be with some difficulty. The State, before the war, had accumulated a fund of half a million of dollars, which, as the gentleman very correctly stated, had been invested in the stock of a bank wholly owned by herself. In that bank were deposited all the sums of money received by the State, whether for interest accruing on her stocks or for taxes; and from its vaults was drawn every dollar advanced to the United States, and every dollar disbursed for the current expenses of the State. Now, Sir, said Mr. H. the only way of answering the gentleman is to ascertain whether the expenses of the State exceeded the amount received for interests and taxes; and if such was the fact, the money was actually drawn from the capital of the bank. This was the only answer he was able to give the gentleman.

Mr. HAYNE here made a brief reply to Mr. RUGGLES. The gentlemen from Ohio, said he, had alluded to the precedent established in the case of the State of Virginia. Mr. H. contended, that the case now before the Senate depended upon the same principle as that of the State of Virginia. That State had been allowed interest, because the advance made by her had cost her interest; and it is proposed here to allow S. Carolina interest, because the advance made by her, had likewise cost her interest. The principle was precisely the same. In the one case, Virginia had actually paid interest on money borrowed; and in the other, South Carolina had lost the interest she was actually receiving. The case of South Carolina was even stronger than that of Virginia—the loss of Virginia having been only six per cent, while that of South Carolina had been twelve.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. spoke briefly in support of the bill, and in opposition to the amendment. In cases of war and great national calamity where advances had been made by a State predicated upon the inability of the General Government, he was not only in favor of paying to such State the advances made, but also of paying interest on them.

Mr. M'LANE was of opinion that the case before the Senate was a very important one, and he agreed with the gentleman from Ohio, that it demanded the greatest consideration. But he disagreed with the conclusions drawn by that gentleman in regard to it. The State of South Carolina, said Mr. M'L. was entitled, on every principle of equity and justice, to receive the amount claimed by her. A distinction had been drawn between the debts due by the United States to individuals, and to States; and to individuals, interest is not allowed by the government on the amount found to be due them. What is the principle, he asked, on which interest is refused to individuals? It is one to which he could not subscribe, though the precedent had become so strong as not now to be shaken. It is refused to individuals, said he, on the principle that the government is always prepared to pay them their just demands, and therefore, ought not to be bound to pay interest on money waiting their disposal.

But that principle did not apply to advances made by States to aid the public exigencies of the country, when the General Government was unable to provide for that particular exigency. The principle, said Mr. M'L. has already been established, that States should be allowed interest on the advances made by them for the service of the General Government. Here, then, was a strong case of that kind. Money had actually been advanced by the State of South Carolina, for the use of the General Government. Wherein, he asked, did this case differ from those of the States of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New York, as argued by the Senator from Ohio? It was the duty of the United States to have performed those services, and made those advances, made and performed by those States; having neglected so to do, those States stepped forward and made the advances required; and were paid, not only the sums so advanced by them, but the interest on the money they had borrowed for that purpose. Now, Sir, we have adopted the principle, that wherever a State has paid interest on such advance made by it, the interest is part of the advance made; and it is on this principle that the State of South Carolina should be paid for the loss incurred by her, for her loss has been twelve per cent interest, while she claims but six. The fact of the State's having advanced a particular stock fund, instead of money, was no argument to his mind, why the interest should not be paid. Suppose, said Mr. M'LANE, a State holds stock on which she is receiving interest. If she borrows money, and holds her stock, it is admitted she ought to be paid; but if she sells her stock, and advances the money, interest is refused her. This was a doctrine he could not agree to. Is not the loss of the State the same, whether that loss was occasioned by interest actually paid by her, or by the deprivation of interest which she was actually receiving? If an individual, said Mr. M'L. advances Bank stock for another, will not the chancellor award him the full amount of his loss? If he sells his stock, and advances the money, is not the case the same? On every principle of equity and justice, the present claim ought to be allowed. Treat it as interest paid—treat it as interest lost—treat it as a loss either way, and he did not see how payment could be avoided. In a case of this kind, he would make complete and full indemnity, and the government never can, said he, place itself in a stronger attitude, than to say to those States, who are the first to encounter the shock of calamity, if you will voluntarily step forward for the defence of the country, you shall not be placed in a worse situation.

Mr. SMITH, of Md. followed Mr. M'LANE at length in support of the bill; when

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. rose to make a short reply to the objections made by the Senator from Ohio, one of which was that the State of South Carolina had expended the money advanced by her for her own benefit, and therefore ought not to be paid the amount she claims. I am sure, said Mr. S. in that part of the gentleman's argument, he had not attended sufficiently to the subject. By the Constitution of the United States, the General Government was bound to defend every State in the Union, not only from real, but from apparent danger. It will be recollected, said Mr. S. that when the British fleet sailed to New Orleans, it was the general opinion that Charleston was the point intended to be attacked by them; and this being the general opinion, it was absolutely necessary to put the State in some posture of defence. Then it being the duty of the General Government to defend the State, and being unable, neglected to do so, the General Government was bound on every principle of justice to pay the interest, and pay the principal sum, expended by the State, for her own defence. How, asked he, are gentlemen to distinguish between money advanced by the State of South Carolina, and other States who have paid? Are we now to be called upon at the distance of fourteen years to tell you in what particular bills this money was paid? This was not, in his opinion, a period to give such information—the contest ended in eighteen hundred and fourteen, and the first money refunded to the State was in the year 1821. But we have been told, you have protected yourselves by the money you have expended, and therefore have no claim for interest. Sir, said he, this is an argument which ought never to be heard on this floor. While this confederacy lasts, let us protect each member of it, unless you are disposed to dissolve the Union, and let each State protect itself.

The State of South Carolina, said Mr. SMITH, had, with her own capital, established a Bank, and from that Bank, all her resources were drawn. From that Bank, she not only made the advances to the General Government upon which her present claim is predicated, but also paid her proportion of the tax for the support of the war. She never permitted a tax to be collected within her limits, through the agency of the officers of the General Government. The moment her quota of the direct tax was ascertained, she asked no questions, but ordered the amount to be paid out of her public Treasury—from that very Bank out of which she made the advances to the General Government. Is it not monstrous, then, said Mr. S. to be asked at this period, did you pay specie? Did you sell stock, or, in what manner did you expend this money? There was no principle in private life, that would, for a moment, admit of a contest like this. Is not then a contest between the General Government and a State, and between individuals, the same? Where was the possible distinction, asked Mr. S. between the cases of the States of Virginia and South Carolina? Virginia, it seems, went to a bank and borrowed money; South Carolina advanced a fund already in her own possession, by which she was deprived of interest actually accruing to her: and now, after the United States have had the benefit of this fund for eight years, we are told, because no precedent can be found in the case of Virginia, interest is to be refused to S. Carolina. The State of South Carolina has demonstrated that the advances for which she claims interest, were drawn from a fund for which she received more interest, than was paid by the State of Virginia, and for which Virginia was remunerated; the bills of the bank never having depreciated in her own State, nor in any other State of the Union. The State had always been ready to redeem those bills—they were, in fact, as current as gold and silver. The State of South Carolina, said he, can no doubt do without the sum claimed. But if the claim is founded upon those principles which regulate the intercourse of one man with another, and between an individual and the Government, she ought to be paid. She did not ask it as a favor, but demanded it as a right.

After some further debate, in which the bill was advocated by Messrs. HAYNE and SMITH of South Carolina, and opposed by Messrs. COBB, CHANDLER, and FOOT; the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. RUSSELL, and lost.

TUESDAY, MARCH 11, 1828.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the resolutions submitted by him yesterday, were taken up separately, and agreed to.

CLAIMS OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up, being the bill to remunerate the State of South Carolina for certain disbursements during the late war.

Mr. HAYNE moved a modification of the amendment offered yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER, so as to provide for giving up to the United States the cannon balls not expended. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine directed the Secretary of War to make a new bargain, and he would probably fix upon the present price of the articles as the rate of purchase. The bill provided for the payment to the State of South Carolina, of the price which they cost at the time they were purchased. He understood the object of the gentleman from Maine to be, that the property might be received by the United States. The proviso which he [Mr. H.] now offered, would secure this object.

Mr. CHANDLER made some remarks, but was not understood as having assented to the modification. The question being then taken, Mr. CHANDLER'S motion to amend was rejected.

The question on the proviso offered by Mr. HAYNE was then put, and it was adopted.

The bill having been reported to the Senate, Mr. COBB observed, that he would renew the motion made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out the first and second sections of the bill, [providing for the payment of interest on the money applied by the State of South Carolina to the public service.]

The question on this motion being taken, it was negatived.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HOUR OF MEETING.

The resolution, submitted several days since, by Mr. KING, to fix the hour of meeting at 11 o'clock for the residue of the session, was taken up.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, would ask what gentlemen expected to gain by this measure. Some of the Senators might feel able to increase the hours of sitting; but he thought five hours spent in debate was sufficient, and as much as was consistent with the other duties which they had to perform. He belonged to a committee which met twice a week; and even now they were often summoned to their seats from the committee room, before they had completed the business under their consideration. If gentlemen thought they did not stay late enough in the Senate Chamber, they might make the adjournment later.

Mr. KING said, that four-fifths of the business consisted of general orders, which were, by a rule of the Senate, to be acted upon before 1 o'clock—and often only from fifteen minutes to half an hour could be devoted to them. Whereas, if the Senate met at 11 o'clock, an hour and a half could be employed in considering the general orders, which comprised some bills of importance. He had no greater desire to labor beyond a reasonable time, than any other gentleman. As to the business of the committees, it was mostly over for the session. They could not originate any new business with a reasonable hope that it would be acted upon by both Houses.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, advocated the resolution. He had rather come at an earlier hour, than spend the time in lounging about to no profit, as the morning was the best part of the day for transacting business.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, that the Committee of Finance, to which he belonged, had two-thirds of the bills under examination that came from the other House. He came immediately after his breakfast to the committee room, and was often called into the Senate before he left it. Besides, human beings wanted a little time for eating, and a little for sleeping. He knew that the gentleman from Kentucky had been many years in Congress; he knew, also, the vigor of his mind—but some others might not be equal to him. Besides the business of the Senate Chamber, and of the committees, there were documents daily laid upon the tables of the Senators, many of which it was their duty to read. If the time of sitting was to be increased, some of these duties must be neglected. If the committee, and the Printer, were discharged, so that there should be no more documents, he would vote for the proposition, and meet at any time the Senate might please. The other House had shewn the inutility of changing the hour, and had, after a few days' experience, found it advisable to go back to twelve o'clock.

Mr. BENTON did not think the meetings of the Committee of Finance, twice a week, a sufficient reason for rejecting this motion. The members of the committee might be excused from serving in the Senate Chamber until 12 o'clock, and no bill would be put on its final passage previous to that hour. It seemed to be the general opinion that five hours was as long as they ought to sit. As to the length of time, he considered that it would be the same in the one case as in the other. If they met an hour earlier, they would adjourn an hour earlier. On the contrary, if they met an hour later, the adjournment would be protracted an hour. It was similar to the difference in individuals—one poured a little wine into his glass, and drank the whole, while another filled his glass to the brim, and sipped but little. There was a great portion of trifling business which must either be done in the early part of the day or be neglected. This business, although of a minor kind, was of more or less importance. They were chiefly local bills—the Old States were but little interested in them—but they were of great moment to the New States. The Government was the great landholder in those States, and the number of land bills was very great. Of the whole number of bills passed last year—say, in round numbers, 150—fifty relates to the New States. For those States, Congress, to a great extent, might be considered the local legislature, and there was, therefore, a great quantity of local business which ought to be done, which could be matured before 12 o'clock, and which would not absolutely require the presence of all the Senators.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, did not see how Congress had more to do with the New than the Old States; and, for one, said Mr. S. should wish to be present when these bills are acted upon. He was not at all pleased with the idea of being shut up in a committee room—and he doubted whether any gentleman would willingly be stowed away in this manner, while the Senate was proceeding in the business, which it was his duty to examine, in order to enable them to get to their wine in good season.

The question being then taken on the resolution, it was agreed to.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill making provision for compensation to certain Surviving Officers of the Revolution. The motion to amend, reported by the committee, to fill the blank in the bill with the sum of $1,100,000, being before the Senate—

Mr. HARRISON addressed the Senate at great length in its support, and in reply to the observations of several gentlemen, who, during the former debates, opposed the motion.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Rhode Island, said this case seems to labor most on the point of legal obligations; if this is not established, nor to be established, I should despair of the claim being carried. In that case, indeed, I am not prepared to say it ought to be carried; for, in common with other gentlemen, I doubt if any other ground, per se, would warrant the appropriation. Indeed the petitioners, themselves, rest their claims on the legal obligation entirely. If that is not established, nor to be established, they make no claim upon us, for they ask nothing of the national gratitude. On this ground they are silent, and forever will be. In this they display all the goodness of noble minds; for though it is noble to confer obligations, it is still nobler not to make any claim upon them, and nobler still never to mention them. But, let me remark, here, that however noble it is in the benefactor never to remember, it is equally noble in the party benefitted, never to forget the obligation. A few words, however, and but a few, on this question of legal obligation.

It does appear to me clearly that a special contract made with these petitioners has been violated, and to their injury, for which they have a legal title to indemnification. It is to my surprise that the fact should appear otherwise, to other minds, and such minds too—minds who command all my respect; for, if, waiving the question, whether the commutation was or was not adequate to the annuities in point of value; and, waiving, too, the question, whether the commutation was or was not assented to by the officers, in a manner to be binding upon them—if we look at the commutation act, and see what was to be given, and then at the final settlement, and see what was given, and compare the two things—not in kind, for they were different in kind—but in value—and it would seem to me impossible to say that that promise was performed, or that the non performance was not an injury, or that the injury did not constitute a legal title to indemnification.

Now what was given on that final settlement? It was a certificate certifying the amount due, and that it was payable at six per cent interest. I speak from an authenticated transcript of the form of that certificate. On what was this bottomed? On the credit of the country. What was its value? It was twenty per cent, on its nominal amount, and no more—it would command this in the market, and no more.

Now, by the commutation act, what was to be given? It was securities, at five per cent. interest, to be bottomed, as I say, and will attempt to show, on particular funds, pledged to pay the accruing interest annually, and ultimately to redeem the principal. What were such securities, and so guaranteed, worth? They were worth eighty-three per cent, on the nominal amount, and would command this in money here or elsewhere. What then was the difference in value between what they did receive, and what they were to receive? It was sixty-three per cent, on the nominal amount, or sixty-three dollars on every hundred.

That these five per cent. securities, thus guaranteed, were not delivered, I would here remark, was not the fault of the Government; for it was owing to their utter inability to deliver them. Congress had no particular funds and could command none, though they made every possible effort to acquire them from the States, for this purpose. But this neither varies the fact of the breach of the contract, nor impairs the right of indemnification for that breach. I would here further remark, that it is this circumstance, that these securities were to be guaranteed by particular funds, that distinguishes these petitioners from other creditors; makes their case a peculiar one; a case that cannot make a precedent which other creditors can claim the benefit of; nor which can embarrass the Government as being such a precedent. They complain that they have not had what they were to have, but something different in kind, and less in value, much less. The other creditors were to have certificates of credit, upon the credit of the country; these they did have; and if the depression of that credit has depressed the value of those certificates in the market, and a loss has been occasioned to the holders by that depression, it is a loss which gives no legal title to indemnity; it is a damnum, but a damnum, as the law has it, absque injuria; it is a loss in consequence of the want of credit in the debtor, which does not make a legal ground of claim against the debtor. But in this case it is a loss in consequence of the non ful-ance of the debtor, the not delivering what was to be delivered, which does constitute a legal demand against the debtor.

I am aware that the value of this whole statement depends upon the evidence that these securities were to be guaranteed by particular funds. But this evidence is so irresistible in my view of it, that it forces conviction of the fact upon my mind; and, I trust, when considered and weighed, it will have a like effect with others. In the first place it was so understood by the army; for they say, in their resolution, transmitted to Congress by their Commander in Chief: "We expect Congress to provide adequate funds for satisfying the life annuities, or such commutation as may be substituted therefor." Congress then knew if commutation was adopted, it was to be guaranteed by particular funds, in the understanding of the army; and Congress, it is said, did not originate the proposition of a commutation. They but acceded to the proposition. It must, then, be presumed that they acceded to it in the sense in which it was made. To presume the contrary would be derogatory to the dignity of that body, and the idea must be rejected; and, besides, the thing proves itself. Congress intended an equivalent to the half pay, in a gross sum. They must then intend this either in money, or in something equivalent to money—otherwise, they did not intend an equivalent. Now, nothing but securities, guaranteed by particular funds, were equivalent to money. Certificates of credit, merely, were not equivalent to money; so far from it, that they were eighty per cent, below the par of money. If Congress, then by securities, meant nothing but certificates of credit, instead of meaning an equivalent, they meant only the fifth part of an equivalent; and, it is remarkable, that these securities were to be at five per cent, while all certificates of credit were at six per cent. Then, if Congress meant these securities to be placed on a common footing with certificates of credit, instead of meaning an equivalent in money, they did not mean even an equivalent in certificates, but something less, by about sixteen per cent. So, while securities would be but one fifth of an equivalent, these securities would be but five sixths of that fifth. The certificates would be but the shade, not the substance, of an equivalent, and these securities would be but the shadow of that shade.

I have stated, that while these securities were at five per cent, all certificates of credit were at six. How can this be accounted for, if these securities were to be but certificates of credit? You must suppose either that Congress deemed the army creditors less meritorious than other classes—than all other classes, and therefore were to be put on a less favorable footing; or, that, being at a less interest, were to be put on a more solid footing. And who will say that Congress deemed the army creditors less meritorious than the others in the face of all their resolutions, which thicken upon us in every page of their journals, expressive of the contrary, and entirely of the contrary?

After the half pay act, but before the commutation act had passed, the army was re-organized, leaving a number of supernumeraries, who retired from the service, but who still were entitled to the half pay. Now, the commutation act gives the securities of five per cent. to the officer then in the regular army, but certificates of credit at six per cent, to these supernumeraries. Then Congress meant to make a distinction between the supernumeraries retired from service, and the officers then in service, and to remain in service; and, if Congress meant the securities at five per cent, to be merely certificates of credit—meant that distinction to be in favor of the supernumeraries, and to the amount of sixteen per cent. then the army, who were depended on to bring the war to a successful termination, and on whom the salvation of the country depended—who were to endure the toils and privations of war; to confront danger and death, in all the horrid forms of war; were to be postponed to the supernumeraries, who were retired from the service, and were in safety at their own homes. Yes, Sir, your warrior, who was to live in the tented field, and to jeopardize his life on that field—who was to mingle in the battle, and see it rage around him—who was to see his companions fall by his side, himself equally exposed to fall—to see that battlefield strewn with carnage and death; to see the fate of his family involved in his own; the desolation of his wife and the orphanage of his children—yes, Sir, this warrior was to be postponed to the supernumerary retired from the service; sleeping quietly of nights in his own bed; living at ease in the bosom of his own family, enjoying his own fire-side, and all the comforts of civil life, and knowing nothing of the conflict but what he saw in the Gazette. Yes, this supernumerary was to receive sixteen per cent. more than this warrior, if these securities at five per cent, were to be certificates of credit merely, and were to be guaranteed by particular funds. Who can believe it?

If these securities, at five per cent, not guaranteed by particular funds, were to be delivered—I ask, why, in the name of wonder, were they not delivered? Now no one such security was ever delivered; but, on the dissolution of the army, what was delivered was merely a certificate, certifying that so much was due, and that it was payable at six per cent. Why, I ask again? It could only be because Congress were sensible that securities at five per cent not guaranteed by particular funds, were not the securities intended to be delivered and expected to be received, and therefore, they did the only thing which, in their circumstances, they could do—they delivered certificates of credit upon the credit of the country at six per cent. precisely as they did to all other creditors. If any other possible reason can be assigned for not delivering five per cent. securities, let it be done—I am not able to conceive any.

Such is the evidence that satisfies my mind, that these securities were to be guaranteed by particular funds; others will judge of their force for themselves. If it establishes this point, the consequence seems to me to be necessary that a contract made with these petitioners has been violated and to their wrong, for which they are entitled, legally entitled, to indemnification. If this point is established it will warrant this appropriation; and if not this, some appropriation, commensurate to the wrong, and sufficient for the indemnification. But if it be not established, the petitioners ask nothing at your hands. For they prefer no claims upon the national gratitude; on this subject, as I said before, they are silent, and will be forever. They will retire from your Halls in silence; in silence live as they may, and die as they hope in peace. It never will be in their hearts, still less on their lips, that they have any unrewarded merits, with their country; that their country has been unmindful of their merits or ungrateful to their deserts. They will retire; and still they can look round on their prosperous country; rejoicing, though not participating in its prosperity; and rejoicing the more when they contrast the splendor of that prosperity with the gloom of that period (they recollect it well, in it they bore their part,) the gloom of that period when her destinies were suspended on the chances of a doubtful conflict—when the mighty odds against her made these chances seem desperate, and planted despair at times in every bosom; when her own distress made her forgetful of the distresses of her armies, and her armies to forget every thing in her danger; when her sun was shrouded in clouds and tempests, and her whole horizon was darkened with the horror of the impending and the raging storm; when no resource seemed to be left her but her own unconquerable mind.

Yes, sir, rejoicing the more from that contrast. They will retire; for they can bear, and will without a murmur, the load of remaining life; decrepitude, pain, penury, and that sharpest of all pangs to the pride of the human heart, dependence, for the boon of life itself, on the alms of charity. And in the last hour, when death, the friend of the wretched, shall come to their relief; when the kindly grave is opening to receive them to its bosom, and to hush their inquietudes to repose; when this earthly scene is closing upon them forever, they will die rejoicing in that national happiness to which they have contributed, but of which they have not been deemed entitled to be made the partakers.

Mr. CHANDLER said, he rose merely to state the reason why he should vote against filling the blank with this or any other sum. He considered the contract entered into with these officers, by the Government, as entirely fulfilled. If, after the vote was taken, a bill should be presented to the Senate, making a proper provision for both officers and soldiers, he should probably give it his support.

The question being then put, a division was called for, and 12 only rising in favor of the motion, it was rejected.

Mr. HAYNE said, that after the eloquent and elaborate arguments, which had been urged on both sides of this question, he should not take up the time of the Senate, in the vain attempt of influencing their decision; he rose merely to make a motion to fill the blank with the sum of $800,000; and he should ask the indulgence of the Senate, whilst he explained, as briefly as he could, his own views in relation to the bill, and noticed one or two topics which had been introduced into the debate. It seems to be admitted, said Mr. H., by all the gentlemen who have spoken, that the merit of the petitioners is of the highest order, and that their claims are entitled to the utmost favor. Indeed, the objections to this bill seem not to rest so much on the provisions which it makes, as on the omission of certain other provisions, which gentlemen suppose ought, likewise, to be made. They seem to oppose this bill, not so much because it extends relief to the surviving officers of the Revolution, but because it does not also provide for the officers who resigned at various periods during the war; many of whom, it is contended, like the venerable Senator from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) rendered important services to their country; because it does not provide for the soldiers as well as the officers of the regular army; because it does not also provide for the whole body of the militia, who served at every period during the war; and lastly, because it does not propose to compensate all who suffered from the depreciation of the currency, or who participated in any way in the sufferings and sacrifices of the Revolution. Now, sir, my views in this respect, are simply these: In private life, I consider it no reason why we should not relieve the sufferings within our reach, that we cannot embrace all the objects of kindness within the limits even of our own country; nor can I perceive why a man should fail to pay one of his just debts, because he is not at the same moment able to discharge them all. So, in the administration of public affairs, I do not consider it a valid objection to any measure, just and proper in itself, that it does not enable us to do all the good we could, nor provide at once a remedy for all the evils of the State. It appears to me, therefore, that these objections urged against the bill constitute arguments in its favor; nor if gentlemen do really believe that it is the duty of the Government to provide for all of the private soldiers, who served in any way or for any length of time, during the Revolution, then surely it must be proper to provide for the officers, and if, as they contend, all the officers who served for a year, a month, or a day, are entitled to relief, surely those who continued in service to the end of the war are still more strongly and justly entitled. In this point of view, the only question would be, where we should begin. Now it is admitted to be impracticable, at this time, to make provision for all of these various classes of persons; neither the condition of the country nor the state of the treasury would admit of it. Where then ought we to begin? Supposing the views of the gentleman on the other side to be correct; surely with the first class of claimants; the highest in rank; the first in the order of merit, and in the magnitude and importance of their services; with those of whom it was said by Washington himself, "that their blood was the price of our independence;" THE SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY OF THE REVOLUTION, whose reduced numbers puts it in our power to relieve them, whose poverty is a standing reproach to their country, and whose age and infirmities present an irresistible appeal to our liberality.

Gentlemen have indulged themselves, Mr. President, in comparisons to the disadvantage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the Revolution. Their conduct in the Southern States, especially in South Carolina, has been alluded to in terms calculated, I fear, though certainly not intended, to depreciate the value of their services. On such a subject, sir, I can, of course, have no personal knowledge, but having been brought up among those who took an active and humble part in the Southern war, I think I cannot possibly be mistaken, when I say that the services of the army, in that part of the Union, were of inestimable value, and that the conduct of the officers and men, throughout the whole contest, was eminently meritorious; and I do know that there exists in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent but one unanimous sentiment of mingled admiration and gratitude towards those gallant men, who came from other quarters of the Union, "to pour out their blood like water," in aiding us in the great struggle for the preservation of our liberties. Gen. GREENE has always been most justly considered as "the restorer of the South." It was by his campaigns in South Carolina, that he acquired the reputation of being "the second to Washington," in the War of Independence. The names, sir, of MORGAN, DE KALB, SMALLWOOD, MOUTRIE, (for he too was a regular officer,) GUNN, HOWARD, WASHINGTON, LEE, and WILLIAMS, and a host of others, all of the regular army, are still "freshly remembered." Their names are as "household words," in the mouths of our children; their memories are enshrined in our hearts. To shew, sir, that I am not mistaken in the sentiments of my native State, in this respect, I will read to the Senate the Resolutions unanimously adopted by both branches of our Legislature, on the occasion of the death of the venerable Col. HOWARD. Resolutions not less honorable to those by whom they were adopted, than to the cherished memory of the patriot and hero who was the subject of them.

[Mr. HAYNE then read the following preamble and resolutions of the South Carolina Legislature, adopted January 25, 1828:

"It becomes a grateful People to cherish and perpetuate the memory of the brave and good; to remember with gratitude their services; and to profit by their bright examples. The heroic band of the Revolution who fought that we might enjoy peace, and conquered that we might inherit freedom, deserve the highest place in the grateful affections of a free People. Amongst the master spirits who battled for independence, we remember with veneration the late patriotic and venerable Col. JOHN EAGER HOWARD. His illustrious name is to be found in the history of his country's sufferings, and the annals of his country's triumph. In the day of peril and of doubt, when the result was hid in clouds—when the rocking of the battlements was heard from Bunker's Hill to the plains of Savannah—when danger was every where—and when death mingled in the conflict of the warrior, Howard still claved to the fortunes of the struggling Republic. Of all the characters whom the days of trial brought forth, few are equal, none more extraordinary. He was his country's common friend—and his country owes him

"one common unextinguishable debt of gratitude. South Carolina, with whose history his name is identified, is proud to acknowledge the obligation.

"In the chivalrous and hazardous operations of Gen. Greene, in South Carolina, Col. Howard was one of his most efficient officers. On a certain occasion, that experienced General declared, that Howard merited a monument of gold no less than Roman or Grecian heroes. At the battle of the Cowpens, says Lee, he seized the critical moment, and turned the fortune of the day. At Eutaw, and at Camden, he led the intrepid Maryland line to battle and to glory. But, in the course of human mortality, it has pleased the Almighty to remove him from among the few remaining associates of his youth:

"Resolved, therefore, That it was with feelings of profound sorrow and regret that South Carolina received the melancholy intelligence of the death of Col. JOHN EAGER HOWARD, of Maryland.

"Resolved, That the State of South Carolina can never forget the distinguished services of the deceased.

"Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these proceedings to the Governor of Maryland, and to the family of the late Col. HOWARD."

In speaking of the conduct of the officers of the Army, during the Revolution, gentlemen have fallen into some mistakes which I find myself called upon to correct. It is a mistake, sir, to suppose that Fort Moultrie was defended without the aid of regular troops; or, that the battle of the Cowpens was fought entirely by militia: And it is a still greater mistake to suppose that General Lincoln surrendered Charleston without a blow. Sir, I cannot, at this late hour of the day, detain the Senate by passing through the brilliant events of the Southern campaigns, but I must be permitted to say a few words in vindication of General Lincoln. With respect to the defence of Charleston, I fearlessly assert, that it was one of the most gallant, persevering, and skilful defences made during the war—hardly surpassed by any to be found in the records of modern warfare; and that, whatever may have been the prudence of undertaking it, the manner in which it was conducted conferred great honor on all concerned. So far from Charleston having been surrendered "almost without firing a gun," a resistance, nearly hopeless from the beginning, was protracted from the 1st of April to the 12th of May, notwithstanding the immense superiority of the enemy, in the number and character of their troops, in the possession of the whole harbor, and the complete investment of the place by land and water. It is stated, sir, by the respectable historian before me, [Marshall, in his Life of Washington,] that Charleston was "obstinately defended;" and that the city was not surrendered until the situation of the garrison had become perfectly "desperate." The besiegers, we are told, had completed their third parallel, advanced their works in front of that parallel, pushed a double sap to the inside of the abatis, and approached within twenty yards of the American works. The garrison, consisting of about 2000 regulars and militia, fatigued and worn out with constant duty, was too weak to man the lines, nearly three miles in extent; "their shot was nearly expended, and their provisions of bread and meat, with the exception of a few cows, entirely consumed." In this situation, when General De Portail, a skilful engineer, had declared, what, indeed, was by that time manifest to every one, that the place could no longer be defended, and that the assaults, for which preparations were then making, could not possibly be resisted: then, and not until then, was the capitulation signed. Nor could the enemy boast of a bloodless victory. The British loss was 265 men killed and wounded: a loss about equal to our own.

In endeavoring, Mr. President, to do justice to the conduct of the regular Army, let it not be supposed I would do injustice to the militia: Sir, I would not if I could; and, thank God, I could not if I would detract from their exalted merits in the same contest. They did all that irregular troops could do. They achieved much—and they suffered more. MARION, "the Old Fox" of the South, and SUMTER, its "Game Cock," (names won by their skill and valor from a reluctant enemy,) and PICKENS too, sir, whose valor led him to perform heroic deeds, which his modesty almost blushed to acknowledge, and SHELBY, and CAMPBELL, and many others whom I could name—all, all justly entitled themselves to the lasting gratitude of their countrymen. They kept up the spirit of resistance among the People, at a time when the State was overrun by the enemy. They kept hope alive, and cherished that sacred fire which, on the arrival of Greene with his army, blazed out into a fierce and consuming flame, which drew back, and finally destroyed the enemies of our country. But, sir, if these gallant men were now here, and they were called upon to explain the different parts performed by the militia and the regulars, in the memorable Campaign of 1781, they would tell you (or I have read the history of the Revolution in vain) that without the Army of Gen. Greene, the victory could not have been achieved: that the regular Army, being constantly in the field, served as a rallying point for the militia, and afforded them the means of acting with effect against the common enemy. If those men were now here to decide the question now before this House, to determine whether the surviving officers of the Army, who served to the end of the war, are not peculiarly entitled to an honorable provision for their old age—my life upon it, sir, they would be found, like the venerable Senator from Maryland, the warmest advocates of this bill. But, sir, I beg pardon for having dwelt so long on this topic. I have been led away by the desire to do justice to those whose merits have not, I think, been sufficiently appreciated by the gentlemen on the other side. These gentlemen further tell us, they can discover no difference between the claims of the officers and of the soldiers of the Revolution: Nay, one Senator insists, that the merit of the soldiers was the greater. Sir, this was certainly not the opinion of Gen. Washington, when he recommended the case of his officers to the special consideration of Congress. It most assuredly was not the opinion of that Congress which held out to these officers the promise of half pay for life, whilst no such provision was made for the soldiers. I am not at all disposed to undervalue the services, or depreciate the character, of the private soldiers of the regular Army; but I have always supposed it to be universally admitted, that they do not stand exactly on a footing with their officers. There is, doubtless, great merit in the faithful performance of the duties, even of a private soldier. But an army, without skilful and experienced commanders, would be a body without a head. The rank and file of an army constitute, it is true, the great moral machine by which Empires may be overthrown, and Republics may be saved: but the officers are the living principle which puts that machine into harmonious and successful operation. It is on this ground you establish ranks, graduate pay, and organize the whole machinery of an army; and in no other way can your troops be brought to cope in the field, with the veterans of Europe. Without entering into a comparison of the respective merits of these officers and the soldiers, (a comparison somewhat invidious, and certainly not called for by the occasion,) there are, as far as relates to this question, one or two points of discrimination to which I would now advert. The half pay for life, the benefits of which have certainly not been realized, was promised to the officers, and, therefore all the claims, whether they be considered as founded on contract, on strict justice, or on liberality, which arise out of that stipulation, belong exclusively to them. A provision, too, has already been made for the soldiers, full, liberal, and exactly suited to their condition. I mean, sir, the pension law, by which every soldier, whose situation requires pecuniary assistance, is entitled to eight dollars a month, equal to full pay for life. Now, sir, besides that the provision made for the officers, by that law, is much less liberal in its amount, it is expressly on the ground, that it is not appropriate to the condition, the feelings, and the character of these officers, that the distinction rests between them and the soldiers. It is surely needless for me to remind such an assembly as this, that the habits and sentiments which are cherished and properly belong to men moving in one sphere of action, differ very materially from those which belong to a different sphere: in short, that a private soldier, of the regular army, may, without doing violence to his feelings, accept of your bounty on terms which would, in many cases, be deemed disreputable to the officer, or which might at least require a sacrifice of feeling which he would be unwilling to make. Sir, the officers, whose case is now before the Senate, though most of them are "poor and destitute," are too proud to become your pensioners. It is an honorable pride, and God forbid that we should condemn it: But, if they are to be condemned, let him "who is without this sin amongst us, cast the first stone."

But though, from these views of the subject, I have satisfied my own mind that adequate provision ought to be made for the petitioners, yet I am not satisfied to put that provision on the ground assumed in the report of the Committee—the ground of contract. The gentlemen have told us that in the commutation of the half pay for life for five years full pay, and the proceedings under it, the legal rights of the petitioners have been violated; that they have in fact been divested of their property without their consent, express or implied, and that therefore they have a legal claim to redress. The amount of $1, 100, 000, with which the Committee moved to fill the blank in this bill, was the result of a calculation founded on that view of the subject; and therefore not being able to bring my mind to acquiesce in the reasoning of the Committee, I felt myself reluctantly constrained to vote against the proposition. It appears to my mind too clear to admit of doubt that if the principles contended for by the gentlemen be correct, then, not only the 230 survivors, whose case is now before you, are entitled to redress, but the legal representatives of the 2, 400 officers, who were alive at the time the commutation was effected, stand precisely in the same situation, and you are bound to provide for them in the same manner you may provide for the survivors, and that you are bound, according to a calculation I have made on the subject, to appropriate upwards of eleven millions of dollars to satisfy these claims. Now, Sir, I will not say that if we are convinced of the legal right of the petitioners we ought to refuse them justice, because on the same principle you must at some future and no distant period, do equal justice, and at a much greater expense, to others standing in the same predicament; but I will say, that believing the consequence of adopting the reasoning of the Committee to be, that it must inevitably draw out of the Treasury a sum ten times as great as that now proposed to be appropriated, it becomes us to be extremely careful in sanctioning that reasoning. I shall not trouble the Senate with the reasons which have compelled me to withhold my assent from the positions laid down by the Committee. It is sufficient, at this time, to say that, not being convinced, I have been unable to go along with my friends to the conclusion, that the petitioners have a legal right to the money proposed to be granted by this bill. But I shall not therefore abandon their cause. Because I do not admit that the officers of the Revolution have a legal claim on the country, founded on contract, I do not therefore admit that they have no claim which we can recognize. Sir, they have a claim on our justice and liberality which I am ready to acknowledge and willing to satisfy.

We have provided by the Pension Law for certain classes of claimants, and I am willing, by an extension, or rather a modification, of the principle of that law, to extend relief to another class. Instead of giving to these petitioners half pay, or even full pay, for the few remaining years they have to live, I can see no objection to paying them a fair equivalent in hand. The sum of $800,000 will give an average to each of these officers of a little more than $3,000, which will supply their present necessities, and give comfort to their old age. This, which is the only form in which the petitioners will consent to receive your bounty, will, while it will be acceptable to them, probably cost you less than any other provision that could be made. But, sir, we have been told, that if we cannot grant the petitioners relief on the ground of contract, we cannot grant it at all, because it is on this ground only they have put their claims. In this respect, sir, I differ from honorable gentlemen. I cannot consent to apply technical rules to a case like the present. I will look into the merits of the claim, and apply the best remedy in my power to the evil. The petitioners do, indeed, tell us that they came here not as "applicants for charity," but seeking the satisfaction of a just claim: But, sir, they also inform us that they are the scattered remnant of the officers of the Revolution—"that most of them are poor and destitute"—that they present their claim "to the justice and gratitude of their country." They state that, "in consequence of the conduct of the Government, many of them are almost dependent on charity"—that they are laboring "under the bodily infirmities incident to age, and are also destitute of the means of a decent and comfortable support;" and presenting themselves before you—"submit their whole case, under these circumstances, to your consideration." It was, Mr. President, in contemplation of a scene like this, that Washington declared, in the face of the world, "that if the officers of his army were to grow old in poverty, wretchedness, and contempt, then would he realize a tale which would embitter every moment of his future days." Sir, gratitude is due to Heaven that the Father of his country had not his days thus embittered, but if he had lived to this hour, and these petitioners are to be sent away from your doors, he would have lived to realize that tale, which would have embittered every remaining moment of his life, and have left him no peace but in the grave.

This, then, Mr. President, is the whole case of the petitioners. Here are a few of the leaders of the Revolution, a gallant remnant of a ruined band lingering on the verge of the grave. They are the men to whom, under Heaven, you are chiefly indebted for the liberties you enjoy, and the unnumbered blessings which flow from that source. They come to the representatives of the People of the United States, in the evening of their days, and in the Winter of their fortunes, and say: "you made with us, at the close of the Revolution, a hard bargain (and hard indeed it was, when, as has been shewn by the committee, a captain received only $480, in lieu of half pay for life,) to which our poverty and not our will consented. We have submitted to the terms of that contract, unjust and unequal as it was, while health and strength were left us to provide for our wants. But now, when worn down by age and infirmities, and hovering over the borders of the grave, we come to you, the guardians not only of the money but of the character of the country, and submit our case to your consideration." Sir, they disdain, it is true, to present themselves in the attitude of mere applicants for charity. They will not consent to exhibit to the world, in their persons, the humiliating, the degrading spectacle of the venerable Fathers of the Revolution, hobbling on their crutches, to cast themselves at the feet of their children, with the date obolum Bellisario on their lips. They merely make known their situation, and leave the rest to you. They show you, by the most incontestible proofs, that the hard bargain (which you were constrained to make with them by the condition of the country, at the close of the Revolution, and by which they surrendered to you a comfortable provision which the laws had secured to them for life,) has, in consequence of their having continued to live to this time, operated with peculiar, with cruel severity upon them: That you now retain in your treasury a sum vastly greater than that which it is proposed to grant, which was saved to the country by that bargain, and which was taken out of the pockets of these very men. Now, sir, what answer can you make to such an appeal as this? Can any man doubt that to refuse these petitioners redress will be to subject the Republic, in all after times, to the charge of ingratitude? To know, Mr. President, what answer we ought to give to these petitioners, we have only to inquire what is due to the petitioners? What is due to the country? What is due to ourselves as the representatives of a high-minded and magnanimous People? My feelings and my judgment tell me that we must make such a provision for these venerable men, as will relieve their present wants, and smooth their path to the tomb. Less than this, we cannot do consistently with the just claims of the petitioners, and the reasonable expectations of the public; and for my own part, however others may act on this occasion, I cannot consent to thrust these aged and venerable Fathers of the Revolution rudely from our doors, to pass the few brief moments that may remain to them on earth in poverty and wretchedness—in bitter reflections on the cruelty of their fate, and spend perhaps their latest breath in calling down imprecations, (O! no, sir, that is impossible)—invoking the blessing of Heaven, on an ungrateful country.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. said, that the bill was now presented to him in a new aspect, and as the hour was too late for further discussion, he would move an adjournment.

BARRACKS AT NEW ORLEANS.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill providing for the purchase of a site, for the erection of barracks thereon, at New Orleans, was taken up.

Mr. HARRISON explained the object of the bill, and read several letters of the Quartermaster General upon the subject. It was proposed to build barracks for four companies.

Mr. PARRIS asked the Chairman of the Military Committee whether it was necessary to keep so large a force as four companies at New Orleans.

Mr. HARRISON said, that two companies were generally stationed there, but the number was now four. But, let the number be what it might, the expediency of building barracks for at least four companies, could not be doubted. The situation of New Orleans seemed to call for a large military force. There were vast numbers of foreigners continually in the city; great numbers of Islanders, among whom were a lawless banditti, sailors and negroes, resided in, or resorted to, the city, and endangered the property of its inhabitants—while a greater quantity of property deposited by other individuals than citizens, than in any other place in the Union, was always jeopardized, unless secured by some adequate means.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, that the amount of force was always according to the exigency of the time, and four companies might generally be required at New Orleans. Eight companies were considered by the Commander-in-Chief as necessary to be stationed at that post. Four only were quartered in the city, and the four others across the lake, in a more healthy position. He thought it needless for Congress to interfere in the details of measures taken by the Department. If the War Department stationed the troops as it judged best, it was not requisite for Congress to interfere. There was no force on the coast, for three or four hundred miles, and these troops were always ready to be detailed to any quarter where they might be needed. It was a central position, and intelligence of any emergency would immediately reach New Orleans. It was, also, the most exposed situation in the country. There were always about 4,000 sailors in the harbor, and generally three hundred square rigged vessels. Besides these, there was always a great number of Kentucky boats at the wharves, and thousands of pirates and renegades from the islands resorted there. It was within a short time that the papers were filled with accounts of attempts to fire the city, and not only the whole police was called to act, but a military guard was considered necessary in every square. They had already seen an attempt, at a former period, at an insurrection by the numerous black population. All these considerations, with that of the safety of public property, made it necessary to station four companies at New Orleans. The Government would lose nothing by the erection of the barracks, as the ground on which the former buildings stood, sold for double the amount which the proposed buildings would cost.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that the United States but a short time since disposed of the old barracks at New Orleans, as was understood, because the place was too unhealthy for a military station. Now it appeared, that four companies were necessary to protect the city against sailors, pirates, Kentuckians, and negroes. He did not know why this protection was not as necessary then, as now; and he wished to be informed why, if they were sold then, they should be built again.

Mr. HARRISON said, the gentleman was mistaken, as it never was in the contemplation of Government to withdraw the troops from New Orleans. The barracks were sold on other considerations. He believed no gentleman would wish to have troops stationed in the centre of a city. When those buildings were erected, New Orleans was under a despotic Government, and they were placed there, not to defend, but to control it. When the city became a part of this free country, it was no longer proper that they should remain. As to the size of the buildings, he did not hesitate to say, that, if any barracks were necessary, they ought to be large enough for four companies. The city was a resort of pirates and vagabonds, and was generally filled with strangers, and for the protection of the large amount of property deposited there, a competent force ought to be maintained.

Mr. PARRIS disagreed with the gentleman from Ohio, as to the necessity of keeping troops in the city to defend it from internal insurrection. If this was to be the duty of our troops, the army was not sufficiently numerous. He was willing to vote for fortifications to defend the coast and the harbors. He had supported the appropriation for the works at Barataria. But he did not think the army ought to be detailed to carry into effect municipal regulations. If so, the same kind of service might be claimed by the other cities. It was also worthy consideration that the troops, carried from the Northern parts of the country, found the climate fatal. He was willing to vote for fortifications, in which barracks would necessarily be erected, and where the troops ought to be kept; but was unwilling to make provision to defend Louisiana from evils from which she ought to protect herself.

Mr. BENTON said, that our army consisted of 6,000 men, who must be stationed somewhere. Wherever they were posted they must be sheltered, and he thought the unhealthiness of the climate at New Orleans was an additional argument in favor of this bill. Experience had shewn that the erection of barracks was economy, when compared to the expense of hiring buildings. The latter had been practised at St. Louis, and had been found to be very expensive, as well as inconvenient. It was well known that troops ought to be kept at a distance, instead of being mixed up with the population of a town. Barracks had been erected at St. Louis, and the same provision was now asked for at New Orleans. It was not for the Senate now to inquire whether the troops were properly stationed—that duty belonged to the President of the United States; and if he chose to station four companies at New Orleans, Congress could not do less than provide barracks to shelter them. He considered it settled as a part of the policy of the country, that troops should be stationed at New Orleans. On the withdrawal of the troops, several years since, the Government was petitioned not to leave the city destitute of defence; and the reasons given were then satisfactory to his mind that a considerable permanent force was required at that point. It was the duty of the Government to provide for the protection of all parts of the country, and this was acknowledged to be one of the most defenceless, and the most exposed to contingencies which might call for the presence of military force. There was no proposition before the Senate either to increase or diminish the number of troops stationed at New Orleans; but to erect suitable buildings for those already posted there. He was in favor of the appropriation, as necessary for the safety of the city, and as a matter of permanent economy.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, remarked, that, whether this bill passed or not, it would not affect the disposition of the United States' troops. They had been stationed there for the last twelve years. If the bill was rejected, the officers and soldiers would be kept, as they now were, in different parts of the city, very inconveniently dispersed from each other. Besides, if this appropriation was refused, the soldiers would be exposed to the yellow fever, by being quartered in the city. The gentleman from Maine had fallen into a great error, in supposing that it was the intention of Government to withdraw the troops when the barracks were sold. The sale was made at the application of the citizens—as the barracks occupied a part of the city which was convenient for business; while, higher up the river, vessels could not come in on account of the immense batteries which defended the land from the Mississippi. It was supposed that the sale would produce a sufficient sum to build barracks in some other part of the city, less valuable for commercial purposes. There was another consideration in favor of erecting barracks capable of quartering four companies at least. In case of actual service, they would not be more than sufficient to serve as a hospital for the sick. He had seen a hospital in New Orleans, containing 800 sick, chiefly Kentucky and Tennessee militia. Another error which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PARRIS] had fallen into, was the supposition that the troops might be stationed in the forts. The forts were at a distance, and had no communication with the city; hence the soldiers, intended for the defence and security of the city, would be of no service there. He could not doubt that the various considerations in favor of this bill would ensure a favorable decision upon it.

Mr. HARRISON moved to fill the blank with 87,968 dollars; which was agreed to, and the bill passed to be engrossed.

REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill, providing for certain surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army; the motion made yesterday by Mr. HAYNE, of S. C. to fill the blank with $800,000, pending.

Mr. BELL said, that the surviving officers of the revolutionary army claimed the performance of a promise of half pay for life—made to them by a resolution of Congress of October 21, 1780. They contended that this promise was performed only in part by the commutation of five years full pay, which was subsequently given them as an equivalent for their half pay for life; and they now ask a second commutation to make up the alleged deficiency in the first. The committee to whom this subject was referred, has made a report in conformity to the views of the petitioners. This report alleges that the commutation of five years full pay given to these officers as an equivalent for their half pay, was not an adequate compensation for it; and that there is now due to them a sum equal to two years full pay. This bill makes provision for the payment of that sum. If the view which the committee has taken of this subject be correct, the claim of these officers is just, and ought to be paid. But I cannot yield my assent to the correctness of the facts on which the committee have founded their opinions, or to the justness of the conclusions which they have drawn from those facts. It is the object of the few remarks which I am about to make, to state the reasons which have brought me to a result on this question, directly the reverse of that to which the committee have arrived. The officers admit, that in consequence of an application from them, Congress in 1783 offered them five years full pay as a commutation for their half pay for life—that they accepted this offer, received the obligations of the Government for it; and that those obligations have been since paid. But they contend that the acceptance and payment of this commutation did not discharge the Government from its promise, because, as they allege, they did not voluntarily accept this commutation, and that it was not an equivalent for their half pay for life. A sufficient attention to the facts will show that both these assertions of the officers which have been adopted by the committee are unfounded. The direct evidence of a voluntary acceptance of the commutation by the officers, is of the most conclusive character. The officers solicited a commutation for their half pay. When five years full pay was offered them as a commutation, they accepted it. This direct evidence of a voluntary acceptance, (and no evidence could be more conclusive,) is corroborated by indirect evidence deserving much consideration. The application to Congress for a commutation, and the nature and extent of the commutation offered, was undoubtedly known to every officer in the army. It was a subject of great interest to all, and must have been a subject of general conversation among them. It is impossible to believe, that, if any considerable number of the officers were dissatisfied with the commutation offered, they would not have remonstrated against it; and placed on the records of Congress some evidence of their belief that injustice was done them, as a foundation for a future application for redress. There is no evidence, or even a traditionary rumor, that any of the officers were dissatisfied with the commutation given them. It seems to have been at the time so entirely satisfactory that not a single murmur of dissatisfaction was heard. For the next twenty-seven years, no complaint was heard from any one of this body of more than two thousand officers, who had accepted this commutation, that it was not a fair equivalent for their half pay, or that their acceptance of it was not voluntary. On what known principle of human action are we to account for this long silence, and the delay of these officers in asserting their claims if they had believed them to be well founded? I can find no satisfactory reason consistent with the justice of their claims. During all this time, this Government was administered by their warmest friends, by their compatriots in the revolutionary struggle; by men whom they well knew would readily listen to their complaints, and promptly redress their injuries. These circumstances establish the fact, that the acceptance of the commutation of five years full pay as an equivalent for the half pay for life, was not only voluntary but satisfactory, beyond any reasonable doubt. It has been said that the acceptance of this commutation by the officers, could not be regarded as a free and voluntary act, because Congress required only the assent of a majority of the several State lines of the army. And it seems to be inferred that Congress intended by this means to compel the younger officers to accept as a commutation for their half pay, what was not in value an equivalent for it. This is a very weighty charge against a body of men whom we have been accustomed to revere as amongst the wisest and best men that ever conducted the great interests of our country. The charge, if well founded, must consign their names to infamy. But it is not well founded. They are not justly liable to this imputation. Their motives, in relation to this offer of a commutation for half pay to the revolutionary officers, were fair, and their conduct just and honorable. The unworthy suspicions to which I have referred, must have arisen from a misapprehension of the motives which induced Congress to require the assent of the officers to the acceptance of the commutation offered by majorities of their respective lines. The circumstances disclose satisfactorily what these motives were. The officers had solicited a commutation or payment of a gross sum in exchange for the half pay for life, which had been promised them. Congress was willing to yield to their solicitations, but it was found difficult to effect this object, without exposing the one party or the other to injustice. The value of the half pay of no two of these officers was the same; and it was impracticable to apportion the commutation to each individual case. The officers as well as Congress, were satisfied that a commutation could be effected only by fixing upon an average value of the half pay of all the officers. This would secure the officers, as a body, against injustice, but it would not secure the Government; because if Congress offered this average value as a commutation, without an assurance that a considerable portion of the officers would accept it, it might happen that only the old officers, or those whose constitutions were broken by diseases or wounds, would accept it. These persons would have received a commutation far beyond what, in justice, they were entitled to. To guard against this injustice to the public, Congress said to the officers, we will give you five years full pay, a fair average value of your half pay for life, if so considerable a portion of you will consent to accept it as will afford a reasonable assurance that no considerable injustice will result to the public from our offer. This was the sole motive which induced Congress to annex to their offer the condition that the officers should decide upon the acceptance of the commutation, by majorities in their respective lines. The condition on which the offer was made, was just and reasonable. Its object was to guard against injustice, and not to do injustice. No possible injustice could result to the officers from this condition. It impaired none of the rights of the minority who should not see fit to accept the commutation. It was not compulsory, nor did it impose either forfeiture or penalty upon those who should reject the offer. Their promise of half pay for life remained equally obligatory upon the Government as before; and Congress remained bound to provide, and undoubtedly would have provided for its payment. All the evidence we have on this subject, leads to the conclusion that the officers accepted the commutation, not because they were compelled to accept it, but because they believed it to be an advantage to them. This is evident from the admitted fact that they readily and generally, if not unanimously, accepted it. The committee tell us that majorities in the lines of nine States accepted the commutation. How large those majorities were, does not appear; that they included all, or nearly all, the officers, is fairly presumable from the consideration that all did actually accept the commutation; and that there is no evidence that any objections were made to its acceptance. The officers of the four remaining States never acted by lines on the question of the acceptance of the commutation. They acted individually on this question, and every one of them, the young as well as the old, with the knowledge that they were at liberty, each one for himself, to accept or reject the commutation, did accept it. Can evidence of a voluntary acceptance of the commutation, more conclusive than this, be offered? It is believed to be impossible. Yet, in the face of all this evidence of the voluntary acceptance of the commutation of five years full pay, in exchange for half pay for life, by at least more than three-fourths, if not all these officers, this bill provides a second commutation for all the revolutionary officers, without discrimination. I should be glad to know of the advocates of this bill, on what principle it is that those officers who solicited the commutation for their half pay, who voluntarily and individually, each man acting for himself, accepted it, believing it to be a fair equivalent for that half pay, is now to receive a second commutation. It certainly cannot be on the ground either of legal or equitable obligation, of which we have heard so much said. It has been said that although circumstances induced the officers to receive this commutation voluntarily, yet if it was not an equivalent for the half pay yielded up in exchange for it, the Government remains under an equitable obligation to give them an additional commutation to make good the deficiency.

The advocates of the bill have attempted to prove that the commutation of five years full pay was not equivalent in value to the half pay for life which was surrendered in exchange for it. Their arguments on this point are entirely founded upon a mistaken assumption of facts. They assume it as a fact that the average age of the revolutionary officers, at the termination of the war, did not exceed thirty years. Most of these officers had been in the service from the commencement of the war. The field officers generally, and many of the subalterns, were over thirty years of age at the commencement of the war. They had obtained a character and standing in the community by having taken an active part in stirring up the People to a resistance of the unjust claims of Great Britain for several years previous to the war. Such men as had thus acquired the public confidence were generally the men who received commissions in the army. None others in times like those could have induced citizens to fly to the standard of their country, from patriotic motives to enlist under them. I can speak from personal knowledge of the field officers of the New Hampshire line, many of whom I knew subsequently to the war, of whom there were none under forty, and several of them were over fifty years of age, at the close of the war. The advocates of the bill assume it as an unquestionable fact, that the probable duration of life at thirty years of age is fourteen years. Now it is very obvious, that no general rule of this kind can be correct, as applicable to all countries. The probable duration of life at any given age must in all countries depend upon the salubrity of the climate, the habits of the people, the state of society, and many other circumstances. These will not be found to be alike in any two countries. The calculation that the average duration of life at thirty years of age is fourteen years is not derived from actual observation of the duration of life in the United States; but in England, a country not more salubrious than many parts of the United States, but believed to have a more salubrious climate than the United States, having regard to an average of its extensive territory, the annuity tables found in Price and other English writers, were taken from actual observation of the duration of human life in that country, and are constructed as a guide to those who are interested in life annuities in that country, in which there is a vast amount of property so invested. They are, no doubt, pretty correct generally, as to the probable duration of life, as to those persons who have been employed in the ordinary pursuits of civil life, and have been exposed only to the common causes of disease, or of injury to the constitution. The advocates of this bill profess to adopt the calculations of Dr. Price of the value of annuities for life, as the foundation of their calculation of the value of the half pay for life promised to the revolutionary officers. There can be no objection to this authority, so far as it is applicable to our country, and to the circumstances of this case. The work of Price was published before the revolutionary war, and was as well known to Alexander Hamilton, the advocate of the revolutionary officers, to the members of Congress, and to many of these officers, as it is now to us. There is no doubt that it was the standard by which the value of the half pay of these officers was calculated, making allowance for all those circumstances which applied to this particular case. The advocates of the bill proceed to assume another essential fact, in direct opposition, not only to probability, but to evidence furnished by themselves. They contend that the probable duration of the lives of these officers was as great as that of an equal number of persons of the same age in England who had been engaged in the ordinary pursuits of civil life. This will appear to be utterly improbable when we recollect that the officers had seen seven years service in an army which had endured more hardship, privation, and suffering, than is usual to a situation always unfavorable to health, and that the constitutions of many of them were broken by the effects of wounds and diseases. But the advocates of the bill have furnished us with evidence on this point, which must put this question at rest for ever. They inform us that at the close of the revolutionary war there were more than two thousand four hundred officers in the army entitled to half pay, and that the whole number of these officers now living is only two hundred and thirty. Now it appears from the North Hampton tables given by Dr. Price, to which the advocates of the bill refer us as the ground of all their calculations on this subject, that of four thousand three hundred and eighty five persons living at the age of thirty, nine hundred and twelve lived to the age of seventy-four years, which would have been the average age of the revolutionary officers, according to the calculations of the committee, had they lived to the present time. Upon making a calculation upon these data it will be found that, if the officers had at the close of the war an equal chance of duration of life, with an equal number of persons in England of the age of thirty, who had been previously engaged in the ordinary pursuits of civil life, we should have found more than five hundred, instead of two hundred and thirty of them now alive. I take the facts furnished by the advocates of the bill, and apply them to the rules which they give us, as entitled to our fullest confidence, and the result to which they bring us, is directly the reverse of that to which the committee arrive.

The committee have fallen into an error in giving us from Dr. Price's tables the present value of the half pay for life of these officers, on the supposition that their average age did not exceed thirty years. They have told us that the present value of an annuity, or half pay for life, of a person at the age of thirty years, according to the North Hampton tables given us by Dr. Price, is a sum equal to fourteen times the amount of one annual payment of such annuity. The committee have certainly misapprehended Dr. Price—he gives no such rule. The North Hampton table upon which he relies, and makes his calculations, gives the present value of an annuity for life, for a person of the age of thirty years, as only equal to a sum amounting to about eleven and seven-tenths the amount of one annual payment of such annuity. This rule, applied to the value of the half pay for life of these officers, would give as its equivalent, five years and a small fraction over nine months full pay, and no more. I cannot be mistaken in this fact, since I have this table now before me. Here is then another source of error into which the advocates of this bill have fallen, which, when corrected, strikes off at once five-eighths of the claim of these officers. I will for a moment advert to one other source of error of considerable magnitude, into which those whose opinions I am combatting, have fallen. The tables of observations of the duration of life, from which they have calculated the value of the half pay of these officers, includes both sexes. Now it is a well established fact, that the average duration of the lives of females is greater than that of males. From records of life annuities kept in Holland, for one hundred and twenty-five years, it appears that of an equal number of male and females, the average duration of the lives of the females was more than two years longer than that of the males. Observations which have been made in England, Scotland, France, Germany, and the United States, gave a similar result. The causes of the greater duration of life in females than males is very obvious. They are less exposed to hardships, and to those causes which produce accidental death than males. Few of them die from diseases induced by an intemperate use of ardent spirits, whilst one out of fifteen or twenty males, upon the lowest calculation, died prematurely from this cause. When the facts and circumstances to which I have adverted, are duly considered, it seems to me impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the commutation of five years full pay was a full equivalent for the half pay for life, which was promised to the revolutionary officers. I have examined this question deliberately, and certainly without a wish to come to a result unfavorable to the claims of these officers—for whom I have always entertained a high degree of respect and veneration; but the facts and circumstances which I have stated, have irresistibly brought me to that result. It has been truly said that the revolutionary officers suffered heavy losses from the depreciation of the currency and certificates in which their wages and claims were paid. This constitutes an equitable claim upon the Government, but it cannot with propriety be provided for by this bill, in its present shape. Besides, this is a claim in every respect similar to that of the surviving revolutionary soldiers, and I cannot consent to make a provision for the claim of the officer, and treat with neglect a similar claim of the soldier, who fought by his side—who endured even greater hardships and privations, and was influenced to exertion, in the cause of his country, by the same patriotic spirit. Should this bill be so modified as to make a reasonable provision for the just claims of both, it shall then receive my support.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that the relation in which he stood to the honorable objects of this bill, would justify him in a few remarks upon the objections offered against it. But so long had the debate been protracted he should have refrained from those remarks entirely, had not the speech of his colleague this morning convinced him, that some of the opposers of the measure acted under a total misapprehension as to a few of the material facts. The principles, which should govern the measure, might well be presumed alike familiar to all; but the particular facts of the case surely ought to be bet-unknown to those, whose particular duty it had been to make a critical examination of them.

The gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON) had urged much, as an objection to the passage of this bill, that the Committee themselves disagreed concerning the grounds on which its merits rested. While in truth, the only real difference among them had been, that one member dwelt more strongly, on one reason, and another more strongly on another reason for its adoption.

But very far was it from the intention of himself or his able friend from Georgia, (Mr. BARRIN,) in advocating the claim on strict common law principles, to admit that it could not be supported also on principles the most liberal and equitable; while it was equally far, as he believed, from the views of the other members of the Committee, (Mr. VAN BUREN and Mr. HARRISON,) who had so eloquently pressed the mere equity of the claim, to admit that it was not also well based on strict common law principles. On the contrary, if a radical difference had existed between them, it would still leave the measure as free from objection on that account as was left the opposition to it. For one gentleman formerly, (Mr. MACON) and indeed, another to day, (Mr. BELL,) had insisted on the statute of limitations in bar of the claim, while the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. TYLEN,) properly and gallantly said he should scorn to take advantage of that statute. Again, the last gentleman had insisted, that the commutation act was legally binding and compulsory on the minority as well as majority; while my colleague to day frankly acknowledges, that it was binding on nobody who did not individually and freely assent to its provisions. The difference between the opponents of the bill is therefore essential, while that between its friends is merely nominal.

Another mistake in fact has been urged from one or two quarters against the bill, namely that a suit at law could not be sustained on the claim, and hence, it ought not to find favor. But does any claim ever come here, on which such a suit could be sustained? The chief reason that induces every private claimant to present his petition to Congress, is that he could not obtain redress in the courts of law; and if no claimant was to be listened to here, who could not succeed at law, we might sweep off, at one blow, our whole docket of private bills. Again, it has been asked, why did not these petitioners go to the Departments to have their claims audited and allowed, if they are valid? I reply, as before, if nobody is to be relieved here, who cannot get relief at one of the Departments, at once rub the sponge over all private applications; because the very reason for their appearance here, is that by omissions in the existing laws, or doubts of the accounting officers, redress cannot be obtained at any of the Departments. If objections like these are to avail aught against the petition now under consideration, let them avail against all petitioners, and in the words of the gentleman from North Carolina, let all be directed to "eat out of one spoon." Why did we not say to the merchants in A. D. 1816, whose bonds were remitted, go to your action at law, or go to one of the Departments? Why not say the same to the purchasers of public lands so liberally relieved a few years ago?

Gentlemen have erred in other respects as to the facts. None of the Committee have averred, as some seem to have supposed, that an action at law or bill in equity, could in truth be maintained on the present claim, if the United States were liable to such proceedings in behalf of their creditors. But they have averred, and it is again repeated, that these petitioners are seeking a right; and that is a right both on common law and on chancery principles. But if on only one, whether it be a right on strict common law principles, or on chancery principles, it is equally a right, and the claim is equally a legal claim. The forum, in which it becomes a right, does not alter its legality.

Hence, if every gentleman would agree with him from Virginia, [Mr. TYLEN,] that the statute of limitations should be scorned, and that the pretended payment made to these petitioners, was "mere wind, mere trash," I aver, that in any forum, before any court or jury in Christendom, this right, as between individuals, could now be unanswerably established. Let the issue be formed, and the cause tried to-morrow, and no three or five judges—no twelve "good men and true," as jurors, could say, that the wages of toil and blood, the solemn promises for sacrifices and sufferings to secure the liberties of America, had ever been discharged by only "wind and trash."

Little does it become us now, when these veterans seek a right, to talk to them of "thanks," "benedictions," and "praises," or to send them as paupers to the crumbs of the pension law.

Without dwelling a moment on considerations before urged in the argument in favor of the legality of this claim, let me ask, what has been the reply to the position of the Committee, that on strict legal principles the promise for half pay for life has never been fulfilled? Has any one shown that the half pay in the form of half pay, has ever been paid? No pretence for it. Has any one shown that the half pay has ever been technically released? No pretence for it. Has any one shown that this promise for half pay was made to the soldiers, or militia or civilians, whose cases are so often repeated as connected with the present claim? I believe not; and though they fought and counselled as men should in defence of their hearths, and altars and liberties, the promise for half pay to the officers of the army of the Revolution is the only point now under consideration. How has that promise then been fulfilled? In no way except by the act of commutation. But it could not be fulfilled by that act, unless all things were transacted in conformity to the provisions of that act. Yet none can deny, that in conformity to these provisions, the commutation must have been accepted by majorities in each of the lines. Such is the express, unequivocal language of the act. Whereas all must admit, it now appears never to have been accepted by even majorities in over nine lines of the army. Again, to conform to the act, the acceptance must have been in six months, when no acceptance by a single line appears to have taken place till sometime after six months. Every body feels and knows likewise, that the payment, to be in conformity to the act, was to have been money, or at least securities equivalent to money; when in truth it was neither; and even under the most favorable view, if the certificates were kept till the funding, fell short of what was due from one-fifth to one-third. So the certificates, or the payment, should have been made in September, 1783; but were not in fact made until some time in January, 1784, when worth much less. But break through the forms of measures, and every lawyer, every constitutional statesman, must admit, that, on strict legal principles, there should not only have been a conformity to the commutation act, but, in the act itself, to make it binding, there should have been a regard to private vested rights.

It is not necessary at this day, whatever may have been the theories or opinions prevalent half a century ago, to repeat illustrations and arguments, showing that a majority in any one line of the army could not legally bind the minority as to the commutation. The most uninformed day laborer knows, that no two of his fellow laborers have a right to vote away or change the wages previously agreed to be paid him—much less could they do it, or could nine out of thirteen lines do it, not only for themselves, but for the other lines, on the ground as contended by the Senator from North Carolina, that in the confederation it was a political compact, that the votes of nine States bound the whole. The present was not a question to be voted on in Congress by delegates, but was a question of private, vested civil rights, and to be settled not by the articles of confederation, but by the ordinary rules of jurisprudence and law.

My colleague admits, unlike the other objectors, that the minority were not bound, unless they gave, in some way, a full and free consent; and then, like the others, he refers to sundry circumstances, from which he deduces that consent.

Here again, most of the gentlemen who oppose the bill, have, in the zeal of debate, seized upon circumstances, altogether insufficient in my view, to support their deductions, and, in some cases, circumstances entirely misapprehended; else how could they assert, and argue from the assertions, that in this transaction, "every step taken, was at the earnest solicitation of the officers;" that "all the officers asked" for the commutation; that "the whole proceedings began," and advanced to the end, with their full approbation?

So far from all this, a little closer attention to documents would have convinced them that the original petition to Congress, in which, among many other things, the subject of commutation is named, was not gotten up by the whole army, but only by five lines on the Hudson river. The rest of the army, a large majority of it, had neither part nor lot in the petition.

In the next place, even that small number of officers did not ask for a commutation to please themselves, much less to speculate with, as intimated by one gentleman. Nor did the project at all originate with them; but the States to which they belonged had objected to the form of the half-pay, as in some degree odious, and the officers from those States being always willing to make any reasonable sacrifice in the cause of freedom, expressed their consent, if Congress pleased, to take a gross sum or a certain number of years full pay, instead of half-pay for life. This appears explicitly in both their petition and in the commutation act. [Mr. W. here read that part of the petition, 8 vol. Journal, page 227, and from the resolve of A. D. 1780.] After stating the objections of their States, they add, "To prevent, therefore, any altercation and distinctions which may tend to injure that harmony which we ardently desire may reign throughout the country, we are willing to commute," &c.

Again, it will be seen that the splendid and numerous Committee whom one gentleman dwelt on as sent with this petition, and under full power to act on the amount of the commutation, and who probably agreed to all adopted afterwards by Congress, never existed. Those persons he names were merely the signers to the petition. The real humble Committee of only three, who in fact went with the petition, may be seen in 4th Gordon, p. 353. This, like many other mistakes, has doubtless happened from inadvertence; but helps to make an unfavorable impression against this claim. This Committee also were not empowered to agree on any sum in commutation, but only to the form of the commutation,—either the form of a gross sum, or a certain number of years full pay. And so far from the precise sum inserted in the commutation act having been fixed by them, either with, or without authority, they doubtless were many hundred miles distant when Congress settled the question, as many months elapsed between the petition and the decision. Neither did the Committee of Congress agree with them on the sum inserted, as has been inferred; because the report was in blank and a different and a larger sum was moved by one of the Committee. Even he, (Mr. HAMILTON) though richly entitled to the encomiums received, was not, as again and again asserted, the Chairman of the Committee, nor did he, or the rest of the Committee, agree to the commutation in its present form. They not only proposed a larger sum, but proposed an election to one class of officers to take that sum, or retain their half pay. With an election to all of them the sum was doubtless large enough; but without an election was greatly unequal, and unjust to the younger officers.

Indeed what is decisive on this point, that the Committee of officers neither had, nor exercised the power to agree upon this amount of commutation, Congress itself did not in the end adopt that sum absolutely as agreed to; but provided that this sum should be binding only in the event, that a majority of each line afterwards approved of it. Such a majority never did approve of it; all, nay not half, had asked for any commutation whatever; none had asked for this precise sum, but for a fair equivalent, and the foundation of these broad and sweeping conclusions against the officers seems built on sand.

Whither do these loose conjectures lead us? Do gentlemen forget the character of these petitioners? Men to whom integrity and honor is dearer than life! And do they believe, that had nothing been transacted, but what they themselves desired and individually approved, you would now see in your Halls a single one of their venerable heads, asking relief as a right? It is an imputation on their characters, and I, for one, should deem it a burning disgrace to advocate their cause a moment on this ground, if the whole proceedings of Congress, in respect to them, had received their free and full sanction at the time. What they did after the commutation act passed, is, on principles of common sense, and on an appeal to the facts of history, decisive to my mind, that they did not, rather than that they did, in any way, give such a sanction, at any subsequent period.

When the vote was taken in the nine lines, I have the resolve of Congress before me to show, that almost every officer was probably absent on furlough, on account of the news of peace. All idea, therefore, of general assent by that vote, is thus rebutted. It is matter of history, likewise, that the army was disbanded in September or October, 1783, without the return of many of these officers, and that not a single certificate for commutation was made out and delivered to any of them till the next year. That the certificates were then sent to the agents or Governors in their different States, and delivered to them, not taking a receipt in full, as in case of certificates for monthly wages, but merely a receipt for certificates.

The officers thereafter, as accident or necessity moved them, and without any conference together, took these certificates—they took them, as all that Congress had provided for them; but not as a free assent, that the certificates were a fair and full discharge of their half pay; if we allow them to have possessed the smallest particle of that common sense on which the gentleman from Virginia is so eager to bottom some of his deductions. It was, on its face, defective in amount nearly one-third; and if not so, was, when delivered, only worth in money about two-tenths, its nominal amount; and is it decorous or true to suppose such certificates were freely and voluntarily taken in full discharge of half pay for life? We impeach not the motives of the old Congress. The course pursued by it, was not dictated by the wishes but the wants of Congress. It is no imputation on the honesty and honor of that Congress to do as it did, more than it is on any insolvent debtor not to pay beyond what he is able. But the imputation is on us, if, when able, we neglect to remunerate those who suffered by our former wants. Whatever may have been the just amount due as commutation, Congress and the officers both, then expected that the commutation would forthwith be paid in money or amply secured. It is idle to talk or pretend otherwise. Half pay on the one hand, or its substitute, was wanted for daily bread. On the other hand, Congress passed a resolve calling for immediate requisitions on the States to meet the claims of the army, or adequately to secure them. (See 8 Jour. 113.) Under the same commutation act, Congress actually raised specie and paid it to the foreign officers. But they could not have done this under the same law, unless with a conviction that the law required it. Whether the commutation then ought to have been five or seven years, it never was fairly performed or paid; and the depreciation which ensued, or the loss in funding, ought, at all events, to be remunerated. On these points, however, I shall not dwell, as they have before been exhausted. But in relation to the nominal amount of the commutation, whether sufficient or not, I must be permitted to add a few remarks, in consequence of the round and frequent assertions, especially to day, that the Committee had made unfounded assumptions, and mistaken important facts. This inquiry in two views of the case, is very important, as it may show the hardships, whether accidental or not, of the original commutation, and may furnish some safe data as to the extent of relief. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) thought five years full pay was enough, because the average duration of human life on "common law and common sense" principles was only seven years. And my colleague to-day supposes that it was enough, because fourteen years has been assumed by the Committee as the duration of life in these petitioners in A. D. 1783, and was altogether too high for this country, if not for Europe. If the first position were true, that seven years was "the ultima thule" of the probability of life, what follows? Not that full pay five years is merely enough, but that the old Congress, which he praises for sagacity and wisdom, and who had a sacred regard to economy, gave to the officers double what they were entitled to. Because, half pay for seven years was not worth in presenti, in a gross sum, over two and a half full years pay. Any gentleman can calculate for himself.

The Senator from Virginia seemed to insist also, that seven years was an inflexible period for all ages, whether in youth, manhood, or decrepitude; while his own experience as to his collegiate or academic classes, or as to his fellows in legislative bodies, would convince him not only that the chance of his life was greater at different ages, but that neither seven, nor even fourteen years had swept away one half, and much less the whole of any body of persons with whom he has associated. Had he looked into any system of insurance on lives, the error would at once have confronted him; and I have now in my hand the premiums asked by the company in Massachusetts, under the direction of the science of Mr. Bowditch, and where they differ nearly one half in amount at certain periods of life fifteen years apart, and where this difference is made merely on account of age, all other circumstances being equal.

The annuity tables, when formed with care, are entitled to full confidence, and furnish sufficient certainty for monied calculations of the utmost importance in common life. They do not rest on conjectures, but on long and patient observation and on records. (See 35 Quart. Rev. 4 page.)

I have a table before me, where of ten thousand persons born on a given day, so far from all being swept away in seven years, or even in fourteen, (the time supposed by the other gentleman,) over one half of the number are alive after thirty years. Again, of those alive at thirty years of age, instead of all disappearing in seven or fourteen years, one half of them are alive after thirty two years. The table is formed in a healthy country, and of that character will I show our own to be, notwithstanding the argument to the contrary to-day.

The hypothesis of the Committee, that the average age of the officers in A. D. 1783, did not exceed thirty, was not assumed hastily, as intimated: it was not adopted without full inquiry, and has had the sanction of two able Committees of the other House. Taking that then as a fact sufficiently well established for this purpose, the Committee have not said, as my colleague, through mistake supposes, that the officers would live only fourteen years. They merely mention fourteen years as the shortest term; but their whole calculations and arguments he would see, had he examined them with his usual care, are grounded on the position, that they were likely to live from 32 to 34 years. The committee, in coming to that result, do not say they adopt implicitly the tables of Dr. Price, or do they even refer to him at all in their report. But two former Committees in the other House have taken his tables as their basis, and making proper allowances, have come to the same conclusion with ourselves. We have resorted not only to him, but especially to Milne on annuities, which is now before me, and from which I have before read. I will take the liberty again to read, and from his calculations to repeat, that the data given by the Committee are correct. [Mr. WOODBURY here read from Milne's tables.] These tables of course differ some years as do those of Dr. Price, according as they are made in different latitudes; in large towns or the country, and within the last 60 years or before, on account of the introduction of vaccination, the improvements in education, and numerous other causes which reading and observation will suggest. A slight difference, when kept as to the different sexes, prevails likewise in all of these—[2 Milne Apx. 765.]

But take the healthiest places in Europe, where these tables have been formed during the last half century, and the probable duration of life at 30 years of age is such, that an annuity for it, would not differ beyond a small fraction from 14 years purchase. The tables at Carlisle are of this character. Not as many gentlemen, with a slight attention to the subject have supposed, that a person of that age would live only 14 years; but probably live about 34 years; and hence his annuity for that time be worth now in a gross sum 14 times its amount. Can my colleague seriously contend, that the committee have erred in supposing the healthiness of this country not equal to that of Europe, where the great mass of the people are well known not to be so well fed, sheltered or clothed? Or that Republican institutions are less favorable to long life than Monarchies? Or can he seriously contend, that these officers at thirty years of age were less likely to live long, than persons who had been in civil life? In reply, should I conjecture merely without any examination of this point, the conclusion would be rather more obvious and natural, that persons, hardened by exposure and severe exertion, would afterwards live longer than persons in ordinary life.

But without any claim on my part to unusual accuracy or deep science in these subjects, the Committee have not rested their inferences on mere conjecture: they have not, I believe, adopted a basis "utterly improbable;" nor are they persons whose habits have led them in their official duties to "assume essential facts," without evidence. The invalid pension roll of the United States in A. D. 1825, consisted of 3,690, and exhibited only fifty-eight deaths. In A. D. 1826, of 3,805, and exhibited only forty-eight deaths. This averages about 1 in 70, and is among a class of persons, not it is believed less than 30 years old on an average; and of whom all have seen service and experienced bodily injuries. Yet it shows greater health than the healthiest tables, in either Price or Milne in Europe. Again, of the Revolutionary soldiers on the continental list, who are placed on the pension list, more than 12,000 survive, after the lapse of 44 years since the peace. Thus, instead of the whole having been swept away in 7, or even 14 years, this large number remains after more than six times 7 years. Even of these, aged and decrepid as they are, only about one in 32 dies annually, which is a less mortality than the average British standard half a century ago, of one in 28 of her whole population. Again, the gentleman who last addressed the Senate, [Mr. BELL,] contends that if this country were as healthy as England, and the officers as healthy as common citizens of their age, 500, instead of 230 should now be alive. This is another illustration of the mistakes, attending doubtless on haste and partial examination, and not on any personal prejudice or censurable motives. The officers in A. D. 1783, are, to be sure, supposed to have been, on an average, 30 years of age; and it may be, that if all were in truth no more than 30 years old at that time, between 400 and 500 would or should now survive. Indeed, more than 230 may be alive at this time, though no more have been ascertained. But the gentleman forgets that a considerable number of them were in fact over 30; not a few 40, 50, and 60, and overlooks entirely, that the mortality in 44 years, among those 40 years old and upwards, would be nearly double more than the gain in life as to the numerous officers who were less than 30 years old.

In this great lapse of time, more than nineteen twentieths of those only 40 years old, and the whole, save one or two of those over 40, would have passed the allotted age of man, and be altogether swept from existence; while only about three fourths of those exactly 30 years old would have died, and nearly as many of those 21 or 25 years old would have died as those 30 years old. Hence the average ages, though a correct enough guide as to life in valuing half pay, only too unfavorable to these individual petitioners, is manifestly erroneous in ascertaining how many survive, when 44, instead of 34 years has elapsed; and when not a proportion, but all of those over a certain age, have probably perished.

To return to the comparative healthiness of all our population in this country, where tables for bills of mortality have been kept: the number of deaths is manifestly much fewer than in the same population in England. A paper by Doct. Barton, in the 3d vol. Philo. Trans. 42d page, demonstrates that in Philadelphia the deaths were often only 1 in 45; and in Salem, Mass., 1 in 47; while in this city, I have the data before me, showing, that for the last six years they have averaged not 1 in 49. In the State of New York computations have been made with some degree of accuracy, that the deaths do not average over 1 in 72; and I know many towns in New Hampshire, where they have been for many years less than 1 in 80.

It is to be remembered also that this estimate includes both young and old as well as middle aged—and is of course disadvantageous to the middle aged. The Committee, therefore, have not taken as a standard either the London or North Hampton tables, whether of this period or of an ancient period—once, the deaths, 1 in 28 to 1 in 40; and in 1810, not more than 1 in 52. But they have taken the modes of computation approved by Price and Milne, and taken those tables in Milne, which come nearest to the supposed mortality in this country, for the last half century; and thus have arrived, as the two Committees before them have done, to the conclusion, and I trust a just one, that these officers ought to have received 14 years purchase, or 7 years full pay, instead of only five years. Whether the commutation was defective by mistake or design is wholly immaterial to the argument, if it was only defective; because, if defective, we have reaped the benefit; and these survivors being the sufferers—sufferers from our needs and their patriotism—they should in our present prosperous condition be honorably remunerated. It is not a violation of economy to pay honest debts or restore to a poor creditor, what was once withheld from him; neither is this course exposed to any of the exceptions taken by the venerable Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) against prodigality, large salaries and monarchical usages. As one of the Committee, I dislike them no less than he does. But at the same time, to me, it seems always frugal and republican to do justice; and instead of endangering the payment of the public debt by such a measure, we are, in my view of the subject, attempting honorably to discharge a sacred portion of what ought to be the public debt—and to strengthen the confidence of all public creditors, that however inequitably they may be treated under state necessities in great national embarrassment, they shall, when our ability permits, be in some degree indemnified.

I would show the world, as the member from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) observed yesterday, when discussing the bill for interest to the State he represents, I would show them, that a virtuous democratic republic can act, as a virtuous private citizen would act, and mete out the same justice to its creditors, which one honorable man would mete out to another. On this basis then, let me enquire what man, who is a man, who dares hold his head erect in decent society, would not when rich, restore to his creditor what was reserved or withheld when the debtor was poor? Other gentlemen, who vote differently, doubtless think differently on the facts, but, with my views as to the facts of this case, we can with no better grace refuse to grant this relief, than any honest individual could hesitate in his prosperity to make up to his suffering creditor the uttermost farthing that had been virtually withheld from him in the hour of need. I had intended to notice some other objections adduced against the bill, but the length of the debate, and the lateness of the hour, forbid the attempt.

The petitioners will now be left by me in the hands of this honorable body. My duty towards them on this motion has been fulfilled—and quickly as the curtain of life must close around them, I hope our justice and gratitude may yet cheer their aged hearts, before their departure to a better world.

Mr. MACON offered some brief remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. followed at some length, in reply to Mr. WOODBURY.

Mr. VAN BUREN made some brief observations, and expressed a desire that the question might be taken at once. The vote being then taken on the motion of Mr. HAYNE, to fill the blank with 800,000 dollars, was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Berrien, Bouligny, Eaton, Harrison, Hayne, Johnson, of Ky. Johnston, of Lou. Knight, McLane, Marks, Parris, Robbins, Sanford, Silsbee, Smith, of Md. Van Buren, Webster, Woodbury.—19.

Mr. COBB then moved the indefinite postponement of the bill, which occasioned some conversation, in which Messrs. COBB, SMITH, of Md. HARRISON, NOBLE, and WOODBURY, took part, and the question being then taken, was decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Benton, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Cobb, Ellis, Foot, Hendricks, King, McKinley, Macon, Noble, Ridgely, Rowan, Ruggles, Smith, of South Carolina, Tazewell, Thomas, Willey, Williams.—22.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then moved to fill the blank with $500,000.

The question being taken on filling the blank with 500,000 dollars, was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the bill for the better organization of the Medical Department of the Navy was taken up.

Mr. HAYNE said it would be recollected that, when the bill to increase the pay of the Lieutenants of the Navy was under discussion, an honorable Senator from Georgia had moved to include, in the provisions of the bill, the Surgeons of the Navy. He had then remarked, that the Medical Department had been already under the consideration of the Committee, and was to be made the subject of a distinct measure. He believed the service required a separate organization of this department. The subject was considered maturely last year, and it was then deemed absolutely necessary, for the interest of the country, to re-organize the Medical branch of the Naval service. Mr. H. then went into an explanation of the bill as to its operation upon the Navy, in encouraging scientific men to enter the service; and spoke in high terms of its beneficial effects in bringing into that department individuals who would otherwise refuse to enter it from the scantiness of the emoluments.

Messrs. CHANDLER and MACON opposed the bill; which was defended by Mr. HARRISON; when it passed to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was ordered that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to lease certain lots therein mentioned, (connected with the lead mines in Illinois,) was taken up, and after having been amended so as to fix the penalty of the Superintendent, in case of non-performance of his duty, at 20,000 dollars, the blank, relating to his salary having been filled with 1,500 dollars, and a proviso having been added to exclude any allowance for Clerk hire, the bill was, on motion of Mr. BENTON, ordered to be laid on the table.

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1828.

PREVENTION OF DESERTION.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill to prevent desertion in the Army, and for other purposes, was taken up—an amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, as a substitute for the original bill, being under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON explained the objects of the bill. The increase which it would effect in the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates, was absolutely necessary, as had been demonstrated by the great number of desertions which had taken place in the Army for several years. The additional pay of the soldiers was graduated in such a manner, as to prove an inducement for them to remain in the service; and it was found, by far the greater number of those who deserted, were among the newly enlisted. This additional pay was also to remain in the hands of the Government, until the expiration of the terms for which they enlisted, as a pledge for their good conduct. The bill for which this was a substitute, was thought liable to objection on account of the increase of expenditure which it would require. But no such objection could be found with this, as the additional expenditure would not require a sum equal to that lost yearly by desertions. The average loss by the present habit of desertion, was upwards of 62,000 dollars. The increase of pay provided for by this bill is 57,000 dollars. Thus, if the object in view should have been effected, 5,000 dollars would be saved. There were two instances within the knowledge of the committee, of individuals who had enlisted five times within 1825 and '6, in order to obtain the bounty money. By the arrangement now proposed, the soldier would have, at the end of his term of enlistment, a considerable sum of money. This was considered a great inducement to honest respectable young men to join the army, and would have a tendency to elevate the condition of the privates. As to the non-commissioned officers, he had, on a former occasion, endeavored to show that they were worse paid in our army, than in any of the armies of European nations, from whom we borrowed our military system. In the French service there was an intermediate officer between the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, known as an adjutant sub-officer, who did the duty of our first sergeant, and who were respectively paid. Indeed all the non-commissioned officers were far better paid than ours. Comparing the pay of our officers to those in the English service, it was much in favor of the English. Besides, sergeants could be promoted: and in the Peninsular war, that great warrior, Lord Wellington, had two officers in each company, called cor-sergeants, who were well paid, and the office was considered so desirable, that it was much sought after. It was true, the present bill proposed no such arrangement; but it was thought that, by increasing the pay, respectable men would be willing to enter the army. The fifth section of the bill proposed a new principle in our army; and the reasons for it, he would briefly state. Several of our subordinate posts were situated at a great distance from the commanding officer. The consequence was, that, often, when a soldier had been guilty of some trivial offence, he was necessarily kept in prison for a long period of time, until a Court Martial could be convened, or he could be sent to a distance to be tried. It was, therefore, thought advisable to allow, on such occasions, the commander of the post to assemble Courts Martial for the trial of offences committed in the garrison. This was highly recommended by the Inspectors of the army, in their examinations last year. There was another novelty in the bill, which arose from a similar necessity. Where a sufficient number of commissioned officers were not stationed at a post to constitute a Court Martial, it was proposed to call in a non-commissioned officer to complete the number. He believed this was common in the French service. There could be no danger in adopting the system, and it would obviate many difficulties. Many non-commissioned officers were men of character and intelligence, and when their pay should have been increased, a higher grade of men would be willing to take the office, and the rank would be placed on a better footing. Besides, when they found a principle adopted in monarchical Governments, that would allow the advancement of the non-commissioned officers, they could safely rely upon its having been adopted for the benefit of the service.

The amendment reported by the committee was then agreed to.

SENATE.]

Prevention of Desertion.

[MARCH 17, 1828.]

Mr. HAYNE said, that he was far from being satisfied with that provision which proposed to admit the non-commissioned officers to sit upon Courts Martial. It struck him as being a bad plan. There was an evident distinction between commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and which could not be safely broken down. The latter mingled with the soldiers, and imbibed prejudices which would make it difficult for them to render impartial judgment, at least in the opinion of those upon whose trials they would sit. He would, if in order, move to strike out that part of the bill.

The CHAIR remarked, that the amendment had been agreed to in Committee of the Whole. When the bill was reported to the Senate, the gentleman would have an opportunity of making his motion.

Mr. HAYNE said, that he would move, at a proper time, to strike out, if he did not see reasons why this provision should be made.

Mr. HARRISON then moved to fill the first blank in the bill, with the sum of $ 10, (the monthly pay of the first-sergeants.)

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, for many years, Congress had gone on increasing the expense of the army, by beginning with the pay of the lower officers, and bringing it up so near to the next higher grade, that it soon became necessary to raise that also. He thought raising the pay of the first sergeants from 10 to 15 dollars was too great a change. He moved to fill the blank with 13 dollars.

Mr. HARRISON observed, that the committee had not been unanimous on this subject. But, as the bill proposed to prevent desertion, it was thought proper to raise the pay so far as to induce respectable men to take the office. He had never had an opportunity of conversing with a Captain of the Army, who did not admit that the effect of the measure would be most beneficial. Only a few days since, a gentleman, whose name he thought it proper to mention—Capt. Taylor, of Old Point Comfort—informed that he had paid 150 dollars, from his own pocket, to induce a first sergeant under him to remain in the service, so very valuable were his services.

The remaining blanks in the bill were then filled, as stated below, and the following bill was reported to the Senate :

"Sec. 1. And be it enacted, &c. That the monthly pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and artificers of the army, shall be regulated and fixed as follows, to wit: To each sergeant-major, quartermaster-sergeant, chief musician, and first sergeant of a company, — dollars; to all other sergeants, thirteen dollars; to each corporal, ten dollars; to each musician, eight dollars; to each artificer ten dollars.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the monthly pay of each private soldier who may be hereafter enlisted, he shall be entitled to receive, during the first two years of his first enlistment, 50 cents; during the third year of said enlistment, one dollar; and if he re-enlist for the term of five years, one dollar fifty cents: Provided, That the additional monthly pay herein provided for, be retained until the expiration of the term of each enlistment, when, upon being entitled to an honorable discharge, the sum so retained shall be paid to the soldier, or, if he die in service, to his legal representatives.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first term of enlistment of each effective able-bodied citizen of the United States, shall be limited to three years, and all subsequent re-enlistments to five years.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the twelfth section of the act, entitled "An Act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," passed the 14th of March, 1802, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the 66th article of war shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended, that the commanding officers of such garrisons, forts, barracks, or other places that may be designated by the President of the United States, may assemble Courts Martial, to consist of three members, (inclusive of the President,) and decide upon their sentences.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That a sergeant-major, a quartermaster sergeant, or the first sergeant of a company, may sit as a member of a regimental or garrison court martial: Provided, That the requisite number of commissioned officers are not present and for duty at the post where the court martial shall be ordered to convene."

Mr. HAYNE then moved to amend the bill by striking out the 6th section.

Mr. HARRISON opposed the motion, and asked the gentleman from South Carolina, whether it would not be better, when the requisite number of commissioned officers were not within reach, to constitute a court consisting of two commissioned and one non-commissioned officer, than that a soldier should lay in prison for a long period of time, until a court could be convened, or that it should be necessary to transport him two or three hundred miles to be tried?

Mr. SMITH, of Md., suggested a modification of the section, to confine the number of non-commissioned officers allowed to sit upon courts martial, to one.

Mr. HAYNE said, that a garrison court martial required only three officers, and wherever there was a company, there would be a sufficient number of commissioned officers. But, aside from any convenience which might be the result of the measure, he considered that its effects would be demoralizing, and lead to much evil. He thought any step which should break down the distinction between commissioned and non-commissioned officers, as of a dangerous tendency. There always had been a distinction, and it was necessary that there should be. They were taken from different classes of society, and were men of different habits and manners. There was another objection which he thought insuperable. The commission of the commissioned officer was his property, and it gave him an independence which the non-commissioned officer could not possess. The latter was the creature of his superior officers, liable to be discharged by them, and depending much upon them. It was impossible that he could possess the feelings and independence to enable him to be an impartial judge; and, said Mr. H. I repeat again, that they mix too much with the soldiers, to perform their duty in a satisfactory manner. They would be very liable to have prejudices, which would, more or less, operate upon their judgments, and would give great dissatisfaction to the soldiers. Mr. H. said, he recollected being in a garrison where there was a first sergeant, who was as good an officer in his grade as he ever knew; and he was exactly in this position—about one-half of the soldiers were his friends, and the other half his enemies. Under such circumstances, the soldiers would not be satisfied by decisions given by such an individual, although they would be willing to be tried by their superiors, who could have no private feelings towards them.

Mr. CHANDLER thought the arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina reasonable. He had rather that the section should be struck out; but, if it was retained, he hoped that it would be modified according to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HARRISON then offered the following proviso to the 6th section:

"Provided, That there shall not be more than one non-commissioned officer on any Garrison or Regimental Court Martial."

Internal Improvement.

[SENATE.]

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina were mainly correct; but there were cases in which the difficulties would render the admission of non-commissioned officers absolutely necessary. For instance, at a post where there were two officers and a subaltern, if a Captain ordered a Court Martial, the soldier to be tried must remain in prison until an officer could be sent for to a distant part of the country. This would create great discontent, and lead to desertion.

Mr. HAYNE repeated, that, wherever a company was stationed there would be three officers, unless they had been reduced; in which case, a delay of a short time would take place. He hoped the section would be stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON said, there were many posts which were held by less than full companies, and where three officers were not required. He never knew a Captain who did not treat a faithful first sergeant with as much respect as he did an ensign; and indeed, his services were much more important; and there were instances where a summary decision was necessary, which could not be had unless this measure were adopted.

After some further conversation between Messrs. SMITH, of Md., HAYNE, and HARRISON,

Mr. CHANDLER moved to strike out the words "first sergeant."

Mr. BENTON made a few remarks in opposition to the 6th section.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. CHANDLER; which was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. HAYNE, to strike out the section, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The general Orders of the Day were then taken up, and the Senate considered the bill to grant certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahawba, and Black Warrior Rivers.

Mr. McKINLEY said, that this bill had been presented by him, in anticipation of a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, which had since been received, and in accordance with which the committee had reported some amendments. It was scarcely necessary for him to urge upon the Senate, the importance of the proposed improvements; and he had hoped, ere this, to have been able to lay before the Senate the Report of the Engineer Department, upon the surveys which had been made last year. But the ill health of the person whose duty it was to draw up the Report, had prevented him from performing it. He would merely state, that the population, above the Large Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River, had no advantage of the navigation of the river, except during a short period in each year, when the waters were uncommonly high. The plan of improvement was practicable, and promised most beneficial results. The large shoal was ten miles long; and the river, at that point, spreads itself from one mile to two miles in width, obstructed by islands and rocks. The shore was a high bluff, and two or three streams emptied into the Tennessee, which would be sufficient feeders for the projected canal. The plan was, to throw a wall along the bluff, thereby forming a navigable canal. The expense for improving this passage, must necessarily be great. There were other points of less importance, and which would cost, comparatively, but small sums. A single glance at the map, must convince any one of the great importance of this plan to West Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama. He hoped that the same kind of appropriation of lands would be made, as, during the last session, was made, for canals in Illinois and Indiana. He knew that there had been much controversy upon the powers of Congress to make improvements in the interior; and that the doctrine was held by some, that, although they had the power to improve the seaboard, by widening channels, erecting breakwaters, and clearing out harbors, they could not go into the inland sections of the country and perform the same offices, by improving rivers, making roads and canals, &c. It appeared that the hostilities on this question, arose out of the contest for State Rights. It was a question chiefly raised by the Old States. But it was one in which the various sections of the country were not equally interested. It would be observed, that the very condition upon which the New States were admitted into the Union, was, that they should have no sovereignty over the lands. The lands were owned by the United States; we, of the New States, have no authority over them; and I should suppose that those who are the strictest in their construction of the Constitution, would find no difficulty in granting the public domain for purposes like those pointed out in the bill. It was an every day practice for the United States to prosecute individuals for trespasses on the lands owned by the General Government—nor by these proceedings was it pretended that the sovereignty of the States was invaded. There seemed, therefore, no objection to the application of these lands to improving the country in which they lie. In the State of Alabama, the United States now held between twenty-eight and twenty-nine millions of acres, the Indian title to which had not yet been extinguished. On the South side of the River Tennessee, in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, there was an immense tract of public lands, comprising nearly the whole of the county of Jackson. There were also large tracts on the North side of the river, occupied chiefly by the Indians. There could be no doubt that it was for the interest of the United States, that the access to and from those lands should be improved. It would open them to new and increased settlements, and from the extent and importance of the improvement proposed, it would stand among the first works of a national character.

Mr. BRANCH briefly opposed the bill, and wished more information as to the expenditure which would be required.

Mr. McKINLEY, in reply, observed, that the work would require a large appropriation. As to the value of the lands, it was quite uncertain; but it had been supposed that half a million of dollars would complete the object. Four hundred thousand acres of land was the amount fixed upon, as it was not supposed that the lands would bring a greater price hereafter, than they had already brought. Appropriations of the same amount had been made last year for the canal in Illinois, and also for that in Indiana.

Mr. CHANDLER said, he hoped the gentleman would not press this measure at the present time; but wait until the report, to which he alluded, should have been laid before the Senate. They ought not to act in the dark upon a bill so important. The report might be had before Congress rose, and it was quite necessary, as it was not possible to tell, without it, whether the plan would cost more or less than the sum proposed. The gentleman could hardly expect that the Senate would make an appropriation of 500,000 dollars, without some information upon the subject. He wished to act with his eyes open; and must, under present circumstances, vote against the bill.

Mr. KING said, that if he had any idea that the gentleman from Maine would vote for the bill under any circumstances, or with any information, he should not be unwilling to delay it until the report should have been brought in for his advantage. But, as the gentleman had uniformly voted against similar measures—and as every man, who knew the geography of the country, must be struck with the necessity of the works proposed, and the vast benefit which must arise from their completion, he really could not indulge the gentleman in consenting to postpone the consideration of the bill. He was very desirous that the estimates should be had; but the illness of the individual to whom the duty of making them up was entrusted, had prevented their completion. He had been told, by General Bernard, that he would give him a statement of the gross amount, but the minute estimates must yet, for some days, be delayed. That gentleman stated, that the importance of the projected improvement was immense. It might, perhaps, be considered a circumstance in favor of the appropriation, that Alabama had never received one foot of land for the construction of roads and canals, or for any other improvement. On the other hand she had appropriated large sums of money, from her own resources, for such objects. This work, in which she now asks for assistance, was one which did not alone promise benefit to her own citizens, but was a project of great national importance; and he hoped Congress would feel disposed to extend the same liberality to Alabama, as had been extended to other States. He hoped, if his friend from Maine could not bring himself to vote on the bill, under any circumstances, he would not obstruct its passage, but allow others to vote upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER said, it was true that he did not know as he should vote for the bill under any circumstances. But he thought the Senate ought to possess more information upon the subject than they now possessed, before they attempted to decide upon the appropriation.

Mr. NOBLE was understood to say, that it was not customary to pass bills of this description without having the estimates to go upon. But, as to the constitutional power, he did not know how it was that the Constitution read differently in Maine and Alabama. How was it that they had a perfect right to make a military road in Maine, and no shadow of power to make a canal in Alabama? He would ask what clause in the Constitution authorized the construction of a military road? There was no such clause. But, then, it was done under the power of regulating the army. It was easy enough to construe the Constitution when this road was to be constructed. When Kennebeck, or Kennebunk, or whatever it might be called, was interested, the leaves of the Constitution, in which the gentleman from Maine's scruples were to be found, were frozen together by his Northern predilections. It has been argued that the benefits of improvement had not been equally bestowed. The gentleman from North Carolina complained that his State had received nothing. But, said Mr. N., we cannot give them any thing if they will not ask it—although I believe there is a bill now before the Senate for an outlet, or an inlet, I do not recollect which, in that State. He was for it. He would vote for assistance wherever it was wanted. He was friendly to the wishes of Alabama; and would as soon vote for the canal they stand in need of as for the military road in Maine. He wished the gentleman from Maine would get up in his place, and enlighten him as to the difference of the Constitution in one State and in another. For his own part, he considered its operation uniform. He did not wish to have the Constitution always brought in, until it should at last be eaten up with talking, and be considered of little importance from everlasting recurrence to it. He believed that some of those whose consciences were so tender, might be sincere; but his principle was, to extend equal benefits to all parts of the country. He did not wish to be told, whenever appropriations were proposed, that there was no State but Maine in which the Constitution operated, and that its particular province was somewhere about Kennebeck or Kennebunk. He wanted to extend the benefits of the Constitution to all the different sections of the country. If not, abolish it at once, and get rid of this eternal dispute upon it.

Mr. BRANCH made some remarks.

Mr. M'KINLEY then handed to the Secretary a rough estimate, received from the Chief Engineer, of the expenses of the improvement contemplated by the bill; which was read.

Mr. COBB said, that he should deem it his duty to vote against this bill, as he did for those making appropriations for the Illinois and Indiana Canals. The doctrine which he held, had been formerly expressed in this House, against appropriations by the General Government for the purposes of Internal Improvement. They were, he knew, unfashionable doctrines. But these considerations he now discarded; and put his opposition to the bill upon a different ground altogether. He objected to it because it was a direct violation of the compact entered into at the admission of Alabama into the Union. The grant of the Territory to the United States, was not an unconditional grant. What was the object of this bill? It was an unconditional grant to the State of Alabama of a quantity of land, for the peculiar benefit of that State. By the articles of cession between Georgia and the United States, it was agreed that those lands should remain as a common fund for the benefit of the United States, Georgia included; and it was added, in that instrument, that they should "be faithfully disposed of for no other purposes." The question then presented by this bill, was, does it violate the articles of cession? We are about to dispose of this land. How? Are we applying it to the common use of the United States, Georgia included; and for no other purpose? No. I say it is to be disposed for the benefit of Alabama, and for no other part of the country whatever. He knew that it would be said, that it was for the benefit of the United States, because it would increase the price of the public lands, and promote their settlement; and that Georgia would share in these advantages. That this was a fallacious method of reasoning, and similar to that which was always resorted to, when the violation of any compact was contemplated. He wished the gentleman who had introduced this bill to take up the articles of cession, and satisfy himself relative to the compact between Georgia and the General Government.

Mr. M'KINLEY said he could not see what the compact between Georgia had to do with a grant of land for the purposes of Internal Improvement. He thought differently from the gentleman from Georgia, as to this grant being solely for the benefit of the State of Alabama. He understood that it was for the benefit of the whole United States, and for all its citizens who had any trade in the waters of the Western States. Do we understand, said Mr. McK., that works which are for national purposes, are for the benefit of any particular State? If the line was drawn, he wished to know where it would begin, and, if drawn at all, it ought to extend to the exclusion of all parts of the country. If they were not to make any appropriations for the improvement of natural obstructions to intercourse, let it extend also to the sea-board. It was, indeed, a strange doctrine, that allowed the improvement of harbors and rivers on the coast, yet denied the right to apply the same measures to the interior. Were the Western States to be looked upon as half sisters only of this Union? They were certainly restricted in their rights. The old States enjoyed full sovereignty over the territory within their limits. We are crippled in our sovereignty; and are we to be excluded from any grant of land to improve our waters? If the gentleman from Georgia had compared the compact with the Constitution, he would have found that such a provision as he alluded to would have been in violation of the Constitution, which was in full force when those articles of cession were drawn up. He wondered why the gentleman had not, on the passage of former bills of this kind, thought them violations of the compact between Virginia and the United States.

Mr. COBB here observed that he had thought so, and he had mentioned his opinions.

Mr. McKINLEY resumed. He wished to know why the donations of land for universities, for a seat of Government, and for schools, were not equally violations of the compact as this appropriation, which was allowed to be for a national object. He hoped the People of the West were not to be considered less the brothers of the Union than those on the sea-coast; and that the same measure of justice would be awarded to all the different sections of the country.

Mr. COBB said that, if the gentleman from Alabama had noticed his former remarks, he would have observed that he declared having now the same objections to this bill as he had last year to those for canals in Illinois and Indiana. He had then offered the same opposition to those bills; and he thought still, that they were as much violations of the compact with Virginia, as this bill would be of that with Georgia. He desired that, when the gentleman declared that the compact was not valid, he would demonstrate the truth of his assertion. I heartily wish that it could be proved so, that Georgia might have back the territory which she disposed of to the United States. Then, if Alabama and Mississippi were restored to us, we should indeed be a grand State, and have some weight in the Union. He would ask the gentleman by what rule he considered this a national object. A national object! when we grant land to the State of Alabama, a single State, for certain purposes in which she alone is interested! The gentleman says it will benefit a number of States; but he certainly had forgotten that the bill provided for the collection of a toll by the State of Alabama. This is my understanding of the bill. If I am in error, the gentleman can inform me.

Mr. McKINLEY said, the gentleman was in error—the bill only proposed that no toll should be collected upon the property of the United States.

Mr. COBB resumed. What did such an exemption signify, but that a toll should be collected on the citizens of the States, from which the Government should be free? This clause could have no other meaning. The only question that I put to the Senate is: Does not this violate the compact? He admitted that the articles of cession had never been treated with much regard. He knew, also, that the United States had violated them on all occasions. The State Governments alone had regarded them. He only asked whether these public lands, which were to be given to the State of Alabama, would by this act be retained as a common fund for the benefit of the United States, Georgia included? If it was, then his objection to the bill was unfounded. If it was not, he was borne out in his opposition.

Mr. McKINLEY observed, that the United States was the great land-holder of the West. If any other landholder wished to enhance the value of his lands, he would find it expedient to improve the roads and canals through his domain. If this principle was admitted, then the position follows that the United States would be benefited by the improvement of the navigation of the streams that border on the Public Lands, Georgia would, in common with the other States, derive benefit from such a disposal of the Territory ceded by her to the United States, and hence the articles would be adhered to. The objection applied to every other new State, as well as to Alabama; and he trusted her claims to the same benefits as had been extended to other States, would not be denied to Alabama.

Mr. RUGGLES spoke in favor of the bill. He considered the improvements proposed by it as interesting to the whole Union, and compared it to fortifications, which might be erected for the defence of some particular city; but also contributed to the protection of the whole country.

Several amendments were then adopted.

Mr. McKINLEY moved to amend, by inserting a provision for exempting all persons in the service of the United States, and the citizens of all other States in the Union, from tolls, unless authorized by an act of Congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. KING moved to fill two blanks in the bill, so as to enjoin upon the State of Alabama to commence the prosecution of the works within two years, and to complete it within ten years. Agreed to.

The bill having been reported to the Senate, was briefly advocated by Mr. BENTON, and opposed by Mr. COBB; when the question being taken on engrossing, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Johnson of Ky. Johnston, of Lou. Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Smith, of Md. Webster, White, Williams.—22.

SETTLEMENT OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of S. C., the bill to provide for the final settlement of private land claims in the several States and Territories was taken up, and, having been read,

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., moved that the bill be read by sections, which was agreed to, and the first section was amended, on motion of Mr. S.

Mr. MACON objected to the provision in the 5th section, which provided for the sitting of Commissioners in the City of Washington. He thought it would be very inconvenient.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C. said, that the Committee took into consideration that many of the States were unhealthy. In Washington there would be security to health, and the reports, for many years, of committees on these various claims, would be at hand. The great object of the committee was to settle, finally, these claims. If any better plan than that proposed, could be fixed upon, he should acquiesce in it.

Mr. MACON made no motion, and the reading progressed.

Mr. CHANDLER remarked, that, in the 11th section there was established a right of appeal to the Supreme Court, by individuals. But there was no such provision in favor of the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., observed, that he would acquiesce in any amendment which the gentleman from Maine would offer.

Mr. BARTON moved to amend, by inserting the words "United States or;" so that the United States, or any claimant, may have the right of appeal, &c.; which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., moved to fill the blank (salaries of the Commissioners,) with 3,000 dollars. Agreed to.

The blanks for the salary of the Law Agent and Secretary were then filled with 2,000 and 1,500 dollars. The blank for the salary of the Clerk was filled with $1,200.

Mr. KING said, he thought the bill had not been sufficiently examined; there appeared to be many inaccuracies. There was one in the 17th section, in which claimants were allowed to settle on lands not located. It certainly was not intended that they might locate on any part of the Public Lands. He wished explanation.

SENATE.]

Settlement of Private Land Claims.

[MARCH 18, 1838.]

Mr. BARTON said, there were a number of tracts of land called concessions, which were pointed out by this part of the bill.

Mr. KING said, he was not satisfied; there were no boundaries fixed, no tracts specified.

Mr. BERRIEN said, it might happen that the United States would have disposed of some of the lands which would be decided by this tribunal as by right the property of the claimants. It was considered just, that, in such cases, other lands should be awarded to the claimants, in lieu of those of which they had been divested.

Mr. KING said, that they were permitted to locate wherever they pleased. The provision was too loose.

Mr. BERRIEN replied, that when, by the judgment of this tribunal, it should be found that an individual has a claim to land under the Spanish Government, the bill provided that he should take an equivalent portion of land. The manner in which it should be done would be settled by the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said, that an amendment might be made to render the provision more explicit. It was clear that, if a party made his title good before this tribunal, he ought to be enabled to enjoy the benefit of such a claim.

Mr. HAYNE said, that, if the gentlemen who were interested in the bill were satisfied with its provisions, he had no objection to it. But there was a class of claims to which he thought it would be injurious. They had been favorably decided upon already by a Board of Commissioners; and it was unnecessary that they should be gone over again. He offered an amendment to the close of the bill, providing that the claims of citizens of the United States to lands in the State of Louisiana, under titles from the British Government in West Florida, which had not been regranted by the Spanish Government, are confirmed, with a proviso that they do not conflict with the laws of the United States.

Mr. KANE said, that the cases alluded to by the amendment were very numerous, and had been frequently examined, but not satisfactorily settled. The policy of the Government had dictated the division of these claims into two classes, of large and small. On some of the large ones, Commissioners had also reported favorably. But, if the British claims were to be taken up and decided upon favorably, because Commissioners have reported in their favor, the same decision must be extended to all claims under the same circumstances. There was no reason for deciding favorably upon these claims, and turning others over to the tribunal established by this bill. He had heard no argument that would induce him to deal differently with the British claims than with all the others. He thought the whole ought to be referred to the Commissioners.

Mr. HAYNE read a report of a Committee of the Senate, in the case of Elihu Hall Bay, and others, which he observed was a better argument than he could make. By this report, it appeared that the claims were established by the most convincing testimony, yet it was proposed to send them back to a similar tribunal to that by which they had formerly been decided. He held in his hand an act of Congress of 1812, by which a similar confirmation was made of titles, under the same circumstances, and the amendment which he now offered, was in the very words of that act. The lands settled by that act, were situated exactly as those were, the title to which the amendment proposed to confirm. They were separated from them only by a line, and why should not the same decision be made in this as in the other cases? The gentleman from Illinois had said that these cases were very numerous. Mr. H. said he was acquainted with but few claims of this kind; and he did not think the whole amounted to over 70,000 acres. He did not wish to interfere in the general provisions of the bill. He was willing to vote for any measure for the settlement of such of these claims, which still required examination. But, he wished that it might be so framed, as not to interfere with third persons; and that those claims which had already been settled, might not be sent back to undergo a second investigation.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that the claims alluded to by the amendment, had been decided on by a Board of Commissioners. But this bill provided for an appeal to the Supreme Court, and he should have more confidence in the decision of that Court, than on that of any Board of Commissioners. He was, therefore, against the amendment, and desirous that all the claims should be tried alike.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, that the amendment appeared to him inexpedient and improper. If Congress attempted to decide on any of the claims on which Commissioners had reported favorably, that decision must extend to the whole number of cases so situated. If they adopted the report of a Board of Commissioners in one case, they were bound to adopt all the reports made by them. They had been formerly before Congress—and if the report upon them was now to be taken up, it ought to be sent to the Land Committee. He understood that, in Florida, these claims had been rejected; but that they had been allowed in Louisiana. It was questionable which of these decisions ought to be adopted by Congress. In the bill, it was provided that all the papers should be transferred to the Board of Commissioners, so that there will be no necessity for any provision for obtaining evidence, or to draw a line between this or any other class of claimants. It was his opinion, that, if the report of the Commissioners on the British claims, was to be confirmed by the Senate, it ought to be done by a distinct resolution, upon which it would be the duty of the Committee on Public Lands to report. If it was introduced into this bill, it ought to go the whole length, and include all claims similarly decided upon.

Mr. SMITH of S. C. supported the amendment. Several small bills, he observed, had been wound off of this general one. A few days since, a bill was passed, to settle land claims in Mississippi—and this morning, the gentleman from Louisiana had introduced a bill for the adjustment of the three largest claims on the whole list. He should suppose, under such circumstances, this proposition would not be opposed. The gentleman from Illinois has said, that these British grants need to be examined again. He was of a different opinion. They were mostly similar to those included in the bill framed for the settlement of claims in Mississippi, and their amount, as well as number, were much less than the gentleman seemed to suppose. Individuals in Louisiana, who were entitled to those grants, had been obliged to obtain evidence in support of their claims; and now they would be obliged, unless this amendment were adopted, to go back, and prove their claims anew. Great injury might be inflicted by such a course. The claimants might be kept out of their lands twenty-four years longer—and, if they are now entitled to them, they were entitled to them at the time of the treaty. A gentleman of the other House had made the declaration that all the claims in Louisiana might be paid with the sums that had been expended in endeavoring to recover them. He would appeal to the Senate whether this was a correct course to incorporate those claims which had been established, with those of a doubtful nature. He thought these cases as worthy of a separate decision as those which had been included in the bill for the settlement of Mississippi claims, or as those to be provided for by the bill introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana, involving a sum of three millions. He believed that those very claims had been reported against by Mr. Gallatin, in the strongest manner. Yet they were to have the benefit of a separate bill. He knew of no objection to the adoption of the amendment offered by his colleague, and he trusted it would be agreed to.

Mr. KANE said, that he was of the Committee who framed a bill, on a former occasion, in favor of these claims. He recollected it well; he had examined the claims thoroughly, and he came, after considerable trouble, to the conclusion, that they were just. But, he was not willing that a peculiar class of claims should be allowed the preference; because the object of this bill is to settle every class. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that this class was settled, because a Board of Commissioners had reported favorably upon it, if you add this provision to the bill, there are other cases equally strong; and if the whole are confirmed by the Senate, the object of the bill is destroyed. The greatest part of the claims had been reported upon, and it would be as reasonable to provide for the confirmation of all those reports as of one. Congress had settled the principle that it can not enter into the merits of those claims, as it is contrary to its spirit. Congress had decided that these questions were too interesting and too difficult to be hastily or carelessly settled—and he knew no question of law half so difficult as that which these claims presented. Then the question was, not whether these claims were valid or not; but whether you will give them the preference of others, and exempt them from a tribunal charged with the whole subject. It would be partial legislation to confirm the report of the Commissioners on the British grants, and turn over the Spanish claims to this tribunal. It would be recollected that there were certain conditions in the terms of the British grants, and that in many cases, those conditions were not complied with. How far this point had been examined by the Commissioners was worthy of investigation. He wished that no amendment might be adopted of the kind proposed, as he considered it destructive of the principle of the bill. Congress could not settle all the claims, but they could empower Commissioners to do so, and their examinations ought to extend to those of every class.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that the distinction attempted by the amendment, ought not to be made. Neither should the mode of legislation, which it would establish, be encouraged. The amendment conflicted with the principle on which the bill was founded; and the circumstances under which it was brought forward, gave it little claim to attention. A general bill to settle the claims of individuals, who held lands under other titles than those derived from the United States, had been reported at an early period, and was a short time since taken up, and made the order of the day for Monday. The Senate were called to the consideration of a plan for the establishment of a tribunal, for the settlement of all these claims, when they are asked to take up a report, in favor of a certain class of these claimants; and to decide in their favor. The subjects were disconnected, and conflicted with each other. The purpose of the gentleman from South Carolina conflicts with the principle of the bill. Why was it, that a bill was proposed? Because the decisions formerly made have not been satisfactory. Because the individuals hitherto appointed, have not possessed the legal knowledge necessary for the decision of questions of so delicate a nature. It was the object of the bill to establish a form which should relieve Congress from the responsibility of examining and deciding upon these difficult questions of law and right. The Senate was now called upon, by the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, to go into the merits of a set of claims, which he, for one, was prepared to say were not satisfactorily established. If they decided in favor of the report of the Commissioners, then they must extend their exemption to all other claims favorably reported upon. But it must be remembered that the tribunal to which these claims are to be referred, is of a different character from those which have hitherto examined and reported on them. It should also be recollected, that the Land Committee of Florida had formerly decided against the validity of titles founded on British grants. What, then, are we asked to do? The bill is to dispose of the whole of these land grants; yet, we are asked to affirm in favor of a peculiar class, which, although they have been reported on favorably by a Board of Commissioners, had been previously rejected by the Land Commissioners of Florida. These claims, then, were not so satisfactorily settled, as had been assumed. The cases would be more satisfactorily decided by the tribunal which was to be established. If they decided in favor of a claim, the individual would have the benefit of it. Hitherto, the examination of these cases had been fruitless—they went again to Congress, and only the larger claims were taken up. Thus, these claims stood on the footing of other claims which had been reported on; and to what hardships were they subjected, under which the larger claims did not suffer? The evidence in these cases were filed away in the archives of the country, would be brought forward, and would be taken as prima facie testimony in their favor. It was true that, if it was not considered sufficient, the claims might be rejected—and it was to be hoped they would. The meaning of the bill was this: It institutes a court to do that, which Congress, by its formation and character, is unfitted to do. It constitutes a tribunal comprising the knowledge and skill necessary to lead to correct decisions; and possessing the power to give the benefit of those decisions to those in whose favor they are made. Congress would be exempted by this measure, from all further applications, because the bill provides that negligence on the part of claimants for a certain period, shall constitute a bar to them, or their heirs, from claiming thereafter. Instead of doing this, the Senate was now called upon to make this decision itself, upon a class of cases, on which conflicting decisions have been made by different tribunals. Were they ready to declare in favor of the report of the Commissioners against the Land Commissioners of Florida? [from the report of whom he read the concluding passage.] He thought when these claims were so doubtfully sustained by one class of Commissioners against another, it would be better to allow them to go, with other cases of a similar nature, to a competent tribunal, by which they might be investigated and finally settled.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said a few words in reply to Mr. BERRIEN.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

On motion of Mr. MARKS, the bill making appropriations for the construction of a Breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware Bay, was taken up, and the question being on engrossing the bill for a third reading—

Mr. FOOT rose and said:

So far as protection to our commerce against the dangers of the sea will be afforded by the construction of a Breakwater in the Delaware Bay—so far the bill will receive my cordial support.

The numerous petitions presented on this subject, among which, the Senator from Delaware has kindly informed me, are several from my own State, ask nothing more. Not being much of a military character myself, (said Mr. F.) I feel little solicitude or ambition to rival Roman glory, in the language of the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) and still less do I wish to see the People of these United States carried away by the fascinations of military pomp or renown, and certainly nothing can be further from the views of our merchants and ship owners, who have merely asked us to construct a Breakwater, which will afford their vessels a temporary retreat and security against the storms which are frequent on our coast, than the erection of a work which, at the lowest estimate, will cost 2,300,000 dollars, and create a necessity for the erection of fortifications, involving, perhaps, an expense of several millions more. They have heard enough of Rip Raps and Pea Patches—they have not asked for a harbor for the Navy, nor for more fortifications!

Sir, it does appear to me that those who are most zealously engaged in the splendid scheme of fortifying the whole extent of our coast, might be satisfied, at least for the present, with the plans already adopted for the protection of our harbors against an enemy—involving, by estimate, an expense of nearly thirty millions of dollars in fortifications, and requiring for their defence an army of about 70,000 men when completed.

By adverting to the report of the Engineers, it appears to be their direct opinion that the partial Breakwater, proposed by them, will afford equal protection to our merchant vessels, at the expense of about 220,000 dollars, as will be afforded by the artificial harbor; and they recommend this, if the expense of the other is considered too great or unnecessary.

And now, sir, let me ask the Senate, if it can be necessary or expedient to construct artificial harbors for the Navy? How many harbors have already been fortified, and, as has been supposed, rendered impregnable, for the security of the Navy? And are we about to erect harbors in the open sea, and fortify them, to which our ships of war are to retreat from an enemy? Give them plenty of sea room and an equal force, and they have shown, both their friends and enemies, they want no place of retreat.

But, sir, this great and unnecessary expense is not my only objection to this artificial harbor—the form itself is to my mind very objectionable. Every person who has had experience of the effect of current or eddies, formed by obstructions of water, either natural or artificial, must, I think, be satisfied that the proposed harbor will very soon fill with the sediment, which is always deposited by contra currents or eddies, formed by obstructions of water, either natural or artificial. Look at the bars at the mouths of rivers—look at the harbors on the Lake shores—look at the wharves and piers in many of our harbors, and you may see the effects. And, sir, it is my decided opinion that in the course of a very few years the artificial harbor will not afford the protection which the partial Breakwater proposed, or even one of less dimensions will furnish—for this will not be exposed to the same deposit of sediment, or alluvion, from counter currents.

But, sir, I presume we shall unite in extending every facility and protection to our coasting trade, which its importance demands, at a reasonable expense.

The Senator from South Carolina, in opposing to this bill, has used one argument which deserves notice. I understood him to say: "Our commerce is nearly annihilated—we have lost the trade with the British colonies, and can never regain it:" and, therefore, he inferred the Breakwater was unnecessary. If, sir, this be the fact—if our foreign trade is decreasing, our domestic trade will of necessity increase—and with the increase of our coasting trade, the erection of a Breakwater for its protection, becomes vastly more important—for it is only in the coasting trade that the cotton, rice, and tobacco growers and the coasting traders have any immediate interest in the proposed Breakwater.

But if the Senator will examine the report of the Secretary, and compare the two last with preceding years, the number of tons of shipping and the amount of imports from the West Indies, I think he will come to a different conclusion. It is true our vessels are excluded from the British ports in the West Indies; and it is equally true that their vessels are excluded from all our ports, coming from the interdicted ports. So far, restriction meets restriction; and so far, I presume, we shall be ready to go with every nation which chooses this course, fearless of loss on our side; while we offer a free trade to every nation on terms of perfect reciprocity. And, sir, if the Senator had been in these same British ports, and witnessed the heavy exactions and humiliating impositions on our trade, and had been compelled to pay for shots fired at his own ship, and knew that we never had been permitted to land our salted provisions or any manufactured articles in her ports; and had not been permitted to take away her more valuable productions, sugar and coffee, he would, I think, cordially unite with me in saying to Great Britain: We ask no favors: we are perfectly satisfied with our present condition: for since the ratification of our treaty with Sweden, and the convention between Sweden and Great Britain, by which Swedish vessels and their cargoes are admitted in the British ports, subject to no higher duties than British vessels, our trade with those colonies, through the island of St. Bartholomew, will be better than it has ever been. We have the long carrying trade, and she is welcome to divide the short with the Swedish drogers, since we are relieved from the heavy charges in her ports.

And since the opening of the French islands and the new free ports in the English islands, by a late order in Council, our trade to the West Indies will be better, and furnish a better market for our produce, particularly provisions, than we have enjoyed since the general peace in Europe, unless the whiskey trade should induce a heavy tax on molasses; for the island of Cuba alone, receives more of our provisions than all Europe. And from Cuba and the French islands, most of the molasses is imported.

I hope some of the friends of the bill will so amend it as not to confine the President to the report of the Engineers, in the construction of the great artificial harbor, when I shall cheerfully vote in its favor—but cannot vote for a harbor for the Navy, or for more fortifications.

Mr. MARKS observed, that as to the shape the bill assumed, he believed it to be immaterial so that the object be accomplished, and whether it be left to the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt the plan and direct the superintendence, was a matter of indifference. The solicitude felt by the friends of the measure is, that this great improvement should be accomplished in a manner sufficient for the protection of the commerce of the city of Philadelphia and the other ports on the Delaware river.

In the course of the debate on this bill, a variety of objections have been urged against it, and not the least of which is the great expense the Government would be subjected to in erecting a Breakwater at a place so exposed as the mouth of the Delaware Bay.

He was aware that the magnitude of the sum required for the erection of the contemplated Breakwater, may deter some gentlemen from voting for the bill; he did not however, consider the sum to be advanced, as a donation from the Government, although it would be a large expenditure on its part. There would, in the end, be a saving to the country, by the security afforded to the commerce—more ample arguments in favor of the bill could not be formed, than the statements furnished by the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce; these statements contain the number of shipwrecks, loss, and disasters, within the Bay of Delaware, as well as in its neighbourhood, by vessels being driven into or out thereof by storm or by ice, and which would have been prevented, had there existed a place of shelter at its entrance.

Would any member of the Senate examine this statement and look back at the numerous wrecks which had occurred in the last ten years, they would be satisfied that the loss to the revenue within that period, was more in amount than would have completed a harbor that would have afforded complete protection to all the vessels navigating that great outlet to the ocean. We have it from official record, and facts derived from an actual registry, that between the first of January 1824, and the first of December 1825, no less than fifty-one vessels have suffered shipwreck, and all the property on board entirely lost, within ten miles of the contemplated Breakwater. The annual coasting trade to and from ports within the limits of the United States, carried on at Philadelphia by the packets which run regularly only, all of which pass in and out of Delaware Bay, taken for 1827, amounted to twenty-seven millions of dollars. This trade was increasing and it would increase.

But it is not the vessels which are engaged in the coasting trade as well as to all parts of the world, that are to be protected by the proposed harbor. Of the advantages which the Navy would derive from the larger of the proposed works, by one of our Navy officers, who was one of the Board of Engineers that examined the different sites and reported on the practicability and usefulness of the larger and the smaller Breakwaters, and as a better argument than any I can offer, I beg leave to read the letter of Com. Bainbridge to the Secretary of the Navy, on that subject.

Here Mr. M. read the following :

["The small Breakwater, or partial harbor, would not, in the opinion of the Board, afford any protection or shelter to the vessels of the Navy. There is not sufficient depth of water, even for the class of Sloops of War. It could not, therefore, become a place of resort for our vessels either in peace or war.

The large Breakwater in contemplation, may, in many views, be considered as offering important advantages to the vessels of the Navy, cruising along or approaching the coast; if cruising near the Capes of the Delaware, on the appearance of an easterly storm, vessels could, and would no doubt, avail themselves of such a harbor, to ride out the storm in safety, instead of contending with it on the ocean, where great damages, possibly a total loss, might occur. Without such a harbor to bear up for, where they might find protection against the storm, and shelter against the ice, they would continue at sea, and contend with its furies, in preference to contending with the dangers of ice. Hence, it is evident, that in time of peace, the large Breakwater would be of benefit to the vessels of our Navy.

In a state of war, these advantages would be greatly increased; a vessel of our Navy falling in with a superior force, might be saved by retreating to such a harbor, where protection against the enemy, and the wind and ice, would be found. For want of such a harbor, a vessel might be captured or stranded, in an effort to avoid a superior force.

Greatly more important will these advantages appear, when considered in reference to a squadron or fleet of our vessels—such a squadron cruising between New York and the Chesapeake, where an enemy's squadron might also be cruising. Suppose a storm to arise before the two squadrons could meet: ours could find shelter from the storm, while that of the enemy would be completely exposed to it; and when the storm should subside, our squadron would proceed in search of the enemy, who being most probably in a crippled state, would be easily found and easily vanquished.

Again, suppose an enemy's squadron to be cruising between New York and the Chesapeake, and that we have a squadron lying at New York, and another in Hampton Roads, each singly inferior, but when united, equal, or superior to the enemy—a junction becomes important, to enable us to contend with the enemy, and in order to effect it one of these squadrons sails for the port where the other may be riding; on its passage thither, it falls in with the enemy, and is pursued by them, but has time to arrive at the Great Breakwater, which it enters and is saved by the protection that work affords."]

As to the practicability of completing an artificial harbor, and the usefulness of such a harbor, after it is completed, we can only judge of it by comparing it with works of a similar nature, in other parts of the world. The Board of Engineers who made the survey and took the soundings of the bay, entertain no doubt as to the practicability of completing the work. The late Secretary of the Navy, William Jones, who perhaps understands nautical science as well as any man in the United States, and who himself had visited most of the improved harbors in Europe, and when comparing the situation of Cape Henlopen with that of Plymouth sound, entertains no doubt of the complete success that would attend the undertaking, and the astonishing effect it would produce on the commerce of the City of Philadelphia. William Strickland, who has as much practical information in civil Engineering as any man in the country, and who in a late tour through Europe, had visited many of the improved harbors, that gentleman in his report, compares the bay of Delaware to that of Kingston harbor near Dublin. The Breakwater and harbor of Kingston, he thinks well adapted to the circumstances of the Delaware bay. The situations are very similar, the same difficulties are to be combated in both cases, as the storms which drive into the bay of Dublin are full as violent as those which are known in the Delaware, and a work that has been practically tested in the one case, may be safely resorted to in the other.

An opinion appears to be entertained that the deposits of sand within the walls of the Breakwater would soon fill up the harbor, so as to prevent vessels from approaching its shelter. He apprehended little was to be feared of deposits being made by the flux and reflux of the pure sea water. If such a circumstance was to be apprehended, he thought it would not have escaped the notice of the Engineers who made the examination; indeed it had not escaped the notice of Mr. Strickland, and Mr. Jones, neither of whom entertained any apprehension. On that score, the latter gentleman says, that this evil is not to be apprehended in the case of a complete harbor being made near the pitch of the Capes, as the tides both ebb and flood, run with rapidity parallel to the shore, over the bed of the proposed harbor, which it will sweep clean; but he might say, we have had practical experience on this subject. Some ten or twelve years since, the Legislature of Pennsylvania appropriated 25 or 30,000 dollars to erect piers in the river Delaware, at Chester, for the protection of vessels when the river is obstructed by ice. These piers have stood to the present day, although erected ten or twelve years since. He had never seen them, but had correct information that they run out directly from the main shore, so that they meet the tide in full array, which was not proposed in the plan of the Breakwater, which would be opposed obliquely to the current. He had been informed that no collection of sand had taken place about the piers at Chester, and small as they were, several valuable vessels had been saved from destruction by the shelter they afforded.

He would call the attention of the Senate to the inconsiderable appropriations heretofore made for the protection of the commerce of the city of Philadelphia, when compared with those so liberally extended to her sister States. By a document from the Treasury Department, a statement is made of the nett amount of revenue derived from imports, and tonnage, received by the Treasury from several of the principal ports and bays of the United States; reckoning from the first of January 1790, to the last of December 1825, and the amount of expenditures paid from the Treasury for Forts, Light Houses, Beacons, and other public works, erected to aid commerce, or for the purposes of defence within these bays. By this statement we find the revenue from the Bay of

Mr. President, the average of the annual revenue collected at the port of Philadelphia, amounts to four millions of dollars, and when it is considered, that the one half of the revenue for a single year, would afford full protection to the shipping interest on which these duties are levied, that the same protection would extend its benefits to the coasting trade of the States generally, he did believe the Senate would see the propriety of passing the bill.

There is no line of coast so extensive, and so much navigated as that between the Capes of Virginia and New York, without a harbour to afford shelter to vessels from storms; already millions have been lost, as well as many lives, for want of such a protection as the Breakwater would afford.

Mr. KANE said he had waited under the expectation that some gentleman who had this measure at heart, would move to amend the bill in one particular; gentlemen had so far succeeded in convincing him of the importance of this work, as to have obtained his vote for a large appropriation; but this bill required him to go further and adopt a particular plan, which was the most expensive of any which had been submitted. Two plans had been adverted to, and principally relied on; the one submitted by the Board of Engineers, and the other by Mr. STRICKLAND; the plan of the latter, according to his estimate, would cost less than the one adopted by that bill, by more than a million of dollars. Now, said Mr. K. if I am required to decide upon the excellence of either of these plans, from the weight of character employed in recommending them, I should hesitate to decide upon the relative merits of the Board of Engineers, and of that accomplished Architect and finished Engineer, Mr. Strickland of Philadelphia. I will therefore, said Mr. K. move to strike out of the first section of the bill, so much thereof as confines the Secretary of the Treasury to the particular plan of the Engineers,

Mr. WOODBURY was disposed to believe, that the President would fix either upon the plan proposed by Mr. Strickland or by that recommended by the Board of Engineers. For his part, he thought it would be impolitic to make a temporary Breakwater, because, in that case, though the expense would be considerably less than either of the other plans suggested, yet the benefit to be derived would not correspond even with that, small as it was. He was unwilling to put the responsibility of the selection on the President.

Mr. M'LANE said, so far as he felt an interest in this matter, he was in favor of adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. KANE.) He had no doubt himself, that the President would choose one of the largest plans, as from what little knowledge he (Mr. M'LANE) had of the subject, he was convinced that a partial Breakwater would scarcely afford protection to the craft, or certainly not more than that. The bill went on a more liberal principle—its object was to protect, not only the coasting trade, but the whole commerce of the country, in which the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. FOOT,) was more interested than he was. While he was up, he would make one remark in answer to the gentleman on the subject of the enormous cost; the gentleman had said, that after this project was completed, it would take millions for fortifications to defend it. Sir, (said Mr. M'L.) it is very easy to talk of millions, and such a sound might have an imposing effect on the minds of Senators; but if we bring the gentleman down to the accuracy of absolute calculation, he would then find the error of such an enormous computation. Besides, in time of peace the fortifications spoken of would not be required. The cost estimated for the great Fort Delaware, did not exceed $600,000, and the Breakwater would not need one half as large a sum as the Delaware. The gentleman seems to think that the present system when completed would need some 60 or 70,000 troops for its defence. If the gentleman, however, had attended to the report of the Engineers, he would have seen, that in time of peace 4,000 only would be necessary, and that even in time of war, it would not require for a full complement, more than 19,000. The fort at the Breakwater could not cost at the outside more than 300,000 dollars.

Mr. FOOT said the gentleman from Delaware might have supposed that he spoke largely with respect to the expense which this system of fortifications would require, but if he would take into consideration the number of militia, &c. necessary to be employed, he would not be found far wrong. By looking at the report of the Engineers of the 7th July, 1821, it appears that the number of troops necessary for the defence of the existing works—under

pay,	67,000	} 120,000
Within call,	53,000
With the projected works,		60,000

Expenses for defending these points during a campaign of six months, with the existing works, $16,750,000; with the projected works, $5,658,000.

So far as this Breakwater could be rendered useful to commerce, it would receive his most hearty support; but he was averse to creating harbors in the ocean, which would require such immense sums to defend them, after made. Such a harbor as would afford a temporary shelter during storms was all that was required, and as far as that was contemplated, this bill should have his support.

Mr. BENTON expressed himself unfriendly to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. KANE,) because, by its adoption, the plan to be pursued would be undefined, and consequently, the most expensive might be chosen, nay, the expense increased. To his mind, therefore, it rendered the measure more objectionable even than the original bill. Six years ago, he had voted for an appropriation of something less than 30,000 dollars, for this implied object, and he would say that he then did it with pleasure, because he conceived that some improvement was necessary; but it appeared that a Breakwater of so small dimensions was given up, and a bill is now reported of the same modest and unassuming title, that it was years ago; but when he got into the provisions of the bill, it turned out to be of a different character—one going to "create an harbor." This, Mr. President, (said Mr. B.) would be fixing a new era in our legislation, which we might turn to in after years with regret. It would be no less than a meagre attempt to do what nature had not done; it was asking us to try and create for a city, those natural advantages which God or nature had not given, under the hope that they would make up for the decayed state of her commerce. To the city of Philadelphia he had no hostile feelings; on the other hand, he would say, that she was entitled to great credit, and had his sympathy; but that would not furnish the ground on which to come into this Hall, and ask to have natural defects supplied by artificial means, and vainly look to have her harbor made equal to that of New York, whose great advantages as a maritime city were the work of the Deity. He was aware that this great mart had swallowed up nearly the whole commerce of Philadelphia, which she was enabled to do, by her natural advantages—her proximity to the sea, &c. and he regretted for her sake that it was so; but then it was one of those vicissitudes in the history of cities and nations that could not be reached by legislative interference. He understood that, in her decaying commerce, the enterprise and public spirit of her citizens were displayed, in endeavoring to sustain her by manufactures; and Congress had passed laws in aid of such establishments, and now we are asked to wall her up on two sides—first on manufactures, and then on commerce, and gentlemen tell us, by way of inducement, that she has paid so much into the revenue of the country—that, in his opinion, was no argument; it was not Philadelphia that paid it; it was paid every where throughout the Union; the citizens of Missouri paid their part.

If we once commence this system of creating, (said Mr. B.) where will it end? Would not similar projects be asked for, along the whole coast, and if we attempt to take the work out of the hands of nature, and create an artificial harbor in the sea for Philadelphia, would it be reasonable to refuse like attempts to others when asked? Gentlemen, in their zeal for the passage of this bill, had cited cases in Europe, he believed Plymouth in England, and Cherbourg in France; but these he conceived were merely intended for annoyances to the enemy, and here there could be no analogy between the two countries, we had no enemies on our border, our policy was pacific. In the construction of this project, no idea could be formed of the vast expense likely to be incurred; it was not like building on terra firma, but was a work carried on in the open sea, besides which the military appropriation necessary to be kept up to defend it when made, would be an additional source of cost. He was opposed to the whole plan of creating artificial harbors, and if we commenced now, he thought it would be the germ or sprout from which a system would arise that would extend itself throughout the country.

Mr. SMITH, of Md., said that we had already commenced, and had finished some harbors rendered necessary for protection of our shipping, where nature had not been propitious; and instanced Buffalo, Presqu' ile, and others. The gentleman asks, said Mr. S., where this system is to end: in reply, he could tell him where there was no longer a necessity for these artificial aids. Mr. S. descanted upon the utility of this measure to an extended coast, where the shipping interest of so large a portion of the Union was vitally interested.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that, as to the words artificial harbor, if they were offensive to the gentleman from Missouri, he should have no objections to striking them out, and inserting "breakwater" in their place. Any thing that breaks the water, said Mr. W., is an artificial harbor. The terms in this case are synonymous; and all that was intended, was to erect a breakwater. Whether its form be that of a harbor or not, is immaterial. As to doing what God or Nature had not done, it appeared to be of little force against the project. The same thing was done in every work, for safety or convenience, where Nature offers obstructions. It would apply to the erection of light houses, the excavation of canals, and the construction of roads. So it might be said, that the appropriation for the removal of snags and sawyers from the Mississippi, were doing what God or Nature had not done. It was so in relation to the bill for the improvement of the Muscle Shoals. Indeed, it would apply to every appropriation for improvement. So far as the supposition went, that this is the commencement of a plan, he would refer to an act passed during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, for the construction of a pier in the harbor of Bridgewater, in Connecticut. This was a breakwater, constructed twenty years ago, and the construction of such works had been continued ever since. One had been made in New York, another in New Hampshire—and had proved of great utility. In 1823 a bill passed for the removal of obstructions from the harbor of Boston—in 1827, for the removing snags and sawyers from the Ohio, for deepening the channel of Pascagoula river, for improving the navigation of Appalachicola. Nor was the system confined to the seaboard, but had extended into the interior. Oswego, Buffalo, and Saco river, in Maine, might be mentioned, with many others—and a proposition to improve the Pass au Heron was now before Congress. All these were works which God, or Nature, had not done. These works were, therefore, not now to be commenced. Similar appropriations had been made whenever the improvement was practicable, or the Government were able to apply the money to such purposes. He did not consider that there was any charm in the term "artificial harbor," and was willing that it should be struck out. He would again repeat, that it was not probable the President would chuse the partial breakwater; but that the plan of Mr. Strickland would be fixed upon, which was nearly a million under that which the committee had selected.

Mr. CHANDLER wished to know if there was no point at which they should be able to stop in this system. He objected to the amendment. It left the whole question out of the discretion of Congress. He did not think the information upon the subject so full as it ought to be. But, when the work was once began, they must go on, cost what it might.

Mr. WOODBURY offered a modification of the amendment, which, having been accepted by Mr. KANE, the amendment was agreed to—and the question being taken on engrossing the bill, was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

PRIVATE LAND TITLES.

The unfinished business of yesterday was taken up, being the bill to provide for the trial of private land claims in the several States and Territories.

Mr. KING observed, that he should to-morrow report, from the Committee on Public Lands, a bill for the relief of Elihu Hall Bay, and others, and, as the claims of these individuals were those contemplated by the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE,] he would suggest to the gentleman the propriety of withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. HAYNE observing that he had no desire to obstruct the progress of the bill, withdrew the amendment submitted by him yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, then moved to add to the fourth section, the words "except the States of "Mississippi and Louisiana," so as to exempt those States from the operation of the bill.

Mr. BARTON moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "and Missouri," extending the same exemption to that State.

Messrs. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, and BARTON, severally supported their amendments.

Messrs. BERRIEN and SMITH, of S. C. opposed the adoption of these amendments at considerable length; and Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, rejoined.

FIXING A DAY FOR ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BRANCH moved to take up the resolution submitted sometime since by Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky., fixing a time for adjourning sine die.

Mr. NOBLE hoped the motion would not prevail. There was a great mass of business which had not yet been acted upon. He believed the Ocratock improvement had not yet been considered; neither had he got his road in Indiana yet. He therefore hoped they should remain in session until these matters were settled.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, thought a time ought to be fixed upon when Congress should adjourn, as business was always despatched much more promptly when it was to be done within a given period. It would be better for the nation if a day were fixed upon.

Mr. BRANCH supported his motion by a few remarks.

Mr. HARRISON said that he was opposed to fixing the time of adjournment. He wished to have it in his power, during this session, to vote in favor of a plan of improvement for the gentleman's State, (North Carolina,) and to show him that he was desirous to extend the benefits of internal or external improvement to every part of the Union where it was needed. He saw no landmark, by which they should be guided, in fixing on a period for adjourning. It was unnecessary, as it would be inexpedient, to appoint a day, and be obliged, when it arrived, to remove it to a more distant period. He saw nothing to go by but a large docket, daily increasing, which, he thought, should, in one way or another, be disposed of.

Mr. DICKERSON said he was anxious to adjourn and go home; but he was also desirous that Congress should despatch the business which the People expects from them. He thought a motion of this kind ought to originate in the other House. The Senate could transact, in a very short time, business which would require a long discussion in the other House, where most of it was originated. If the Senate passed the resolution, it would go to the other House, where it would lie on the table, and delay acting upon it as long as they saw fit: whereas, if it came from the other House to the Senate, they could, if they pleased, concur in it at once. He expressed surprise that this body should be anxious to pass this resolution in advance, without knowing what business would come before them, or how soon it could be despatched. The House of Representatives had, at this moment, a bill before them, in which a great portion of the country was deeply interested. He stood here to pass that bill, should it come from the other House; and, on this ground, he hoped the resolution would be rejected. He recollected, in 1823, when the Tariff Bill was under discussion, there were a number of gentlemen in the Senate who were very anxious to get away—a similar resolution had been passed; and the bill was lost because there was not time to act upon it. At that time, the yeas and nays were taken, to show who was, and who was not, in favour of spending the People's money. We have, said Mr. D., no previous question in this body; and, although they have, in the other House, they seldom make use of it, but go on regularly, making a speech a day, upon the bill before them. The Senate must wait their motion. Until that important measure was so far progressed in as to show a prospect of a decision upon it, he should not be in favor of fixing upon a time for adjournment. He came from a part of the country which was deeply interested in that measure; and he was free to say, that this was his motive in opposing this motion until there was some prospect of its either being passed or rejected. When that time came, he should be willing to talk of adjourning: for he was always ready to go home when the business did not require their stay.

Mr. BRANCH replied to Messrs. DICKERSON and HARRISON.

Mr. NOBLE said, that he was perfectly willing that the channel desired by the People of North Carolina should be cut, and that they should be set afloat. And if they would wait patiently, as far as depended on Indiana, they should have their wishes. He thought they had better go on harmoniously to do the business before the Senate, and let the resolution lay quietly on the table.

Mr. HARRISON observed, in reply to some remarks from Mr. BRANCH, that he had never imagined that this session of Congress would pass away without some provision for the object which seemed to be desired by North Carolina. He was not informed upon the project in view; but, if it was a reasonable one, he should do all in his power to advance it. He was not only willing, but desirous, to show that his feelings were not of a sectional kind; and he knew it was the wish of his constituents, that all such objects, where they were very remotely interested, or where they were not interested at all, should be advanced, and carried into effect.

Mr. BRANCH, in a short explanation, expressed full confidence in the liberality of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, objected to the plan of fixing the time of adjournment by the passage or rejection of the tariff. The effect of fixing upon a day would be that of doing ten-times the business that would otherwise be done. He hoped the tariff this year would not be similar to that proposed last session by the gentleman from New Jersey. I stood by that gentleman, said Mr. J., at the time the tariff of 1824 was adopted, and I voted for it. But he voted against that produced last year, and nailed it, like base money, to the counter. He was against it, because it would have a partial operation; and luckily, the 3d of March did come, and laid it on the table. That bill was like a two-edged sword: for it cut two ways; and he thanked God when its progress was stopped by the arrival of the 3d of March. They had never seen the time when the business of the Senate was all disposed of, and they never should see that time, unless they would determine to close their labors at a certain period. The docket had been referred to, and he could assure the Senate that it would be always heavy until some limit was put to the time allowed for acting upon it. He would, if he had his own way, give to the members of Congress a round sum for their services, instead of a "per diem:" for members would not labor under the latter as the interests of the country required. He meant no reflections upon any one; but it was human nature.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, was understood to express a wish that the resolution might lie upon the table; and to say that he considered it too early to fix upon a day for adjournment until the Senate had a further insight into the business before them.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that far the greater number of bills acted upon by Congress originated in the other House. And when he was a member of that body, it appeared to him, from the great number of bills originating there, that, as a general rule, the motion to fix a time for adjourning had better begin there. He agreed in the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, so far, that if, at an early period of the session, a day could be fixed, it would have a good effect; but he thought no good would result from adopting a resolution to fix upon a day, at so late a period. He believed that, two years since, one hundred private bills were lost in the Senate, because the day was fixed upon for an adjournment. Congress would not sit another day, and many honest men were disappointed and inconvenienced by the circumstance. He entirely agreed with the gentleman from Maryland, that it was too early now to pass any resolution on this head.

Mr. BENTON considered that gentlemen had no right, on this question, to consult their own private feelings. They remained here to transact the public business, and to that alone their attention ought to be turned. Congress, it was well known, as he had said on a late occasion, was the local Legislature for a great part of the country; and bills, in relation to the Public Lands, and the new States, had often been lost because Congress had not time to act upon them. He was willing to do as much towards the furtherance of the business as any one.

MARCH 21, 24, 1828.] Private Land Titles.—Organization of the Militia.—The Franking Privilege. [SENATE.]

He was willing to meet early, sit late, and work hard : but he did not think now the time to fix upon a period for adjournment.

The motion of Mr. BRANCH was rejected.

PRIVATE LAND TITLES.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then taken up, being a bill to provide for the trial of private land claims in the several States and territories, and the question being put on the modified motion to amend, of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, to exclude the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Missouri, from the operations of the bill, it was rejected.

The bill having been reported to the Senate, and the amendments, previously made, agreed to,

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, renewed his motion to amend, by inserting the words "except the States of Louisiana and Mississippi ;" which was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON renewed the motion made by him yesterday, by adding "and Missouri."

Mr. KING moved to amend the amendment by adding "Alabama."

Mr. COBB hoped it would not be adopted, and that the motion on Mississippi and Louisiana would be reconsidered. It was time to stop this course, if it was ever intended to settle these claims. If the State of Alabama was to be excluded, he should vote against the bill.

Mr. KING did not understand the gentleman, when he said that he objected to leave those States untouched, who did not ask for any assistance. He thought the bill was intended to adjust unsettled claims ; not to unsettle all those claims which had been settled.

Mr. COBB said that he had no such designs as the gentleman supposed. The Board which would be established by this bill would not take up any claims already settled.

Mr. WEBSTER said he rose to ask for information. He was ignorant of the exact merits of the claims. He knew that there were such claims, and they ought to be settled ; but as to the manner, he was not entirely satisfied. He understood that a difficulty arose in the adjudication of some of these claims in Louisiana, from the fact, that the Government having never granted the lands, there exists no adverse claimant. It would appear that they might have been settled by Commissioners. He saw, however, no difficulty in causing suits to be commenced in the Superior Courts of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, to be defended in each by the officers of the United States. This course he thought preferable to the reference of these claims to the tribunal contemplated by this bill. He saw difficulties in the bill in its original form ; but, if none but the claims in Florida remained, he thought they ought to be settled by local jurisdiction.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that there were claims proposed to be settled by this bill in Illinois and Arkansas, as well as the other States and Territories that had been named. The committee on Private Land Claims had ordered him to report a general bill for their settlement. Hitherto Commissioners had been authorized to examine and decide upon many of these claims—and a great number of their decisions had been confirmed by Congress. These, it was not designed to touch. There were others that had never been reported upon, and others still, which had been examined and reported on, but had never been decided. From the turn which the discussion of this bill had taken, it appeared that the Senate was not favorable to the passage of a bill so extensive in its operations. And if its provisions were confined to the Territories of Florida and Arkansas, its object would be defeated, and the Committee would not feel authorized to press it before the Senate. If he could not advance the general object which he had in view, then there were claims within his own State for which he should endeavor to make provision, by bringing forward a measure by which the same Commissions established in Missouri might be extended to Florida and Arkansas. He should at an earlier period have made such a proposition ; but knowing that a general bill was in contemplation, he thought it unnecessary.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested to the gentleman from Georgia, whether it would not be better to strike out this bill at once, and introduce a substitute.

Mr. BARTON spoke at considerable length in explanation of the manner in which the grants had been settled in Missouri. They had already a competent tribunal, and would object to coming to Washington for the settlement of the claims. He thought the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to be acted upon.

Mr. BERRIEN then moved a substitute to the bill, which he stated, was formed from a bill for the settlement of claims in Florida, which had sometime since been laid on the table, and the law of Congress by which the trial of claims in Missouri was established. He moved that it lie on the table, and be printed ; which was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON gave notice, that, when the bill came up, he would move to amend it by altering the provision in relation to costs.

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1828.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the bill for the organization and discipline of the Militia of the United States was taken up, with the amendment submitted by Mr. HAYNE, some time since, to strike out the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th sections, relating to the classification of the Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER opposed the amendment.

Mr. HAYNE repeated the views offered by him on a former occasion, and pressed his objections to the classification proposed by the bill.

A brief conversation took place between Messrs. NOBLE and CHANDLER, when, on motion of the former, the bill and amendment were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NOBLE then offered a bill, which he gave notice that he would hereafter move to substitute for the present bill.

The bill from the House, to authorize the Speaker of the House of Representatives to frank letters and packages, was read a second time, was briefly discussed by Messrs. WEBSTER, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, CHANDLER, BELT, VAN BUREN, and TYLER, ; and was, on motion of the latter, ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, MARCH 24, 1828.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The joint resolution from the other House, granting to the Speaker of the House of Representatives the privilege of franking letters and packages, was then taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. moved to amend the resolution by striking out the original resolution, and inserting the following:

"That the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall exercise and enjoy the same privilege of franking letters and papers, as is by law granted to the Vice President of the United States, and that the privilege of franking letters and papers, exercised and enjoyed by members of Congress, within the limit now established by law, shall exist, and may be exercised by them, at any time while they continue to be members."

Mr. JOHNSON supported his amendment at considerable length. He considered that the privilege of franking ought to be allowed to the members of Congress to the fullest extent. Much had been said of the privileges of members of Congress, but he thought them little better than beasts of burthen. They were separated from their families, their business, and their friends ; their privilege of farming, of doctoring, and of lawyering, was destroyed by their Congressional duties. It was said that the franking privilege extended only to documents, but, he did not think so, by the present law. He thought it hard that they should be prevented from sending little presents home to their families. These might be plebeian notions. He owned he was a plebeian, born of plebeian parents, with a plebeian education, and he trusted he always should be a plebeian. He had been censured at home, for voting for the compensation bill. At that same time he also voted for the extension of the franking privilege. But when he came to talk to his constituents, and explained to them that he was in favor of it because it would facilitate communication with them, they fell in with his views, and he believed he had more votes on account of it. He had voted for the compensation bill, to enable members of Congress to carry their heads erect—heads up—and he was not ashamed of the part he had acted. He concluded with some remarks in relation to a penknife which he held in his hand, and which, under circumstances, (which the reporter could not comprehend) expressed his willingness that it should be used against his own bosom.

Mr. RUGGLES thought members of Congress ought to be satisfied with the privileges extended to them. He objected to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, who seemed to think that they ought to have the privilege of corresponding with their constituents during the whole year. If sixty days before the session, and sixty days after, were not enough for that gentleman, they were for him, (Mr. R.) He thought that, when a member returned back to the people, he should become one of the people; and he knew no reason why a member of Congress should have the privilege of franking, more than any of his neighbours, during the recess. As to the privilege of sending presents to their wives and children, he did not think it entered into the Congressional duties of the members. The gentleman also supposed that the refusal of this privilege was aristocratical, while he (Mr. R.) viewed this bill as creating an aristocracy in the members of Congress. He was desirous of consulting the interest and feelings of the people, but he thought this resolution would not consult either.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. said he rose to set the gentleman right as to facts. The gentleman's remarks might give color to a prejudice which was abroad among the People, as to the franking system. Mr. J. wished the gentleman to tell him whether the franking privilege had been confined to documents. He was convinced that it had not, and that the law did not so confine it. There was a prejudice abroad, against members of Congress, in relation to this privilege, which the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio would, in his opinion, aggravate. For himself, he always had, and always should, under the present law, frank any thing he pleased whether documents or not.

Mr. MACON observed, that the gentleman from Kentucky and himself had always disagreed on this head. He did not believe it was necessary that any franking privilege should go beyond the present. [Here were some observations in conclusion of Mr. M. which the reporter could not hear.]

The question being then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. it was decided in the negative, 22 to 16.

The question then recurring on ordering the resolution to a third reading,

Mr. TYLER said, that, in some remarks made by him on Friday, he had intimated that the privilege of franking had been assumed heretofore by the Speaker of the House, throughout the year. This he found was not the case, and he retracted that supposition. He had found that it had only been exercised during the sessions.

The present Speaker, who, he believed, had no solicitude upon the matter, had refused to use the privilege to the extent used by the former Speakers, from a belief that the law did not authorize him to do so—and this having come to the knowledge of the Post Office Committee of the other House, they had no difficulty in reporting the resolution now under consideration. By the law, the Vice President was empowered to exercise the franking privilege, while his situation was perfectly analogous to that of the Speaker of the other House. It was true that the Vice President was elected to provide for any contingency by which the President of the United States should be taken away; but, in the absence of such a contingency, his duties were in all respects similar to those of the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The principle on which the grant of this privilege was maintained, was, that, when an individual was elevated to a high station, his correspondents were consequently increased; and it became necessary that he should enjoy the right of franking. So fully had this principle been acknowledged, that the privilege of franking was extended to the Ex-Presidents, after they had long ceased to fill any office under the Government. The gentleman who filled the situation of Speaker to the other House, was to be considered a man of high character, and worthy of being entrusted with the same privileges that had formerly been enjoyed by those in the same station. One great reason why the right of franking was necessary to him, was, that he was the organ through which numerous petitions were presented, which would otherwise be a great burthen. He thought that a refusal on the part of the Senate, to extend this privilege to the Speaker of the House, would be a breach of etiquette, and destructive of the harmony which ought to exist between the two Houses.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was willing to pass the resolution in any shape that should extend the privilege of franking to the Speaker of the House, as far as it had been before enjoyed. Further he did not wish to go.

Ten or twelve years since, a law was passed which allowed the Speaker to frank packages, without regard to the weight—which remained until three years since, when an act was passed, which was now supposed to have repealed the powers of the Speaker in this respect. The resolution now under consideration proposes to restore that power. But is this all which it proposes? No. It is to extend this privilege through the whole year. He knew no reason why the privilege should be so extended in the case of the Speaker, more than in that of any member of Congress. And it appeared to him, that those members who had been for years Chairmen of some of the standing committees, required that privilege equally with the Speaker. He was willing to go so far as to restore the act which was repealed, and no farther. He then moved to substitute the following for the original resolution:

"That during the present, and every subsequent session of Congress, all letters and packets to and from the President of the Senate, pro tempore, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, shall be received and conveyed by mail, free of postage, under the same restrictions as are provided by law, with respect to letters and packets to and from the Vice President of the United States."

Mr. TAZEWELL had no objection to the amendment, but was opposed to the manner in which it had been brought forward. By the revival of an old law the Speaker of the House had, by accident, been left out of its provisions, in relation to the franking privilege. Owing to this accident, which was not discovered by the Post Office Department, the Speaker had gone on to frank as usual; but, as it turned out, illegally. The present Speaker, on assuming his office, turns to the law, and finds that he had no power to follow in the steps of his predecessors. It was well known, that, where the Speaker franks once for himself, he does it one hundred times for the members. The attention of the House of Representatives was drawn to the subject, and they were willing to place the Speaker on the same footing as the Vice President occupied in this respect—not, as the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes—to restrain him to the same power as is enjoyed by the members. The difference between the proposition of the resolution and that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, did not seem to him of sufficient importance to authorize the rejection of a proposition for placing the presiding officer of the co-ordinate branch on the same footing with the President of the Senate. It would be a breach of courtesy to refuse to accede to this proposition—a rude and undeserved rebuff, which could not but have a tendency to interrupt the harmony between the two Houses. On these grounds he opposed the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEBSTER said, it was extremely painful for him to be necessitated to say another word. But he thought it extremely unjust to consider the amendment as a rebuff, or as a want of courtesy towards the other House. He had no such meaning in offering the amendment. They had been told that the deprivation, by the last law passed upon the subject of the Speaker, of the privilege of franking, was a mistake, and that it was proposed to re-establish the ancient provisions of the law in that respect. But, by looking at this resolution and the old law, it would be found that this bill did not re-establish the ancient law—on the contrary, it proposed to do much more. He differed with the gentleman from Virginia—and thought the amendment no way indicative of a want of courtesy to the other House, as it merely sought to place the power of the Speaker on its former footing. He had not wished to say another word on the subject, or oppose the wishes of the other House. No man would do more than himself to contribute to the facility of any officer of the Government, in the performance of his duties.

Mr. VAN BUREN expressed himself briefly in opposition to the amendment. He spoke, generally, in so low a tone, that the Reporter cannot undertake to detail his remarks. He was understood to say, that he thought the object to be effected by the amendment of too little importance to authorize an opposition to the wishes of the other House.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, he concurred with the gentlemen, that this was too small an affair to engage seriously the attention of the Senate. If the bill was placed on the ground of courtesy, he had nothing to say; but he saw no necessity for the passage of the bill. He was in favor of extending the franking privilege to all the members throughout the year. The privilege, during the time it lasts, is ample. The Speaker, as member of the body, enjoys this privilege. No former Speaker of that House has ever enjoyed the privilege asked in this bill; and what occasion is there now for extending it? The Speaker now exercises all the right which was formerly enjoyed under the law (which was repealed,) of franking every thing of a public character, or on public business. Mr. J. said, we have the right to frank public documents now; and, if a member received papers upon public business, they are in the nature of public documents, and come free. He said the member had only to inform the Postmaster at this place, that the package was of a public character, and the postage was discharged; he had himself received a memorial and documents, to be presented to the Senate, which were charged at eight dollars postage; but, upon giving the information to the Postmaster, it was discharged—that is, the frank extended to it. This was the true construction of the law. No member ought to enjoy the right of franking beyond two ounces, except in the transmission of public documents, or of papers relating to his public duties. Mr. J. said, he was confident that neither the Speaker, nor any member, paid postage on any papers relating to official business. The limitation on the right of franking, to the official nature of the packets, was very proper, but he thought there ought to be no limitation as to the time it should run throughout the year.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the gentleman from Louisiana was perfectly correct in his statement, as to the privilege of members. He had formerly received a very large document, beyond the weight allowed by the law; and on writing to the Post Master General, stating that it contained a public document, it was franked by him; and he [Mr. SMITH] had done so ever since. He did not see the necessity of passing this act; as he considered that all members of Congress had it in their power to frank as much as their duties required.

Mr. MACON thought the gentleman from Louisiana in error. Members were allowed to frank only to the weight of two ounces. He was willing to give the Speaker the power of franking, while Congress was in session—but no farther.

Mr. HAYNE would trouble the Senate with but a few words. The gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to suppose that the object of this resolution was to re-establish the former law. That gentleman might have means of knowledge, which he [M. H.] did not possess; but he certainly saw nothing in the resolution which admitted such a supposition. He could look for the intentions of the House, to no other source but the resolution itself; and there he found no such intention, as the gentleman had presumed, to exist. It was proposed by the resolution, that the presiding officer of the House of Representatives should have the same privilege of franking letters and packages, as was enjoyed by the Vice President. It might be said, that the office of the Vice President was peculiar, because he was elected to fill the place of the President of the United States, in case of his removal by death; but while he was acting in no other capacity, than that of presiding officer of the Senate, his situation was similar to that of the Speaker of the House of Representatives. In regard to franking for members, their functions had no point of difference. The House believed that the Speaker ought to have the same privilege as the Vice President; and could it be supposed that the House would object, if it were the desire of the Senate to place its President pro tempore, on the same footing in this respect? The gentleman from Louisiana puts his objection upon the ground, that the restriction as to weight is not practically observed at all. If it was not, it was certain that it ought to be, if any law was entitled to observance. The gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that it would not be a want of courtesy to send this resolution back to the House. The declaration that such was his opinion, was for him, a disclaimer of any such design. But, said Mr. H. for myself I do think it would be a want of courtesy to refuse to accede to a matter of so little real importance. He said so little importance. It certainly would be so, if adopted; but, if it were rejected, it would be a matter of great importance: because it would tend to interrupt the cordiality with which the two Houses ought to act together.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, when this subject was brought up on Friday, he was of the opinion that the Speaker of the House ought not to enjoy the privilege of franking throughout the year. But, on further reflection, he could see no reason why the presiding officer of the other House should not enjoy the same extent of privilege granted to the President of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked, that he disliked to be misrepresented. He had not presumed that the resolution from the other House intended a repeal of the former law—but a restoration of the privilege to the Speaker, which he formerly enjoyed. He would remark that although the gentleman from South Carolina had said that the intention of the resolution was to place the Speaker on the same footing as the Vice President, it did not contain one word in relation to the power of the Vice President. The resolution gave an unlimited power to the Speaker through the whole year. His [Mr. W's] wish was to restrict it to the same limits to which it was confined by the former law.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. WEBSTER, and negatived, and the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

TUESDAY, MARCH 25, 1828.

RELINQUISHMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS.

On motion of Mr. KING, the bill to authorize the relinquishment of the 16th section of lands for the use of schools, in the State of Alabama, where they should be found barren and unproductive, was taken up, and having been explained by Mr. KING,

Mr. BARTON opposed the bill, on the ground that a bill had been passed at a former session, allowing the State of Alabama to sell these 16th sections and invest the proceeds in other funds, and that this bill would derange that plan altogether. He thought the Government had done enough in this matter, in allowing the State to sell these lands and invest the proceeds in some productive fund. This was the first application of a State to be allowed to exchange the sections allotted to schools, (whether good or bad,) for other lands which are good, and he thought this the proper time to put a stop to such a system. He should rather adopt the plan of the gentleman from Indiana, however he might differ with him in his Constitutional opinions. He would rather give up the whole of the public lands to the States, than go on, step by step, as Congress would be obliged to do if they began with this bill. The sixteenth section was set apart by Government as a boon which was consistent with its policy to give to the new States, for the encouragement of education.

Mr. KING expressed surprise at the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri; and could not conceive how the grant of the sixteenth section could be considered a boon. The effect of granting this section to the townships had been to accelerate the sale of the contiguous lands. But it was, without a doubt, intended that this boon, as the gentleman called it, should be useful to the towns to which it was given. If the object of the grant had, in many cases, been defeated by the unproductiveness of the lands, he thought nothing could be more just than to allow them to exchange them for those of a better character, although not considered worth the minimum price. In the State of Alabama, there was more sterile land than in any other of the Western States; and, in the townships where the sixteenth section was totally unproductive, schools were more wanted than in the fertile townships, because the large plantations, covering a great extent of land, but with a white population, were situated in the latter, while the poorer class of People settled on the former. Thus, in the poor townships, the population was much larger, and the want of schools greater in proportion. He could not perceive how the gentleman from Missouri had brought the subject of the graduation of the Public Lands to bear upon this question, which had nothing to do with it. He did not think the land system would be in any way interfered with by passing this bill. If other States were similarly situated, they would probably ask for the same privilege. He hoped the gentleman from Missouri would not have influenced the Senate to refuse this request of the State of Alabama, which extended only to those sections which, by their sterility, defeated the design of the Government in granting them.

Mr. BARTON rose to reply to one point only of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama. It was, that the fund from which the lands to be given in exchange for the barren sections would not bring the minimum price—which was a favourite idea put forth on all occasions where a grant of public land was wanted. It was an incorrect supposition that all the land which would not bring the minimum price was inferior land. It was not to be supposed that all the lands of the public domain could be sold in market. It could not be done; and the Government might as well suppose that they could cover those lands by their simple feiz, as that the whole could be disposed of at the minimum price. And this was the true reason why a minimum price was needed at all. The State of Alabama had no reason to complain if the United States should adhere to the compact. Other States had also found their school lands, in some instances, unproductive; but they had not asked for an exchange.

Mr. McKINLEY said, that there was a great proportion of the land in Alabama which, from its sterility, was entirely useless. Yet those parts of the State which were most barren possessed the most dense population. They needed this provision more than any other portion of the population, because they were generally poor, and not able to obtain the means of educating their children. If this grant of the sixteenth section of land for schools was not to be considered as a lottery, in which blanks and prizes were to be drawn by chance, the land grants for the purposes of education ought not to remain as they were. At present, some derived a benefit from it, and some derived none. The object had in view by the Government, in granting it, was doubtless to extend the benefit of education to every quarter of the country. But, in many instances, this object had entirely failed. The sixteenth section was fixed upon because it was nearest to the centre of the townships, and the quality of those sections was mere matter of chance. That a needy portion of the settlers in any of the States should be exposed in this manner to a chance that the provision made for them should fail altogether, seemed to him very unreasonable. It was also unreasonable to refuse to grant to the People an equality in respect to their school lands, that one township might enjoy the same benefit from the system that was enjoyed by others, unless, as he had said before, the principle of a lottery were adopted. The argument did not apply exclusively to Alabama, but was also applicable to other States. And because Alabama was the first to apply for this privilege, that afforded no reason for its rejection. He apprehended that there was no danger that the bill would make any inroads upon the present land system; while it was an object of great desire to the People of Alabama.

Mr. CHANDLER thought there would be danger in making the exchange, from the precedent which would arise from it. It was never supposed that Congress intended to enter into the minute merits of the matter, and make the grant exactly equal to all the townships. If this privilege was granted to one State, it must be to another. He therefore thought it better that it should remain as it was.

The question being then put on engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was decided in the negative, 22 to 18.

So the bill was rejected.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the bill to provide for the final settlement of private land claims in the several States and Territories, was taken up.

Mr. BERRIEN explained the objects and effects of the substitute offered by him on Thursday last, in place of the original bill, and offered an amendment, the precise purport of which our reporter could not ascertain; which was agreed to.

MARCH 25, 1828.]

Private Land Claims.

[SENATE.]

Mr. HAYNE observed, that his colleague (Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina) was not present, and he knew that he was unable to appear in his seat, from indisposition. He also knew that he took an interest in the bill, and would suggest to the Senator from Georgia the postponement of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BERRIEN said he would not press the bill on the present occasion, but that the colleague of the Senator from South Carolina, and himself, entirely coincided upon this measure. If the Senator from South Carolina would point out any particular in which he conceived his colleague would disagree with him, in the provisions of the bill, or amendment, he (Mr. B.) would with pleasure postpone it.

Mr. BARTON made some remarks in favour of the bill in its present form. He considered the plan proposed for the settlement of claims in Florida, which was similar to that adopted for Missouri, and which proposed that the Superior Court of the Territory should adjudicate upon them, subject to appeals to the Supreme Court, would lead to a satisfactory adjustment.

Mr. HAYNE asked whether the larger claims were excluded from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that most of the large claims were included in the plan proposed by the bill, and the titles would be settled by the Commission provided for in the bill.

Mr. HAYNE said, that, if such was the design of the bill, he must oppose it. There were some claims which were too large to be subjected to a judicial tribunal. All the Government was bound to do, was to appoint Commissioners to decide upon the titles. He thought they were of too great importance, extending, as in some instances, to upwards of a million of acres, to be finally settled by a judicial tribunal. If the Senator from Georgia would modify his bill, so as to exclude from its provisions these large grants, he should willingly vote for it; but not otherwise.

Mr. BERRIEN remarked, that he was perfectly willing the Senate should decide this question now. He read the proviso in the bill, of which he observed, that he thought it rendered the bill sufficiently guarded. The proposition of the Senator from South Carolina went to limit the tribunal to the decision of the small claims in Florida, and to restrict it from the right which it exercised in Missouri, and prevent the settlement of the large claims. He would ask the Senator from South Carolina if it would be justice to the People of Florida, to grant to them a partial tribunal, curtailed of the powers exercised by it in Missouri? What then was the object of the gentleman's proposition? To appoint Commissioners to consider and report upon the large claims, for the confirmation of Congress. But this had already been done, and Congress had refused to confirm the decisions of the Commissioners. With the security which this bill afforded, providing for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, he thought there could be no good ground for excluding the larger claims. It was reserved for the Supreme Court to correct any errors that might occur in the decisions of the local tribunal. He would repeat the question, whether it would be just to refuse to Florida the same kind of trial, to those claims within her limits, which was granted to Missouri. He would say no more, not believing that it was necessary to occupy the time of the Senate on a matter, which, to him, appeared so plain.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, rose to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the principle which he had laid down. This Government had bound itself by treaties, to confirm the titles of the claimants of these lands, when once fixed. It had bound itself to adjudicate upon those titles. Congress could only surrender the claim of the United States, when the title of the claimants was established; and if Congress refused to do this, it held these claims in suspense, to the great injury of the individuals concerned. When the country was pledged to regard the rights of those claimants, could it ask them to prosecute their claims: and was it not the duty of the Government to bring the settlement to a speedy issue? In the State which he represented, they had been often refused a settlement. When they were brought up before Congress, they could not decide upon them—yet they would not allow them to be determined by a court of justice, because they were too important. Congress could not form a decision upon them, because the members were ignorant of the laws and customs of the States in which the lands were situated—and was unwilling to submit them to a judicial tribunal because they were of such great value. Thus those claims might be held in suspense forever. The words of the Treaty were that Congress would adjudicate on the titles. Under this agreement, the People of those States did not think, when the United States took possession of the country, that the Government would hold the lands in their own hands, and dispute their titles. It was never anticipated that these titles would be decided upon by a tribunal like this (Congress.) Gentlemen must see the difficulty of deciding upon these questions in Congress, from the ignorance of the members, of the localities and laws of the Territory in which the lands lie, and the difficulty of bringing the facts before Congress. Besides, when these claimants came here, they were loaded with such a cloud of suspicion, and the minds of members were so filled with prejudice, that it was difficult to obtain any decision upon them. He had endeavoured to obtain their settlement, by every method of adjudication; but in vain. The present bill seemed to offer to certain classes of claims a competent tribunal for their settlement. But the Senator from South Carolina says, he is fearful of trusting them to Courts of Justice. What was the reason? It must be that he supposed there was some legal defection in the subject itself. As to the amount, that did not seem to be sufficient reason for the objection. Cases, involving larger amounts, were trusted to the Courts every day—for, although as the gentleman says, the amount of lands is very great, yet the amount of their value was less than was imagined. They consisted of large tracts of unsettled lands, for the improvement of which the States were very anxious—and they were as much interested in their settlement, as the individual claimants. But, upon these subjects, it was impossible that a body of 230 members, like the other House, or even the Senate, could ever understand, thoroughly, a legal title of so much intricacy, as that to these lands was, in many cases. The different claims were to be established by different facts and on different principles. In some cases they were decided by the quantity of land; in some by the location; in some by the time at which they were granted. Several important and intricate questions of local law were presented by them for discussion and settlement, rendering them unfit subjects for the deliberations of Congress. On the other hand the lawyers of those States, in which these questions arise, have had their minds bent upon them for twenty years, and their adjudication would be much more satisfactory in the sections of country in which they arise. A delay of the adjustment of these claims was creating increased embarrassment and confusion, as individuals would settle upon the lands in their present dubious situation, and cause much future annoyance to the rightful owner. He was convinced that, as long as the settlement of these claims depended upon Commissioners, and the deliberations of Congress, the delay would be interminable. He knew no reason why a distinction such as the gentleman from South Carolina contemplated, should be made between the large and the small claims. The small claims, he thought, were grounded upon the same principle as though they amounted to millions. There was another ground upon which this settlement might be urged. Most of the original claimants were dead, and their heirs were minor children, in some instances, with no other property than their claim to land. It was very desirable that they should have a speedy decision. Their fathers had asked for it for twenty years, by every method, by Commissions, by Courts of Justice, by Congress, and yet their claims were undecided. He hoped that this delay would end here; and that the bill might pass.

Mr. VAN BUREN proposed to amend the bill, by striking out the words placing the duty of appeal in the hands of the District Attorney.

Mr. BERRIEN said, that the Senator from New York would perceive, that, by the 6th section, the claims were to be tried by the same tribunal as had been established in Missouri. The District Attorney was directed to transmit to the Attorney General a statement of the facts of each case, and the points of law on which it was decided. The intention was to give to the United States every possible guard; and it was thought that no greater guard could be given than by submitting the points of law to the Attorney General.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that he was not entirely satisfied. The original bill gave the right of appeal, and in some cases made it imperative. He thought the present bill, in its general features, bore promise of being effectual in attaining its object, and he was, therefore, favorable to it. But, he wished that it might be made imperative to refer all cases over a certain amount, say 10,000 acres, to the Supreme Court. He did not wish to delay the bill, and hoped it might now be amended in this manner.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, made a proposition to amend the seventh section, but withdrew it in favour of an amendment offered to the same section, by

Mr. BERRIEN, which makes it the duty of the Attorney of the United States for the District in which suits may be prosecuted, wherever they exceed 1000 acres—in case the decision is adverse to the United States—to make out and transmit the facts in the case, and the points of law on which it was decided, to the Attorney General, and if it should be his opinion that the decision of the Superior Court was erroneous, it shall be his duty to make an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the District Attorney to observe the directions of the Attorney General.

Mr. EATON moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "exceeding 1000 acres."

Mr. VAN BUREN observed, that this was a bill of great importance, and one which, he was happy to perceive, the Senate were disposed to act upon. As this subject had already cost the Government more than the advantage which they should ever derive from it, he would move to lay the bill upon the table, that the amendments proposed, and the object of the bill, might be better understood.

His motion was agreed to.

GRADUATION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill for the graduation of the prices of Public Lands was taken up; the amendment formerly offered by Mr. HENDRICKS still pending—

Mr. BARTON rose and said: I must be excused, Mr. President, for not changing my opinion of the injurious operation of the proposed measure upon the Public generally, as well as upon my constituents particularly, on account of the array of petitions in favour of the bill, that have been presented, from time to time, to the Senate, with so much pomp and circumstance, during the present session; including the new file of them that has been held in reserve, and so opportunely announced just now when I was about to rise to address you. I have long since determined to discharge what I believe to be my solemn duty upon this subject, and leave to my constituents the exercise of their right to send another in my place to advocate this measure, should they not be convinced that it ought not to be adopted. I am aware that I have an up-hill task in the beginning. This bill has been for about five years pending before the Senate, and playing before the public imagination, in the Western States, without ever having been brought to a vote. Not one man in ten, of the honest and undesigning part of the community in Missouri, has read, examined, and understood its provisions and operation upon this great interest of the public domain of the Union. All have heard of it; and many have received a general confused idea that some signal advantage to them is proposed by it. They have viewed it as men too often view distant objects and untried schemes, as some great and unprecedented good, without understanding very well what would be their actual value or operation. This bill has had the tendency to introduce new tests in the exercise of the elective franchise in that State; of destroying the distinction between qualification for office and the want of it; between character and integrity and the want of them. It has corrupted the great elective franchise of the State, and, for a time, destroyed its free and salutary exercise. For five years it has hung like an impending guillotine over my neck, and I now call upon you to strike the blow, or take away your apparatus. Let us now have a final vote upon the proposition, and put the public mind at rest upon the subject. This bill contains three principal, though not independent provisions.

First. Under the deceptive title and profession of graduating the prices of lands to their quality, it contains a mere scale of rapid annual depreciation of them, by which near one hundred millions of acres now in market, will run down in three years after the passage of the bill, to the price of twenty-five cents per acre, and all other public lands, hereafter put in market, will undergo the like rapid annual depreciation.

Secondly. After the graduated depreciation shall have been some time in operation, it proposes a restricted and modified plan of donations, in small quantities, to actual settlers; and,

Thirdly. After the two first provisions shall have been satisfied, it proposes a cession of the residue to the States in which it lies. These things are all to be completed within five years.

By the first, or speculating provision, (I call it so in reference to the effect it will unavoidably produce,) by the first provision, near one hundred millions of acres of the public lands now in market, excepting the small pittance that may be needed and purchased by the migrating cultivators of the soil, will be thrown, at the end of three years, into the hands of companies of speculators, who are now waiting to receive them. All other portions of the public lands that may hereafter be put in market, will undergo a like operation. How much land will the cultivators probably need in three years? Let us calculate the future by the past.

In forty years, since the first sales of public lands in New York, in 1787, the whole migrating population of the Union have purchased only about 19 millions of acres, in all the new States and Territories where the United States had the primary disposal of the soil. They did not need half so much for agricultural purposes; but they have appropriated that quantity. If then 40 years, under the great impulses given to the spirit of migration by the war of the revolution, the intervening war with England, all the Indian wars, and the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida, required only 19 millions of acres, how much would three years probably require now, when this whole nation has resolved to free itself from a dependence on Europe for those things which we can make as well at home, and distribute its labor among other branches of industry, and sources of wealth and independence, as well as agriculture? Probably not more than two millions of acres. And the whole vast excess, after deducting that quantity from the whole quantity in market, might be considered as decided by the passage of this bill, to the companies of capitalists that would soon form, at 25 cents per acre, upon four years credit, as an engine to enslave your posterity in the character of sub-purchasers or tenants. And so of all portions of the public domain to be brought into market hereafter. It would be decidedly preferable to give away the lands to such as would settle them. Gentlemen tell us that land speculation is at an end. That all have failed who engaged in it. But they omit to tell us the reason of that failure. It was because the public land system held a constant check upon them. When, a few years since, companies of capitalists, under the credit system, made such bold strides at a monopoly of the good soil of the country, the single act of the Government in reducing the price, and changing the mode of selling the public lands, dissipated all their prospects, and brought them to sue for relief from their bargains. This bill, if I am capable of foreseeing its effects, will resuscitate the fraternity of land jobbers, and revive the scenes that once threatened one of the worst species of subjugation to the operative portion of our agricultural citizens. The idea of speculation, to an extent injurious to the poorer and middling classes of cultivators, has been treated as a phantom. To show you the true character and dangerous power of this phantom, permit me to read to you an extract from a statement of the former Receiver of the Land Office at Huntsville in Alabama, now among the files of the Senate. He states, "That at the sales of public lands which commenced by proclamation of the President of the United States, on the first Monday in February, in the year 1818, at Huntsville, a formidable company appeared, which had been formed for the purpose of putting down competition amongst attending bidders, and purchasing the most valuable lands at reduced prices, intending to make re-sale and divide the profits of the speculation. It is needless to enter into detail concerning it. Its nature, strength, means and mode of operation, rendered its success inevitable, unless it should, in some manner, be countervailed. Your petitioner was at that time receiver of public moneys for the Huntsville district. Himself, and the other officers of Government, and Superintendants of the sale, were solicited to join the association and participate in the proceeds. They all rejected the proposition, being unwilling to engage in what they viewed as an abuse of the trust to them confided." Thus we have seen this wily spirit of speculation, which has lain in wait for the fruits of the laborer's toil from the beginning, assume a bolder mien, and marching confidently up to the official sanctuaries of the country, attempt to gain them to its purposes by direct corruption. It was defeated, in the end, by that very power which it is now persuading to lay aside its armour under the pretext that it is at peace—may even that it is dead! Sir, I believe not in this feigned death. It is artfully attempting to remove the only real obstacle to its success. I mean the control of the public domain, not by a few, or a part of the owners, but by the whole people of the Union, through their National Legislature. The whole history of your vast tracts of military bounty lands in the west, to which I shall presently advert for another purpose, admonishes us that this death is but feigned, and that this spirit of speculation cannot succeed while we hold the protecting shield of the national land system over our citizens. Adopt any plan by which the lands shall become suddenly private property, in greater quantities than is needed for cultivation, and the proprietors will always find means to rule matters to their own advantage, in the absence of the countervailing powers of the Government over the subject. If such advantages as were held out in 1818, when lands were selling high, induced such combinations, what may we not expect, should such vast quantities, indeed the greater part of the good lands in our new States and Territories, be thus suddenly put down to 25 cents per acre, without regard to the existing demand for such a supply? Indeed it has become an axiom with political writers, that the owners of the property, especially the real property of the country, will become its governors. It has even become a proverb that all governments are made for the rich: and the results which I have been sketching to your view would go far towards realizing the adage in this country. I will conclude this branch of my subject with an expression of my sincere belief that this measure, if adopted by the Government, will establish in this country one of the most alarming and oppressive landed aristocracies that ever afflicted any. To the second provision of the bill, in favor of actual settlers and cultivators, I am friendly, and will demonstrate that friendship before I sit down, by proposing an amendment to the existing land laws of the United States that will secure to them something better than the miserable refuse, in very restricted quantities, after this colossal scheme of engrossment shall have swept over the land; something more substantial than an invitation to pick up the crumbs after the speculators shall have finished their gorgeous feasts upon the public domain. A judicious plan of donations, of lands that have remained unsold for given periods of time, may be adopted, that would place the agricultural portion of our citizens high above the rank of sub-purchasers or tenants, and pluck up by the roots the whole system of land speculation, by taking away the power, and with it the motive, to make fortunes by re-selling, leasing, or renting, the monopolized soil of the country, and at the same time counteract the bounties offered for the emigration of our citizens, by the neighboring Spanish American and British American Governments upon this continent, and be quite consistent with all the objects to which our national domain can be considered as pledged. As to the third feature of the bill, proposing cessions to the States, I expressed my views on this floor two years ago; and both subsequent reflection, and the concurring opinions of some of the ablest and eldest members of this body, have confirmed me in that opinion. After lowering the price of land from time to time, as circumstances may require, accompanied by some judicious plan of donations when lands have been in market a given term of years, and when all the best may fairly be considered as disposed of, as well for the purposes of meeting our pecuniary obligations, as for the higher purposes to which I have alluded, as the States arrive at such maturity and population as Ohio, for example, now has, let the whole remainder be relinquished to the States in which it lies, and break up our whole establishment of land officers and offices in such States at the same time, without attempting to drain revenue from refuse lands by pursuing them down to twenty-five cents per acre. Such are my general views of this subject; and for the promotion of actual settlers, and the population of our extensive frontiers, I will go as far as the best friend of this bill. But, as this bill proposes a permanent and almost total change in the laws for the disposal of the public domain, it becomes our duty to turn our attention, more in detail, to the subject upon which it is to operate, and see what is, in fact, the situation and importance of this great national interest, our public lands. We all know, in the language of the President in his annual message, that "The acquisition of them, made at the expense of the whole Union, not only in treasure but in blood, marks a right of property in them equally extensive." We all know our very union was based upon the stipulation that the wild lands of the west should be a common property of the people of all the States; and that those subsequently acquired were purchased with the common treasure. The gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. KANE,) who addressed you a few days ago, undertook to show that in the acquisition and disposal of the public lands we had made a losing bargain; and that the proceeds of the sales had not yet defrayed the original cost. A remark of the President in his message was adverted to and commented on by the gentleman. The President has hitherto recommended, in pursuance of the policy of his predecessors, the redemption of our national pledges of the public lands for the payment of our debts, and the application of the residue to the great purposes of improving the country we inhabit. He has, in no instance, pointed to that vast fund, the public domain, as a bribe to individual cupidity, to influence their votes in the approaching Presidential election; but seems to have resolved first to do his duty, and let popularity follow, if it will. In touching such topics he incidentally mentions, as one reason for discharging our trusts, that we have paid out on account of the public lands thirty-three millions of dollars in money. For the purpose for which he mentioned it, this statement is perfectly fair. But when considering the real original cost, we must remember that there are three millions of that sum chargeable to another account—to the expenses of surveying 188 millions of acres, and selling nineteen millions; leaving thirty millions of dollars as the original cost. For that sum what have we acquired? Including the purchases of Louisiana and Florida, the Mississippi stock, the extinguishment of Indian titles, and all other forms of purchase, we have acquired about 261 millions of acres to which the Indian title is extinct, and about 56 millions still subject to the Indian claim; making about 317 millions of acres, lying within the limits of our organized States and Territories. West and North of our organized governments we have acquired about 750 millions more, subject mostly to the claims of the aboriginals, making, for that sum, the total quantity of upwards of one thousand millions of acres. Of this vast domain, securing to this great people the means of elevating to the proud rank of freeholders the present generation, and their posterity for ages to come, upon easy terms, as our increasing population may demand the soil, we have hitherto sold about nineteen millions of acres, producing in actual receipts into the treasury, up to the 30th June, 1827, $34,874,488 63, which added to the outstanding land debt, that may be considered secure, as the patent will not issue until the land is paid for, makes the total proceeds about forty millions of dollars, after deducting all relinquished lands and forfeitures, besides twenty odd millions of acres for education, military bounties, and other donations. So that, viewing our public lands in their most cold and uninteresting aspect, as a mere source of pecuniary revenue, we have more than paid the original cost with only nineteen millions of it; leaving the vast excess of 242 millions within our organized governments, to which there is no adverse claim, and 896 millions (about fifty-six within the several States and Territories) mostly subject to the usufructuary claims (for such they are in practice,) of the rapidly expiring tribes of the natives, as clear gain, in the bargaining view of the subject. And here I may remark, that, the single fact that government has put in market, and generally kept there, of late years, about one hundred millions of land, for the people of the west to pick and choose, not only accounts for the proceeds averaging little more than the minimum price, but also stamps a high and dignified refutation upon all accusations of peddling parimony, and grinding tyranny, that have been made, of late years, against the government of the union, in relation to the public lands. Here also I will remark that the only reason why the existing system has not produced a graduation of the price to the quality of the land, ranging from the minimum upwards, according to the occupation, the judgment, or the fancy, of the purchaser, has been that the great quantity in market rendered much competition unnecessary. I do not complain of this. It was for the promotion of the new States. But it is a good reason why they should not complain of the General Government. Such is the subject upon which this bill is to operate if it should become a law.

I will proceed now to answer what appear to me to be the most prominent arguments urged against the existing land system of the United States, by the Senators from Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, to whom I am replying. The good people of the West have been recently let into the secret, that the earth is the gift of God to man, and that it is a violation of their natural and social rights to pursue the miserable policy of the United States in relation to their lands. Did not the grant of the Deity extend to the ocean as well as to the earth? Has not man the same divine right to the free use of the one as of the other? The same right to make a vessel and traverse the ocean, that he has to make a plough and break the earth, in quest of sustenance? Yet we raise, without a murmur, twenty odd millions of annual revenue from the use of the ocean, and about one million from the use of the earth. By the founders of this republic and by their successors, until of late years, there was thought to be a wise propriety and forecast, nay even a necessity, in our complicated and multifarious forms of State and Federal Governments, to resort to every source of indirect and voluntary revenue, for the support of the General Government, to save the people from the grinding operation of a double system of direct taxation for the support of both State and Federal Government. Under our present revenue system, not a cent of the direct taxes paid by the people of the States and Territories, come into the United States Treasury; but they are all expended in the local affairs of their own establishments at home. Besides, those people know, or ought to know, that the whole expenses of our Indian affairs, amounting, in some years, to $700,000 per ann., little below the annual revenue from lands, are but the consequences of our acquisition of the soil from the natives who were placed here by Divine Providence before us. And can they see no propriety in which a patriotic public should acquiesce without a murmur, in raising a moderate revenue from the sale of lands to meet such demands, and effect such objects? This fund of the public lands is the common property of all, open equally to the acquisition of all, as they may choose to migrate, and carry their means from one State to another. They have acquiesced. Until very recently the public mind in the Western States was as tranquil as the Pacific that lies beyond them, upon this subject. When the law of 1821, for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands, was passed by Congress, there was a general burst of grateful and good feelings among them towards the Government of the Union, for the parental kindness of the act. Universal satisfaction with the existing revenue laws prevailed. Even they whose property had been depreciated by the change of the credit to the cash system, and the reduction of the minimum price, in the sale of lands, without deriving any benefit from the "relief law," breathed not a murmur upon paper: but seemed to view it as a private sacrifice upon the altar of the public good. They would have done so still; but agitators arose, and disturbed the calm of the public tranquility.

We are told now of great popular excitements upon the subject of the public lands. Excitements that have produced instructions to members on this floor to advocate and vote for this specific bill. And how was that excitement gotten up? After several years labor, how was it brought to that height in August 1826, from which it has been ever since subsiding? Let me give you a brief sketch of its rise, progress, and downfall in the State of Missouri, where it originated. The other new States that have caught the mania are but the disciples of Missouri; and as she has reflected herself into reason upon this subject, I hope they will follow her example. Ala-hama has already done so, and sent new instructions to her Senators to propose a purchase of the lands within her limits from the Union, upon some reasonable terms.

This excitement sprang originally, as I have thought, from views of personal and political advancement. The most highly wrought pictures of the grinding tyranny, and peddling meanness of the Government, in selling her lands, was circulated among the people. The most exaggerated and erroneous representations of the expensiveness of our land system was made to them. And all the cupidity of man was addressed with the hopes of having the vast fund of the public domain given to the inhabitants of the new States. Just before the August elections in 1826, thousands of pamphlets exhibiting those views were circulated among the people, containing a speech that had been adroitly gotten before them without an opportunity for reply. Every county in the State was deluged with them. They even overflowed upon Illinois and the neighboring States. The thing took like fire in our prairies, and the general cry was for the graduation bill. The artful speculator imagined his prey within his reach, and joined in the cry. The capitalists counted in advance their hundreds per cent. upon the re-sale of engrossed lands, and joined in the cry. The temporising aspirants to office, so numerous in new countries and mixed population, saw in the popular delusion, the road to the Assembly, and joined in the cry. Interest and ambition, knavery and weakness, all joined to swell the praises of the graduation bill. The Government was denounced as a hard-hearted and grinding tyranny. The cutting of a public twig was represented as cause of fine and imprisonment; and the spirit of disaffection was abroad in the land. During the six weeks delusion, pledges were demanded of the candidates for the Assembly in relation to the graduation bill, and the approaching Senatorial election. The Assembly met, thus fettered by promises. Reason, however, had resumed her command; and public spirit had recovered its former tone. The committee in both branches of the Legislature, to whom the subject had been referred, upon the recommendation of the Governor, reported against the measure; and a sensible and laconic report was drawn up and circulated among the people, representing to them their true interest and duties as combined with the interests and rights of the whole people of the Union. The people of Missouri are intelligent, patriotic, and honest, when they have an opportunity to understand the true merits of a proposition. The members of Assembly kept the letter of the promise; but condemned the measure upon which that promise was predicated. This state of things seemed to imply a failure of consideration, and it was thought necessary to do something to break the fall of the measure. Last Summer a direct appeal was made to the people for this purpose. Hundreds of those printed petitions you have seen presented, with all the words and phrases, calculated ad captandum, printed in large roman capitals, were prepared in advance, and circulated in every county in the State, and almost every neighborhood and fireside. Runners carried them every where, and the mover of the bill, in riding through the country, distributed them in person. An artifice of a darker complexion was resorted to. The presses in the interest of General Jackson were made to say, that the same party that supported General Jackson for the Presidency supported the graduation bill; that the parties were identified; and this idea was propagated from "Boon's Lick" to Washington city, and reverberated from Washington city upon the West. And I am sorry to see the "signs of the times" in Congress look so much like it. I notice this, sir, because it is, I believe, the first bold and direct attempt, since the foundation of our Government, to bribe the people with their own lands, and point the people of the West to the vast fund of the public domain as the booty in the event of victory in the Presidential contest. Once get the two ideas associated in the public mind, that the success of a particular candidate will be tantamount to a distribution of the public lands among the Western people, and there will be no accounting for the result. It is a bold, artful, and unparelled attempt at the worst kind of corruption in the Presidential election. The hopes of a few aspirants to cabinet appointment, or foreign missions, could have no such influence upon the votes of their States. But the people of the new States are not to be bribed; and I acquit Gen. Jackson of the charge. He is as far above such means as the present Chief Magistrate has shown himself to be in his honest and patriotic recommendations upon this subject. That artifice originated with men, who stand in more need of General Jackson than he does of them—with men whose object is self elevation. The same object now that it was a few years ago, when they attempted to strip the General's brow of every sprig of laurel he had ever won, and consign his name to infamy; though to be attained by very different means. Then the plan was to rise upon his ruins. Now, to associate their ignoble names with that of the General, and even tackle the frail bark of their shattered reputations and fortunes, to the more triumphant steam-boat of the General's fame, to be towed into port. But, sir, how has the artifice succeeded thus far? Those petitions—I wish that the last file of them had not been presented as a damper upon me just before I was to speak upon this bill—those petitions would, of course, be signed by many good men, who have an opinion of the operation of this bill different from the one I have. But, sir, I hazard nothing in saying, they were signed more generally by the loose trash that floats around every body politic—by the political partisans, the designing, the speculating, the electioneering, the boys, and the inconsiderate, who have all to gain, and nothing to lose. In a word, by the David's men—all that were in distress, all that were dissatisfied at home, and all that were in debt, fled unto the graduation bill, and sought relief upon the spoils of other people's property. And after all the pressing and the artifice, and the facility with which men sign papers that cost them nothing, to what number do they amount, all counted? What is the strength of General Jackson in Missouri, as indicated by the result of this appeal to the people? They amount, counting the recent cargo, to about three thousand four or five hundred! Sir, soon after the last Federal census, we gave in Missouri upwards of 12,000 votes at a Congressional election, when our Representative numbers stood at a little upwards of 62,000. This large proportion of voters is accounted for by the migration of single men, and our freedom of suffrage. We claim double that population now, which would give 24,000 voters upon the same proportion. Put it down, for safety, to 20,000, and how stands the account? Not one-sixth of the voters of the State are in favor of this bill, according to the indication of their sentiments expressed by these petitions. So far as they test the matter, I am representing more than five-sixths of the intelligence and virtue of the State in my uniform opposition to this bill, in its present inadmissible form. In its present form, few, indeed, will be found there or here to support it. The result of this appeal to the people is, however, no test of the strength of General Jackson, with whom the measure has been so artfully connected. It has been perceived by the Senate that the opponents of the present land system of the United States, cannot agree among themselves upon any thing but the denunciation of the existing order of things. They turn reformers, and decry the old regime, but they cannot agree upon any substitute to be offered in its stead. Indeed the mover of the bill cannot agree with himself, for two sessions in succession. In 1826, he announced that "the idea of making revenue" from the sale of land is exploed." "A wider horizon opens before me. Consequences as superior to the accumulation of dollars in the Treasury; consequences even superior to the honor and advantages of paying off the public debt, present themselves to my vision." But, in 1827-8, in his prefatory speech, on asking leave to introduce his bill, he declares it to be a revenue measure, whose ultimate object is to produce the prodigy of a Nation without a debt. The gentleman from Illinois seems perfectly conscious, that this bill may produce injurious speculations, and admits it. In the speech he delivered to the Senate a few days ago, he seemed to be almost orthodox, and had it not been for the instructions of the Legislature of Illinois, I believe he would have been entirely of the true faith. He is in favor of repressing speculators and encouraging actual settlers; and so am I. He is in favor of discharging the trust reposed in us, under the Constitution, with respect to the public lands; and so am I. The gentleman from Indiana, (Gov. HENDRICKS,) takes a bold course of his own, and sets up for himself. And I prefer his plan, decidedly, to the misnamed and mischievous bill now before the Senate. He lays claim to the whole of the public lands lying in Indiana, as belonging of right to the State. His doctrine is, that the act of admitting the new States into the Union, vests them absolutely with the soil within their limits, as inseparable from their sovereignty, under the Federal Constitution, and the laws of Nations. The Constitution briefly provides that "new States may be admitted into this Union," without saying a word about the terms of admission, further than the general provision that a Republican form of government shall be guaranteed to them by the United States. And as if the Federal Convention had intended to preclude cavil, in all future time, upon this subject, in the very same section, and the very next paragraph, they provide that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to pre-judge any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." Let gentlemen bear in mind, that it is not the Constitution, but acts of Congress, or rather members of Congress, that talk about the new States being placed upon "equal footing, in all respects whatever, with the original States." A thing that is impracticable, and never has existed yet in any of the new States, as I will presently illustrate more fully. The gentleman quotes M. Vattel's treatise upon the laws of Nations in support of his proposition. Protesting now, as I did twelve months ago, against the authority of M. Vattel, or any other writer upon national law, to interfere in a matter created and regulated by our own peculiar institutions, I insist that that author, as quoted by the gentleman, fully sustains the existing order of things in the United States, upon the subject of the public lands. I have not the book before me, nor any copy of the quotations, but M. Vattel's proposition, as read to us, is, substantially, that the possession and control of the soil are inseparable from the sovereignty and independence of a nation. Agreed, so far as this subject is concerned. That is precisely the case of the United States, in relation to Great Britain, France, Russia, and other wholly independent nations. If we had prosecuted our revolution no further than to promulgate the declaration of independence, still leaving Great Britain the control and management of our soil, we should have been in the situation contemplated by the writer. A situation incompatible with our national independence; although sovereignty over a country may exist without the proprietary right to the soil. M. Vattel's next proposition, quoted by the gentleman, is, that confederacies are compatible with independent sovereignty, and in confederacies the parties confederate may make such voluntary arrangements upon the subject of their soil as they please. That voluntary arrangement is made in the federal constitution to which the new States have become parties. True, we claim to be somewhat above the distracted and distracting state of a mere confederacy. We look down upon that, as to ground to which we shall never against descend; but if we were still a mere confederacy, the doctrine of M. Vattel is constant enough with our existing arrangements upon this subject. There seems to me to be no subject upon which there is a more prevailing popular error, than that of the sovereignty, or, if you please, the power of the States under our Federal Union. We republicans seem fonder of this word 'sovereignty,' than monarchists and imperialists are; and we use it without mercy. We put in the captions of our State Constitutions that we have established a "Free, Sovereign and Independent Republic," as if we were wholly unconnected and independent in proud and solitary self-existence. When, in fact, there is no such thing, under our Federal Constitution, as such unmeasured and sounding phrases import. Each Government, State and Federal, has a portion of the whole power of the whole people, and ought to be content with the exercise of its legitimate portion. The disposal of the National Domain was not among the powers to be granted to the new States upon their admission; nor is an equal footing, in all respects whatever, in the power of Congress to confer upon them. Indiana is not equal to Pennsylvania in her population and representation in the House of Representatives. The gentleman will tell me that was not contemplated—that the same constitution that provides for the admission of new States, also provides for representation according to numbers. I admit the validity of his answer. And when I tell him that the same constitution which provides for the admission of new States, also provides for the disposal of these public lands, not by the local members, but by the Federal Head of the Union, why does he not admit the validity of my answer?

Again, Indiana is not equal to Pennsylvania in her wealth, taxable property, and available means; and in that respect they are not upon an equal footing. The whole intention of the Federal Convention, and of the Congress that talked about this equal footing, was to confer upon the new States all the kinds and quantities of political power possessed by the old States under the different regulations of the Constitution; and not all the subjects upon which those powers might be exercised—to confer the same potential sovereignty, leaving them to work out their own elevation, as to the subjects upon which to exercise those powers. If the laws of Indiana be infringed, she is not ousted of her jurisdiction, because the whole, instead of a part of the people composing this great body politic, have the property and disposal of the ground on which the infraction happened. Her powers are as complete as if the ground were private property belonging either to American citizens or foreign subjects. I repeat to gentlemen, that all this argument that the proprietary right of the Union to lands in the new States, is incompatible with State sovereignty, as contemplated by the Federal Convention, when pursued to its legitimate conclusion, proves too much, and the reverse of what they desire to establish. The argument may be thus simplified: "State Sovereignty cannot exist in these new regions to the West, until the national lands shall have been disposed of; those lands were not disposed of when Indiana was admitted into the Union; therefore, Indiana was prematurely and unconstitutionally admitted, and the whole proceeding of Congress upon the subject was void!" And thus, Sir, with the gentleman's own propositions, we most syllogistically get clear of this novel demand for all our lands, by turning the claimants out of doors. But this is their argument and not mine. I am disposed to respect the States, and the demand. Make lands as cheap to settlers as you please. Adopt the Spanish plan of donations, if the public interests require or justify it; but suppose the public lands were ceded absolutely to the States in which they lie. Whose imagination can paint the scenes of confusion and rivalry that must result from establishing in the West a number of independent and contending venders of the public lands? Each State would immediately bid for the migrating population of the Union. The Federal plan, which has resulted in such uniformity and security of titles, could not be sustained by the States; and the scenes of land-litigation of Kentucky and Tennessee, under the defective land-laws of Virginia and North Carolina, would be re-enacted upon the theatre of the West. The States holding the lands would be driven, to avoid rivalry, to form some kind of league or understanding upon the subject. Even the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, while he contends that the States are the owners of these lands, calls in the aid of the federal head to settle their contests in anticipation. It provides that the States shall not undersell the United States in their Territories—a proposition inconsistent with their absolute ownership of the soil for which he contends. If the States own these lands, Congress has no right to legislate upon the subject.—The gentleman cannot adapt his legislation to his claims without calling in the aid of the Union. He cannot, for instance, confer upon the States the power of treating with the Indians for their lands. Why are we not content with the existing league, or understanding, upon their subject expressed in the Constitution, giving the disposal of this national property to its true owners, all the people of the Union, as represented in Congress? Sir, I have long thought that, if there were no other object to be attained but the uniformity and security of land titles, the provision of the Constitution, giving the disposal of our national domain to the General Government, was a wise one. You are not restricted in the manner of disposing of that domain. Make it as favorable to the citizens of the new States, as our duties towards the whole Union will admit, and I will go with you.

I will now proceed to answer several objections which are urged in common by the friends of the bill and the amendment.

They tell us that the sales of lands have been slow—only nineteen millions of acres in forty years, or rather in thirty years, since the present system has been in active operation; and that, therefore, our policy has been a miserable mistaken one, and the prices of the soil too high. It is true, we have sold but about nineteen millions, averaging but a fraction over the minimum price per acre; but that proves very little for or against the present system. What is the true reason of this result? It was because there were not people enough in the Union in need of lands; nor money enough in America to have purchased up the vast regions of wild lands which we have acquired. The little handful of human beings, scattered along the eastern coast of North America, who achieved our revolution, and set up for themselves on this continent, could not possibly multiply and replenish the earth rapidly enough, to have needed, in so short a time, the vast supply of lands which we have acquired. It is matter of more surprise that they have done so much, than that they have not done more. They could not make men by law or cover the continent with people by a single fiat. They must have time to do such things. They have already pushed forward their progeny to the mouth of the Kansas upon the West, and to the Sabine upon the Southwest. They have extended their borders as rapidly as the interests of either the whole, or any part of the whole, seemed to demand. The reason why the sales have not produced more, was, that the vast supply, of about one hundred millions, kept in market for many years by the Government, besides numerous donations, and several millions of military bounty lands, given for both the revolutionary and late war, so far exceeded the actual demand for the article, that none would compete, except to a very limited extent, and that mostly in the acquisition of the cotton lands of Alabama. The emigrants to the West found themselves in the situation of Abraham and Lot of old. The whole land lay before them; and strife was unnecessary. In the Kaskaskias district, where the gentleman from Illinois resides, I have understood that the whole District became subject to purchase at the minimum price, because none would compete above that price. I do not object to this; it was for the benefit of that country. I suggest these things to show that the small portion of the common owners who have gone to the West, have no great cause of complaint, on that score. Gentlemen object further, that the proceeds of the lands have come in "driblets." Who would have expected them to have taken any other course? It was the natural order of such things. At the first sales 40 years ago, only a few purchasers were found, and only a handful of money was received. At subsequent periods, both increased, until at length we received a million of dollars per annum of voluntary revenue from that source, for the support of the Union, without the excise-officer, or tax gatherer entering any man's premises. Such things must have a beginning; and all such beginnings are usually small. So you might step across the mountain rivulet, or divert its course with your foot, at its source; but, if you will pursue its meanders into the depth of its valley, it expands into a broad and magnificent river. Again, we are told by these friends of reform, or rather of revolution under the name of reform, that our land system, considered as a source of revenue, is extravagantly expensive as well as unproductive; and the enormous error has been deliberately propagated in the West, that the expenses of the surveys and sales have been 33.13 per cent upon the amount of the proceeds! If this were true, it would be good reason for reforming or amending the laws upon that subject; but no good reason for abandoning, either openly or covertly, the position assigned us by the constitution. But how stands the fact upon this branch of the subject? The whole expenses of selling the 19 millions, heretofore disposed of by sale, including all the regular and incidental expenses of the surveys and sales amount to 8.6-10ths per cent. of the proceeds, as appears by the official reports lying before us, and founded upon actual calculation. An expense as cheap, at least, as that of our revenue from imposts. They also tell us that the land system drains off the money from the West. This objection has often been answered. There was no money in the Western wilds to be drained off; until those wilds drained off the men from the elder States, and the money with them in their pockets. This objection does not become men professing a common interest; inhabiting common country, with the constitutional privilege of residing on whichever side of a State line they please. If the elder States were disposed to be captious with us, they might object that the younger ones drain off, not only their money, but their men, that make the money, and acting upon this narrow policy they might have kept the Western lands out of market, or the Western people out of the Union. Instead of that, I am glad to hear the more moderate friends of these proposed measures acknowledge the liberality and fostering favor of the General Government towards the new States.

The gentleman of Illinois has attacked the Treasury Report of this year, because the Secretary supposes the ease with which lands are acquired in the West, and the vast quantity of them kept in market, of which the people of the Union may pick and choose, operate as a standing encouragement to agricultural pursuits; and draws an inference from these facts, in favor of a correlative encouragement of another branch of national industry, the great and rising interest of domestic manufactures, in opposition to commercial dependence upon, (not commercial freedom with,) foreign countries. The gentleman's objection must be to the Secretary's inference, and not to the notorious fact that he states. For it is notoriously true, that the abundance and cheapness of our wild lands in market, do operate to encourage and increase the agricultural class of the people of these States, as naturally as the scarcity and dearth of lands in Europe, drive their people to engage in other pursuits, and find out new branches of industry for the support of life. The Secretary might have added, if he had chosen, another standing incentive to agricultural pursuits, and migration to the West. One founded in the nature of man; and not to be either implanted or eradicated by laws. I mean the natural love of liberty and free space in the bosom of man; or, if you please, even his natural propensity to return back to the free and wild state of nature. We are taught that it requires constant exercise to keep mankind up to the sticking point of civilization, and that every intermission of the exertion produces a lapse from the point gained; as it requires a constant application of the oars to drive the bark against the stream, while we have nothing to do but let fall the oars, and we float down again without an effort. As a great general proposition, surely this standing encouragement to agricultural industry does impose a duty to extend a corresponding protection to the mechanical industry of the country, unless, indeed, we are prepared to sit down in abject dependence upon the supply of necessities which foreign and rival nations may deign to afford us, in war as well as in peace. Unless we are content to cover our country with retail shops of European goods, and convert a large portion of our citizens into mere shop boys, and tape-measurers, for Europe to carry on a kind of dependant traffic for the benefit of the European manufacturers and exporters, more exhausting to our country than forty public land systems could be. Every duty imposed on importations from abroad, no matter how moderate that duty may be, operates, unavoidably, to encourage the manufacture of the same kind of articles at home, especially if our own country produce the material of such articles, whatever may have been the motive of the legislator in imposing the duty—whether he said, in his speech, or in the preamble to his bill, that it was for revenue or for protection. The truth is, we are all tariff men; and we are all anti-tariff men. The real point in dispute among us is the degree, the extent to which we may carry encouragement, without too much injury to other great interests, without doing more harm than good. Whether the Secretary would propose too high a rate of duties on foreign articles, to attain the object of a proper encouragement to home industry over foreign, is another question, upon which we may be expected to differ in opinion, as we do upon almost every question of any moment that comes before us. I am not about to ramble, at present into the tariff bill that may be proposed at this session. To that I will answer when called. I only wish to indicate that bill as the true point of attack, if the gentleman from Illinois really intends to overturn the Treasury Report: for the Secretary is invulnerable in his general position, that the existing laws and practice respecting the public lands, do contain a standing encouragement to agricultural pursuits in the United States. And while our Constitution secures to every citizen the right of free migration to, and citizenship in, the new States in the West, the deepening and widening currents of emigration cannot be stopped by any laws that our National Independence may require for the encouragement of home industry—the infant weakness of home industry against the herculean manhood of its European and jealous rival. Free men, with such rights of locomotion ingrafted in the Constitution of their social compact, unlike the fettered subjects of European Monarchs, when pent up in dense thongs in the old States of this Union, will as naturally and as irresistibly migrate to the new States and Territories, as water will descend an inclined plane, or seek its proper level. Nor is there any disposition manifested to prevent them. Even now there would be no difficulty, I believe, in reducing the price of the public land if gentlemen would be content with a reasonable thing, instead of claiming all, or that which would be worse than all. The military bounty lands have been pressed into the service of the bill before the Senate. Gentlemen who are single owners of the lands are offering hundreds of tracts of them for any thing they can get for them, and are underselling the government; and, hence, they argue that our system is wrong and our minimum price too high. Sir, the history of our military bounty lands in Illinois and Missouri, presents a high and simple eulogy upon the general results of our public land system. Those bounties, though granted from the most patriotic motives, have turned out, as was predicted by some of the most experienced statesmen of the day, to be of no service to the soldiers who fought the battles of the late war. They became the subject of extensive speculations, and have fallen, in large and injurious quantities, into the hands of those men of prey, the land jobbers; and now sit like an incubus upon the bosom of our States. Those prowlers roamed the Union in search of soldiers' claims; and why are they now offering them for any thing they can get for them? One reason is, because the protecting shield of the public land system saved our citizens from the blow aimed at them by the speculators, by rendering it impossible for large land-holders to make fortunes by resales, leases, or otherwise, while the public had so much land at such moderate prices lying all around them. Another reason was, that men doubted the titles of the speculator. For although the original grant to the patentee was as good as any, yet the emigrants fear, that in the long chain of intermediate conveyance, and, in some instances, of a speculative knavery, between the patentee and present holder, some rotten link may be found to turn them off in their old age to begin the world anew, as so often happened in Kentucky and Tennessee. Ask the plain Western farmer why he gave a higher price to Government for his quarter section, when one of equal advantages, lying in sight, beyond a mathematical line, on a river, in the county tract, might have been bought for a fifty dollar horse, or a smaller sum in money? He will, perhaps, tell you that he came from Kentucky or Tennessee, because he lost his land; that he has no higher object in this life than to raise his family respectably, and leave them a sure competency at his death, and that he has no more faith in the direct guaranty of a great and powerful nation both able and willing to secure him in his purchase, than he has in the itinerant speculators in military bounty lands. And in so saying he would express a higher encomium upon the wisdom of the venerable founders of our public land system, than all the Congressional speeches ever made about it; especially if he should add, as such men often do, that he is "a law bidding man," and perfectly willing to contribute his share of the moderate revenue raised from public lands and foreign commerce, rather than come to direct taxes. A third reason for this result of underselling Government has been alluded to by the gentleman from Illinois. The speculators in bounty lands, having failed in their object of making fortunes by resales to the cultivators, find themselves prostrated under the operation of State direct taxation. Every year a tract must be sold if they can find purchasers, to defray the taxes upon the residue. They are in the situation of some gentlemen of the South, who, having the misfortune to own many slaves, are compelled to sell one every year to pay for the food, raiment and taxes of the remainder of the gang. Their offers to undersell the Government is but another form of acknowledging the great and happy truth, that large landholders in the United States cannot succeed in that mode of subjugating man to man, so long as the whole people own, all around them, such vast quantities, within the reach of every industrious man, upon such reasonable terms. Mr. Burke's speech in favor of the sale of the Crown lands in England has been quoted in support of this bill. It is no small tribute of praise to our young Republic, that we are doing with our public lands precisely what Mr. Burke advised should be done with the Crown lands of England: selling them out, without encouraging strenuous competition among our citizens: throwing them into the general circulation of private property, instead of holding them up, and leasing them out as landlords to our own citizens as tenants, as was once done with the Crown lands in England. I will not insult the common sense of my constituents, by attempting to show them the wide distinction there is between our public lands, belonging to the people themselves, and the Crown lands of England, belonging to the King. Nor will I attempt to show them the applicability of Mr. Burke's speech for selling those Crown lands, to the wholly dissimilar subject of our public lands: for I confess I am not able to perceive that myself. The United States have been doing, from the beginning, with our public lands, what Mr. Burke recommended, at a late day, of the Crown lands of England. Our much abused public land system holds an impenetrable axis over the young agriculturist, commencing life without fortune or patronage. Hence, we see that portion of society who live by their wits, and prey upon their species, most active in every effort to prostrate that system, because, while it lasts, their "occupation's gone."

I now submit my amendment, to strike out the original bill, and, in lieu of it—

1. To reduce the price of all lands to one dollar per acre, after the 4th July next; and

2. To allow any person to take a quarter section, after it shall have been in market for five years; and by inhabiting and cultivating it for five successive years, to entitle himself to a patent.

I will vote for this, or for any other project that may be submitted, calculated to increase the number of freehold cultivators of the ground, upon such terms as will prevent injurious speculations, and landed aristocracies; but, with my opinions of the operation of this bill, as it now stands, I cannot vote for it. I deem it a serious obstacle to more reasonable and practicable plans of amendment, and believe, that, by grasping at too much, we shall secure nothing beneficial to the new States.

Mr. KANE said: The deep interest which this proposition has excited in the minds of the people of Illinois, expressed, as it has been, through the Legislature of the State, in the form of instructions to their Representatives on this floor, must furnish an apology for the part I take in this debate. Difficult as may be the undertaking, I will endeavor to confine myself to such considerations as have not been urged by gentlemen who have already discussed, and almost exhausted the argument. Of such consequence has the measure been considered, as to have engaged the earnest attention of the Legislatures of three States of this Union, who concur in approving the precise plan before you, and who look to its adoption with all the anxiety which the prospects of future advancement in population, and in the comforts of life, can excite. Those of us, therefore, who advocate the passage of the bill, will not, I trust, be charged with an attempt rashly to overturn the present system of selling the public lands without sufficient warrant. If we err, our error will be referred to an honest desire faithfully to discharge a duty of obedience to the sovereign will of our constituents, in a matter about which we agree with them most heartily in opinion.

Under circumstances produced by a document upon the table, and to which I shall call your more especial attention hereafter, it will not be improper, before entering upon the consideration of the particular subject before the Senate, to take a rapid review of the acts of this Government which have tended to advance the interests of the people of the new States, and thereby to show that no "bounties" have been awarded in favor of their agricultural pursuits, and that no gratuitous efforts have been made to increase their wealth or their numbers. Besides, suggestions, unfavorable to the modesty of the Representatives of the new States, have been made in more than one place, while pressing so frequently upon the attention of Congress, subjects connected with, and growing out of, the land system of the United States. Such, as that we are unreasonable in our requests; that favors have been dispensed to our constituents with a liberal hand; that we are never to be satisfied; and that one benefit conferred, operates only as an inducement to fresh demands. It is time, sir, that the truth should be more generally understood. It is especially necessary that it should be so far understood, as that this bill may not be prejudiced by false impressions. The care of this Government over the multiplied interests of this extended empire, is witnessed in the general and happy results which have ensued. The claims of a people who deserved something for the enterprise with which they have explored your extensive regions of wilderness, and developed its resources, who expended their toil and blood in the defence of your frontiers, have not been overlooked.

As early as March, 1791, to such as served during the early periods of our history in the militia, you have given 100 acres of land a piece: to such as cultivated and improved your soil within reach of the tomahawk, surrounded by numerous and hostile savages, you have given 400 acres each; and to the head of every family a like quantity. The gross thus given was small, because the people of that description were few in number. It furnished to them a slender remuneration for services which, though voluntarily rendered, were not the less patriotic and useful to the State. At a later period you have given to the people of the new States the right of preference in the purchase of the lands they had improved, at two dollars per acre, leaving to them what you could not in conscience take, the value of their labor. Who will urge that these acts were in the nature of bounties, in favor of the growth and wealth of the new States? Bounties are usually offered to encourage migration, but these have not induced migrations thither, because the persons interested were already there.

Many laws have been passed in relation to the public lands, in which the Representatives from States in which those lands were situated have taken an active and efficient part. It was but natural that they should. But whilst it is admitted that so large and interesting a portion of national property has received the repeated attention of Congress, it is denied that the people of the new States have, in a single instance, received from the Federal authorities any thing in the nature of a mere gratuity, unaccompanied by a corresponding national benefit. If grants have been made for schools, salt works, or seats of State Government, the inducement was found in advantageous equivalents, secured by compact with the Territorial Conventions, and in the certain tendency of the measures pursued, to expedite the sale of other lands, and at enhanced prices. Cessions for canals have been made, but in such a manner as reserved to the nation alternate sections, thereby giving to the half a greater value than the whole would otherwise have possessed. When you have enacted laws to relieve from their ruinous bargains the purchasers of public lands, you have taken care to get back your own, or obtain a just price for that you parted from. It is true, you did not exact the full measure of the contract, but you received as much as the principles of natural justice would sanction, and quite as much as your land was worth without improvement.

I wish not to be understood as asserting that these several laws have had any other than a happy and soothing influence upon the minds and condition of the people to whom they applied. My only object is to disencumber this bill from the prejudice which is so liable to be produced by the so often repeated declarations, that an undue share of favor has been awarded to the new States. To consider the acts referred to in the light of gratuities simply, would be to charge upon Congress direct partiality in legislation, in giving to the few at the expense of the many—a course of conduct wholly inconsistent with the duty of a body selected for the protection of the equal rights of all, and in manifest violation of the Constitution.

Without taking up your time further upon matters not strictly relevant to the important question before the Senate, I will now proceed to lay before you a statement of facts with regard to the sale of public lands, from which I think it must appear that the present system has been, and if persevered in must continue to be, a losing one, considered as a measure of revenue. During the whole continuance of the present plan, under all its modifications, comprising a period of thirty years, out of nearly 139 millions of acres of surveyed lands, you have sold 19 millions for 40 millions of dollars; of which $1 millions have been paid in cash; the remainder being subject to liquidation under the revival and continuance of the relief laws. We are told by the President in his last annual message, that a sum little short of 33 millions has been paid from the common treasury for that portion of the public lands which had been purchased from France and Spain, and for the extinction of the aboriginal titles. This sum is made up of the purchase money of Louisiana; money paid the State of Georgia and Yazoo scrip; money paid on account of Indian cessions; for surveying, and expenses incidental to the sale of the 19 millions of acres. In this long period of years, then, you have not paid into the Treasury from the public lands the amount of their cost by nearly two millions of dollars. You have a large remaining capital which ought to be so disposed of as at least to reimburse the principal, and pay an interest upon the money advanced. 20 millions of the purchase money this Government borrowed, by selling stocks bearing interest at the rate of five and six per cent. per annum. Sir, the interest upon the sum paid for Louisiana since 1803, exceeds the principal. Charging the public lands with 243,000 dollars of Indian annuities, most of which are perpetual, your yearly net receipts on account of land sales, which may be estimated at one million of dollars, do not pay the interest upon the purchase money of Louisiana alone.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] on a former occasion, showed you that the public lands were a fund for the payment of the public debt, and that, so far, they had paid less than the interest of that debt. But, sir, the present system by which sales are regulated, will appear infinitely more vicious when we come to understand that it has not made good the principal of the debt created on account of lands alone, that more than twenty years interest upon the greater part of the sum paid for them is now due, and that the yearly sum now received upon sales does not equal the yearly interest. The public lands are now a charge upon the public revenue; and without a radical change—such a change as shall expedite sales—will continue to be so to the end of time. Although, to use the language of the President, "The acquisition of them made at the expense of the whole Union, not only in treasure, but in blood, marks a right of property in them equally extensive." Yet, sir, I am not willing that my constituents should bear a portion of a burthen, though it be in common with others, to sustain a system so profitless in a national point of view, and so immediately injurious to their own growth and happiness.

Is it possible, Mr. President, that this is a mistaken view of the subject? I have spoken of facts—of facts disclosed and verified by printed documents upon your table—and do these not justify the assertion, that the public lands, as a source of revenue merely, have thus far proved worse than nothing? Amongst these documents, there is one which it would be uncandid in me not to notice. It comes from an officer who has received from this Government repeated proofs of confidence and regard. The Secretary of the Treasury, in remarking upon the existing system of selling off the territorial domain of the Union, says, "The system is interwoven beneficially with the highest interests and destiny of the nation;" that "it rests upon foundations both of principles and practice, deep and immovable, foundations not to be uprooted or shaken." Surely this distinguished statesman, while using this strong and beautiful language, lost sight of the Federal revenue, with the management of which he is particularly charged. Sir, he goes further. In the very same document containing this high eulogium of our present land system, he "summons" our "gravest attention" "to the consideration of correlative duties which the existence of such a system in the heart of the State imposes." And what are these "correlative duties?" the giving of additional bounties upon manufactures, one effect of which he declares will be "to lessen, and usefully lessen," the "absorbing force" of this very system, so beneficially interwoven "with the highest interests and destiny of the nation." The amount of all this I understand to be, Mr. President, that the present mode of selling the lands is not to be changed by a repealing or amendatory law, but laws are to be passed upon other subjects which shall secure the employment of more of the surplus labor of the Northeastern and middle States at home, and extinguish, so far as may be, the motives for the purchase and cultivation of your soil: no mind employed in a close scrutiny of this report can escape these conclusions. Whilst then we, who advocate this bill, assert and prove, that, under existing regulations, the nation has lost, and must continue to lose, money upon its lands, the Secretary of the Treasury proposes, with a view of attaining other than revenue objects, to check the sales and diminish the receipts of money from that source.

This brings me to the consideration of the question, whether the Federal Government can rightfully and constitutionally adopt any course, with regard to its lands in any of the States, which shall not be strictly confined to the purposes of revenue. I am not, sir, about going over the ground so often occupied by others, by insisting that the holding of lands by the Federal authorities, within the bosom of the new States, is in violation of their sovereignty, impairing that "equal footing in all respects whatever," secured to them by the terms of their admission into the Union. Whatever consideration such arguments may be entitled to, it is neither my duty nor inclination here to repeat them. My positions are, that the public lands are to be converted into public revenue, either by sales for money, or by such donations to actual cultivators as shall increase the class of consumers of articles paying a duty into the Treasury, or by such donations of parts as shall facilitate the sales of the remainder; and that any other mode of disposition, or any delay in the disposition of them, not essential for revenue, is a breach of solemn compacts; is contrary to the evident intention of the Constitution, and is a high violation of the political rights of the States.

Sir, the cession acts of Virginia and of Georgia, the treaty with France for Louisiana, and with Spain for Florida, all contemplate the admission of the ceded territories and their inhabitants into the Union, with the full benefit of all the provisions and principles of the Federal Constitution, and with the same privileges of self-government as the then existing States; each of these instruments contains a solemn pledge to that effect. However void of equality may be the condition of the new States compared with the old, as to the rights of dominion over the soil, and of taxation, we must all agree that their political sovereignty ought to be, within their respective limits, equally independent of the Federal Government. Each ought to have the same right to extend its wealth, increase its numbers, and provide for the happiness of its citizens, that other States possess. Over none ought the Federal Government to have the power to enlarge and diminish, at pleasure, the means of advancement and prosperity. Sir, for the sake of the argument, I will admit that the national revenue was a matter of such great moment as necessarily to subject the new States containing national lands to the condition of inequality, resulting from a continuation of the ownership until the lands could be "disposed of" for the benefit of the national Treasury. But it is a breach of all faith, a violation of all the principles of these compacts, a violation of treaties and of the Constitution itself, to continue this condition of inequality for any other purpose, or for any longer time, than is indispensable to a judicious disposition of them. Out of nearly two hundred and sixty millions of acres, to which the Indian title is extinguished, you have "disposed of," in the course of thirty years, about nineteen millions, and in the meantime brought your Treasury further in debt. And what is now the language of men at the head of affairs? The system is immovable. It has operated as a legislative bounty upon agriculture; and means are devised to check the operation of the system, poor as it is, because the new States, if left to cultivate the advantages which God and nature have provided for them, will drain off the surplus population of the old States, and thereby prevent those States from becoming manufacturers, and increasing their capital.

Is there much difference between stopping the sale of lands at once, by a direct act, and adopting measures under the idea of correlative duties professedly for the purpose of discouraging their cultivation and settlement? I am not now addressing to the Senate any objections to the projected tariff, but I wish distinctly to be understood as protesting against the power of this Government so to use the soil within the new States, as to check the march of those States through natural avenues to wealth and consequence. If Providence has assigned to them a better soil, a milder climate, or superior advantages of any sort, has the Constitution conferred upon you the power, directly or indirectly, to control the progress of migration thither, by withholding lands from market, unless the state of the national exchequer manifestly, urgently, and undeniably requires it—(a state of things which can never happen;) or do you hold the right of conferring bounties upon the inhabitants of other States and countries less beneficially endowed by the Creator, to induce them to hire them to remain at home? If additional duties are necessary for the protection of the manufacturing industry of the nation, that is one thing, and I have now nothing to do with that matter. But if no other reason exists for such a measure than the supposed expediency of confining the population of the country to the region east of the Alleghany, you act cruelly and unconstitutionally if you attempt the measure. The natural checks to emigration in all countries are of the most powerful kind. They are "wound in close and intricate folds around the human heart." Attachment to our native soil yields in strength and in ardor only to the love of kindred, connections, and friends. The idea of distant emigration is always accompanied with the apprehension of expense, and with fears arising from the uncertainty of comfort, health, and welfare, in a land of strangers. So powerfully have such considerations operated in all old countries, as to have retained in them, under a thousand evils, a population rather redundant than deficient. People submit to want, and even to the extremes of poverty, rather than break ties so interesting, or run hazards, imaginary if you choose to call them, so replete with uncertainty and danger. May I be permitted to bring to my aid, in order to quell the apprehensions of the old States, the opinions of a justly celebrated writer—a writer whom you are in the constant habit of consulting whenever questions of political economy are presented? The celebrated Malthus declares, "there are no fears so totally ill-grounded as the 'fears of depopulation from emigration. The vis inertia ' of the people in general, and their attachment to their 'homes, are qualities so strong and general, that we 'may rest assured that they will not emigrate unless, 'from political discontents or extreme poverty, they are 'in such a state as will make it as much for the advantage of their country, as of themselves that they should 'go out of it.' This language was applied to the state of things in the old world, and is not completely applicable to emigrations from one State of the Union to another. But it is so far applicable, that no one leaves the East for the West, except with a view to provide additional comforts for himself or his progeny. Is it not unkind, then, to restrain them? They consist of your brothers, your sons, and near connections. They carry with them the recollections of their infancy, still fondly cherishing the remembrances of their native homes. Instead of acting the part of the prodigal son, I will inform the Senator from North Carolina, that they ask you, conformably to your duty, and in the exercise of your clear constitutional authority, to put it into their power, by thickening population around them, to sustain schools and educate your progeny, that if ever (which God forbid) the imbecility of old age shall overtake you, these, your children—your second selves—may know how to value, yes, sir, and how to defend your institutions. They ask you to give them strength that they may rush to your assistance when danger shall threaten you, and surround you with that best fortification—the breasts of grateful and devoted freemen. Will the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BRANEN] insist upon stopping up every avenue to such results, and by adopting the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, doom the youth and vigor of the country to a state of dependence upon a manufacturing aristocracy? Sir, some of our best citizens have removed from North Carolina. Why did they do so? Because their prospects at home were gloomy. Indeed, we have been informed by a venerable Senator from that State, whose name is always pronounced by his countrymen in that distant region with all the pride and affection which his long and eminent public services entitle him to, that times were never so hard there as the present. Stop up the road to Western emigration, and where will your poor find employment? In manufactories. In those very establishments, the further protection of which you pronounce to be your ruin. What shall I say of the unconstitutionality of an effort on the part of the Federal Government thus to wield the destiny of independent States? In what part of the Constitution do you find such terrible authority? In the power to admit new States into the Union "upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever," or in your right "to dispose of" the territory and other property of the United States?

If, Mr. President, I have succeeded in establishing the positions, that the control of this Government over the public lands in the several States is limited exclusively to objects of revenue, and that the present system has failed to answer any such purpose, the inquiry is not whether any change shall be made, but what change? what amendments are best calculated so to "dispose of" these lands, as to make them available to the public Treasury? The obligation of such an amendment is enjoined, not only by the considerations I have urged, but by the pledge given so early as 1790, to the public creditors, to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of lands in the Western Territory, then belonging, or such as might thereafter belong, to the United States, to the discharge of the debts, for the payment whereof the United States were holden. There appear to be but two general modes of disposition in your power to adopt, in order to comply with these high obligations.

1st. Sales for money, at such prices and upon such terms as will raise the largest sums within a reasonable period of time, without a wanton sacrifice of public property.

2d. A system of donations, upon conditions of cultivation and improvement, by which the poorer class of citizens shall become more substantial members of the community, and be thereby enabled to contribute more abundantly to the indirect revenue of the Federal Government.

To either plan, if separately pursued as an entire system, many great and unanswerable objections present themselves. It is only from a combination of the excellencies of both, that a plan may be extracted which it will be safe and wise to adopt.

It appears to me, Mr. President, that the bill before you discloses the principles of such a combination not sufficiently guarded, perhaps, in all its details, but exhibiting the foundations of a system upon which it will be both prudent and profitable to commence the work of reformation. I will not detain the Senate, by repeating what has been said so often by others; every particular provision, its object and tendency, have been discussed, and are well understood. My attention will be directed to the objections which have been urged against the plan, in the hope that, by yielding my assent to such as have force, we may all be brought to agree in such amendments as will make its great and leading features acceptable to all. It has been said by the Chairman of the Committee of Public Lands, whose opinions are always listened to in this body with much respect and attention, that "the plan of graduating the price by the quality of the public lands, however desirable in itself, is now impracticable, if it ever were so;" that "the procession has gone by." His idea appears to be, that the mode of ascertaining the quality "should have been infused into the system, some thirty years ago, at its commencement." That the modes of ascertaining the different rates of the lands should have been prescribed "at the time of the public surveys." Suppose, sir, that you had directed by the law, originally passed for the sale of lands, that your surveyors should note and report the different qualities of surveyed lands, according to any mode that can now be imagined to have been an efficient one, would it have proved successful? Is it in the nature of things that you can by law, or by the reports of official agents, fix upon the saleable quality or price of lands? Before you can do this, you must establish a uniform standard of valuation and quality, which shall be received by all persons interested, as equally just and proper. Yet, we all know that their value varies on account of quality, location, and the purposes for which they can be used. The different value of lands, and perhaps the most essential difference, depends upon the difference of the dispositions of the human race. Some will prefer a tract because it lies in a particular neighborhood, though its soil be not so rich as another which lies more distant. Sir, I might here instance entire settlements made in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, upon this very idea. The county of Union, in that State, contains a class of citizens who are not excelled by any, any where, for industry and correct moral habits, who have settled together in order to enjoy the benefit and comfort of each other's society, and the better to participate in the blessings of their own religion. Sir, such instances are not uncommon throughout all of the Western States. Some will value a quarter section because it contains a mill seat. Yet, all the world is not composed of millers, or persons able to erect mills. Emigrants from the North want to grow wheat, corn, and flax; those from the South, tobacco, hemp, and cotton. How is it possible, then, that a surveyor should be able to fix upon the saleable value or quality of lands? Sir, the only practicable mode is the one by this bill proposed, to permit purchasers to do that which you cannot prevent them from doing; that is, to be their own judges of the value of that which they purchase. Can it be believed that combinations of individuals will ever be so extensively formed as to induce all men to forego that which they want, in the hope and expectation that by delay they will at a future day acquire it at a cheaper rate? Such was never the practice or disposition of the human race. The saleable value of lands can no more be fixed by this sort of agreement than it can by the estimate of surveyors.

It is again objected, sir, that this bill is to effect a ruinous scheme of speculation, and that great land barons are to grow up under it, because no purchases will be made, of consequence, until the lands shall fall to twenty-five cents the acre. Protesting that this is not a proper subject of inquiry for this Government, who have no right to legislate upon the public lands any further than to turn them into revenue, I am safe in denying that any such result will follow if this bill goes into operation in its present shape. The people in Illinois have had some experience upon this subject. More than three millions of acres have been given, out of the lands in that State, to the soldiers of the late war. Most of these lands have fallen, at a price much below the minimum established by this bill, into the hands of what the Chairman of the Committee of Public Lands calls "land barons;" yet it is a fact that they will sell for a much less price than the lands of the Federal Government. This is owing to the wholesome control which the State Government exercises over lands when they become the property of individuals. Our Legislature has said to these "land barons," we cannot object to your holding as much land as you have money to purchase, but you must contribute to the support of our Government in proportion to the extent of the property you hold in it, and which we are bound to protect. The thousands of acres yearly sold for taxes, shows that the visions of land barons have not and cannot be realized, where the people of a State are true to themselves; and where, too, they act with perfect justice in imposing no higher taxes upon others than upon themselves. But, sir, for the sake of getting this bill through, I will admit the force of this objection, and vote for an amendment, should it be proposed, which shall limit the operation of the graduating principle of this bill to given portions of lands within the several districts, within given periods of time, and confine the right of entry at the minimum of twenty-five cents to actual settlers alone. Surely this course will destroy all hopes of mere speculation. Sir, the Federal Government have the strongest security against an engrossment of the lands by speculators, in the fact that they now own more than 700 millions of acres, without the States and Territories, upon which this bill cannot operate, which they can, by extinguishing the Indian title, at any time bring into the market upon any terms they choose. I have thus, sir, answered the two prominent objections which have been made against this bill; permit me to express to you my views of the general results likely to flow from its passage. A large, troublesome, unproductive national property will be turned into cash upon terms not injurious to the revenue, and within periods of times sufficiently distant from each other to insure sales at fair prices, and by which means the constitutional duties of Congress will be discharged, and your obligations to the public creditors cancelled.

Graduation of the Public Lands.—Cumberland Road.

[SENATE.]

The rights of the States are equalized by dispensing with the means of exercising, on the part of the Federal Government, an unequal share of influence over any.

The public lands will be made the property of individuals, after such mode of distribution as will increase the class of actual cultivators, and an immense region of uncultivated wilderness will be brought into a state of improvement and production, by which the wealth and strength of the nation will be augmented, and the condition of the new States greatly improved.

The poorest citizen of this republic will have it in his power to become an owner of a freehold, the sovereign of soil sufficient to give him comfort at home and respectability amongst his neighbors. He will feel himself exalted into a substantial citizen in the State, and will feel all that added interest in its welfare, which his augmented substance is sure to inspire.

If such are the ends to be accomplished, who can hesitate to give this measure his cordial support? Is the fear that agriculture will be thereby too much encouraged to induce this body to overlook all the considerations which I have suggested? Although not far advanced in years, and certainly young in political life, the time is within my clear recollection when the generally received axiom of the day was, that agriculture and commerce constituted the two pillars upon which the hopes and happiness of this country mainly rested. And the document to which I have alluded, is the first which has met my eye from any high public functionary that has ventured upon the allegation, that "correlative duties" required a check to be placed upon the natural advancement of either. To whatever employment the rising and future generations of this republic may be destined, none will contribute to infuse into them a more general, a more exalted spirit of independence, than the cultivation and ownership of the soil. Other pursuits may be better calculated to heap wealth upon individuals, but none will so equally distribute it amongst the great body of men; none will make more virtuous citizens or sounder patriots. And, without pretending to a gift of prophecy, I will hazard the assertion, that the last spark of the liberties of this nation; if it ever die, will be extinguished amongst the men who till the ground. I do not agree with my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS] that, upon the decision of this question, or his proposed amendment, now or hereafter, depends, in the least degree, the existence of this Union entire and uninterrupted. Do with this measure as your wisdom shall decide. However hard may be the fate of the new States—produced by a disposition to exercise control over nine-tenths of their territory, for purposes unknown to the Constitution—whenever the sun of your liberties shall set, it will sink into the West, unallied by a single effort of the patriotic yeomanry upon your borders to dismember this great and happy confederacy.

After some further conversation between Messrs. WEBSTER and BARTON, on motion of Mr. McKINLEY, The Senate adjourned.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill to continue the Cumberland Road was taken up—

Mr. NOBLE observed, that as the amendments were merely verbal, he presumed no objection would be made as to their adoption, provided the Senate decided that the bill should pass. His object however in rising was merely to move to lay the bill on the table. There seemed to be a difference in sentiment between the gentlemen from the Western Country in relation to the Public Lands; and until two subjects now before this body, one being the "Graduation bill," and the other a bill introduced by his colleague, upon which the provisions of this bill are in part bottomed, he was not disposed to press it. A stipulation had been made between the United States and the State of Indiana, that the U. States were to perform certain acts, to be paid for out of the 2½ per cent. fund, reserved from the sales of the Public Lands; but how can we expect, said he, the obligor to fulfil the contract if the fund is exhausted? How can we expect, asked he, of the Federal Government to fulfil the compact while this bill to graduate the price of Public Lands, to make donations to settlers, and to cede the refuse to the States in which they lie, together with the amendment of his colleagues was pending? He should be placed in a state of embarrassment, to urge it at this time. Much excitement had been produced in his State in relation to the Public Lands. He was as willing as any gentleman, that the State sovereignties should be maintained, but situated as he was at present, he was reduced to the necessity of asking of the Senate to lay the bill on the table—and why so? Let, said he, my colleague dispose of his subject first, and after having given my vote decisively against it, I will take the most proper course with the bill I advocate. When the subject came fairly before the Senate, he thought he could prove, incontrovertibly, that if the measure of his colleague be adopted, the State of Indiana will be placed in a worse situation than under a territorial government and tributary to the United States. He repeated, that he wished the bill to be laid on the table, and that when the measure proposed by his colleague came fairly before the Senate, he should give it his feeble opposition, in order that his sentiments might be spread before the people here.
